

PART I

BOOK I

The Conflagration of Sinope was so great, that the very skie, the Sea, the valleys and tops of Mountains though far remote, were all illuminated by its flames: so, that notwithstanding the black mask of night, all things might mournfully be discerned: never was object more terrible to Spectators then this; Twenty Ships might be seen burning all at once in the Port; which though floating in the midst of water, did belch up flames as high as Cloudes: these affrighting flames, being blown by the bellows of an impetuous winde, did oft times wend toward the Town; and as if but one huge faggot were set on fire, seem'd to consume it all. They flasht from place to place in an instant; and there was scarce one Quarter in all the Town, which by a dire communication did not feel its fury. All the Tackling, Cordage and Sails being set on fire, flew horridly into the aire, and fell down again in sparks upon the houses, which being thus consumed, are forc't to yield unto this merciless Element, and tumble down in those Streets, unto which they were before an Ornament. The hideous multitude of flames which stream'd through severall streets, and which had more or less fury, according to the subject upon which they seised, did seem to Combat one with another, by reason of the whirling winde which counter'moved them; sometimes mingling together, sometimes parting, as if they did dispute about the Glory of destroying this stately Town. Amidst these Lightning flames, one might behold whole Clouds of smoak, which by their dismall duskie colour, did add much terror to this dolefull spectacle: Also, the great abundance of sparks (of which we spoke before) whistling up and down the Town, like enflamed storms of Hail, was doubtless most horne, to all beholders. Neer this confus'd combustion, there was a Castle, seated at the lower end of the Town, built upon the top of a sturdy Rock, which did shoot itself into the Sea; unto this, the flames had yet not reached, but did every moment threaten it, because the violent winde did waft that way: It was likely, the fire would first seise upon the Gate thereof, because the houses neer it, were most enflamed, and nearest ruine. In the midst of these fiery flames, one might perceive some Churches and great stone houses, which gave more resistance then the rest, and retained so much only as might testifie the Magnificence of their structure, and move Compassion for their inevitable ruine. In short, this terrible Element devoured all, or at least seem'd so neer it, that the sad sight of such a dismall chance, did move both terror and compassion in all beholders.

The Amorous Artamenes, in the head of four thousand men, marching out of a low valley, covered with a thick wood, was much surpriz'd with wonder at this dreadfull object, and seem'd so amazed, that he was not able to express his wonder by his words: He looked, upon the Town, viewed the Gate, he cast his eyes upon the Sea, which seemed all fire by reflexion from the Clouds; he gaz'd upon the Mountain tops, and saw all the plains plainly; he lifted up his eyes to Heaven; he had not power either to speak, or go any further, as if he were unsatisfied whether what he saw was reall, or else but a delusion of his phantasie. Hildaspes, Chrisantes, Aglatidas, Araspes and Feraulas, did see this fatal flame, but though they were neer him durst not so much as look upon him. Artamenes, turning his Horse on to a little higher ground, did from thence perfectly perceive, that this Town, which so burned, was the very same which he intended to surprize that very night; and according to his provident Intelligence, brought hopes with him to relieve his Princess, which the King of Assiria there detain'd a Prisoner. He being thus extreemly transported with Passion, began to expostulate with the Gods; Is it possible, said he, you can be so cruell and unjust, as to Consent unto the Loss of the fairest Princess that ever was? and that you should Predestinate her ruin, at that very instant, when I undoubtedly resolved her safety? In saying this, he advanc't a little forward; none but Chrisantes and Feraulas followed him; Alas my Friends (said he, beginning to gallop, and commanding the rest to follow) how Lamentable are my Destinies? and unto what a dismall spectacle have they brought me? Come follow, follow me my friends, and let us die in the same flames which have seiz'd upon my illustrious Princess; Can it be (did he suggest unto himself) that these flames which now I behold, dare offer to destroy my most ador'd Mandana? But why do I say, can it be? No, no, alas, it is too too true be doubted: The Gods I see have kindled too great a fire for her to escape it; had it been their pleasure to have preserved her, surely they would have Pumpt up the waves of the Sea, to Quench the flames; and never have permitted her to incur this danger: But alas, said he, most injurious Rivall: Canst thou endeavour thine own safety, more then hers? has not thy unworthiness caus'd her destruction? If I did behold my divine Princess (said he in turning towards Chrisantes,) in the hands of a Tirantique Prince who was in the head of a hundred thousand men, ready to sacrifice her before my eyes, I should not apprehend so much despair as now; for then I should have an enemy before me which I might assault, though not vanquish; but here I have nothing to do in the world, but to throw my self into these flames which have consum'd my Princess. After these expressions, he passed silently on, a little farther, and seeing none neer which could understand, but Chrisantes, he violently broke thus into passion: <◇> Heavens, said he, am not I accessory to the death of my dearest Princess? Is it not for the affection that she bares unto me, that she her self hath caused this Conflagration, rather then she would fail in her fidelity to me, the unfortunate Artamenes? But oh ye Gods, if it be <...> then I do confess I have deserved all my misfortunes, and am worthy of my worst resentments: Chrisantes, seeing him stand stock still in a silent melancholy posture, drew neer him, and endeavoured to cheer him up: But then Artamenes, going on, and looking back with so sad an aspect as might move compassion out of insensible stones, said unto him, No, no, Chrisantes, such disasters as these are not capable of any Consolations, There is no way for me but one, and that I'll immediatly take: yet this poor comfort remains, that the same fire which consum'd both my Princess, and my Corrivall, which mixed both her innocence and his crime together, and which delprived me, both of the object of my hate, and of my Love, shall also destroy me for company, and mingle the Ashes of my adored Princess, with mine together: In speaking this, all the signs of absolute despair appeared in his face: his tone was sadly mournfull, and all his actions seemed preparations for present death. Day now began to dawn; the Suns approach did somewhat mitigate the horror of the accident: the Sea, the valleys, the Mountains, assume again their naturall colours; and the Face of this sad Scene, seemed something Page 3 to change complexion. Feraulas, observed two remarkable passages, and hinted unto his Master. S' (said he) Do you not discover a Galley in the Sea, which strives with all its powder to Row from this unfortunate Town? And do you again observe, how every one endeavours to extinguish, those flames which flash towards the great Tower, that is over the Porttall of the Castle? I do observe them both (answered Artamenes;) Certainly (said Chrisantes) these are infallible signs, that the Princess is not yet perished, but may happily be preserved, either in this Galley, or that Tower which the flames have not yet touched: Alas (cried out Artamenes suddenly,) I should be happy, and begin to breath some hopes again if this were so. By this time they were approached neer the Town, where he discovered many men, striving to stop the fire from catching hold of the Tower. Bestir thy self (cried he out, and mended his pace,) most unhappy Rivall, and endeavour the safety of our Princess: Assure thy self, that if thou dost preserve her from this danger, I will forgive thee all the Injuries thou hast done me. This Prince did not continue long in the same resentments; for one while he was all Prayers and Vows in behalf of his Mistress; another while all Curses and Imprecations against his Rivall. Presently after, Looking upon the Galley, and discovering some Women upon the Deck, he was then in an extasie of Joy. But upon second thoughts, considering that though the Princess were one of these upon the Deck, yet as to him she was for ever lost; then he began to reassume his first despair: Afterward, when he viewed the Tower, and observed how the Sea and the Fire did wholly inviron it, and that happily his Princess might be in it, then he changed his apprehensions, and gave order, that those Troops which came to destroy the Town, should now preserve it, and help to extinguish the flames. Artamenes being in no disposition to go back again, sent Feraulas, to take Command of his Men, and to march speedily after him. Coming neer the Town, they found the Air very fiery hot, and heard such hideous noise, that none but Artamenes himself would enter the roaring of the Sea, the rumbling of the Winde, the flashing of the flames; all these, added to the horrid noise of whole houses tumbling, which were shaken into heaps of earth; the lamentable complaint of living, and the cruel cries of dying men; all these dismall dinns, which were answered by an Echo from the Mountains, did make a most mournfull and horrid harmony, if I may call a sound so full of sad confusion, a harmony: But all this could not divert the intentions of Artamenes: For he being now neer the Town, and all his men drawn up in a body, he addressed himself, and spake unto them, in these winning words: Imagin, my fellow Souldiers, that it is I which is in that Tower; that it is I my self who am at the very brink of perishing, between fire and water, and that it is I whom you come to save: Or to express my self a little better: Imagin a say that your King, your Princess, your wives, your fathers and your children, were all enclosed within this Tower, and with Artamenes ready to perish; let all these dear relations rowse up your spirits unto a gallant deportment: you must (my Companions) do as never yet was done; you must destroy your enemies, and yet, you must save them: you must fight against them with one hand, and save them with the other: In summe, you must attempt all manner of wayes to preserve that Princess who may be your Queen, and deserves to be so of the whole world. After this, Chrisantes, Araspes, Aglatidas and Hidaspes, who had each of them the Command of a thousand Men, came unto Artamenes to receive their ultimate Orders: Feraulas was admitted unto Council, who was no mean agent in the business; who also had transacted for Intelligence within Sinope, and unto whom Artucas had promised to deliver up a Port of the Town, that same night. Feraulas gave his vote, that it were expedient to proceed in the very same manner, as if the Town were not on fire, and without any further Inquisition, to march straight unto the Gate by Mars his Temple; because, said he, if perchance this accident has not put the whole Town into a general disorder, we may perhaps find resistance at any other place; if being always a Custom upon such accidents to double their Guards, least the fire should proceed from some design of their enemies; whereas, on the contrary, if you proceed this way, we are sure to finde no opposition; for if Artucas and his Complices be not all consum'd in fire, we shall certainly have their assistance; and although they should be all perished, yet we are certain to finde none in that place to obstruct our passage. This advice was good, and sounded all reason. Afterwards it was put to the Question, What Course was most Commodious whereby to gain the foot of the Tower. Aglatidas observed the fire to cease on that side of the Gate, because the Ships being sooner consumed then the houses, it must therefore consequently follow, that the fire must soonest cease there also; therefore he conceived it the most convenient course, to take the way of the Port, because then they should have but one side to guard, and because that also this way was the easiest to go unto the foot of the Tower. Page 4 Artamenes, who thought each minute an age till he was there, would contradict nothing, least he should lose time; he marched himself first, and gave command through the Army, to divulge it about the Town, how he had no other design in coming thither, but to preserve the Princess; inducing the People thereby, to refuse resistance, and not impede his plot. They all begin to march; Feraulas guided Artamenes (who was like the rest, on foot,) unto the Gate by Mars his Temple: and there they found him whom they sought for, who was in such despair of Artamenes coming (for this sad sight had much retarded him) that he was careless whether he threw himself into the flames, or lived any longer. He no sooner spied them he long'd for, but he caus'd the Gates immediatly to fly open. The Guards at the place were very thin, for maugre his commands, most of his men ran away to see in what condition the fire had left their houses, their wives, their fathers, and their children: so that they found no great difficulty in becoming masters of that Guard; yet they found enough to do in defending themselves from fire. Artamenes, in marching through the inflamed streets, exposed himself unto extraordinary danger, and was many times in hazard to being overwhelmed with falling fiery houses: though the object was terrible to him when he was without the Town, yet it seemed much more horrid when he was within: they marched with Swords in their right hands, and Bucklers in their left; they had hotter service in preserving themselves from burning coals, which continually tumbled upon their heads, then from the Darts of their enemies. Upon the unexpected arrivall of Artamenes, all they who surviv'd within the Town, did begin to double their lamentations and amazement: Many of the Grantees who before were busie in quenching the fire of their own houses, did quit that charitable office, and endeavoured to muster into Arms, to make some resistance; but alas, neither Arms, nor Captains, nor Souldiers, nor any thing fit for opposition, can be found in so confus'd a disorder: In some places, men were pulling down their own houses to preserve their neighbors: others threw their Plate, their Jewels, and their richest things out at win'dowes, in hopes thereby of saving something: Mothers without any care of goods, or houses, or any thing, might be seen running about the streets with hair burned off their heads, and nothing left, unless in either arm a Child. In short, the sight was so sad and terrible, that if Artamenes had not been so transported as he was, with vehemency of passion, doubtless he would have stopt his course, to have succoured them, so worthy were they of pity, and so sensible was he of their misery. Nevertheless he marched on: the report of his Arrivall was every where divulged: Aribees, the Governour of Sinope (who used his endeavours to prevent the fires catching hold of the Tower, and who upon this occasion had rallied most of the men and Souldiers which surviv'd) was at his wits end, and involved into such anxieties of minde, that he knew not whether was most expedient, to fight Artamenes, or to quench the flames; for thus he argued: What will all my services advantage the King of Assiria, though I should get the victory, whilst he in the mean time is ruin'd by the enraging flames: on the contrary, what should I get by quenching the fire, whilst in the mean time I am taken a Prisoner by Artamenes? I, who am his mortall foe; I who betray'd the King my Master; I who transacted the conveyance away of the Princess his daughter; I who mov'd the People to revolt: No, no, let us fight with Artamenes, who is as terrible to the King of Assiria, as fire, or flames, or any thing else can be; let us provide for our preservation that way: In saying so, he gave command, that all they who were quenching fire, and with engines pulling down the fired houses, should now take up Arms, and those men who had none, to provide them with all speed, and take them where ere they found them; let fire rather hurt their houses then not succour him. When Artamenes had passed through a great part of this pitifull Town, and marching along the Port, he came unto the foot of the Tower; did wonder to see none quenching the flames, and was amazed when he saw Aribees with resolutions to fight him: What (cried he out) do I come to quench the fire, and must I now hinder it from being extinguish'd? No, no, my friends, it must not be; Upon that he gave command that some of his men should help to extinguish the fire, whilst with the rest he fought with those whose office it was to have done it: When all was thus order'd, he advanced towards the main body of his enemy, in the head of which was Aribees. Artamenes, turning his eye towards the top of the Tower, there espied the King of Assiria, who seem'd to be in a very desperate condition, as if he were indifferent whether he cast himself into the flames, or Sea. This sight confirmed Artamenes in his opinion, that his Princess was alive, and therefore he gave second orders of quenching the fire: then he marched with the rest and charged his enemy; who received him with great and desperate resolutions: so soon as they joyned, he got sight of their Generall. Aribees (said he aloud) I Page 5 come not to fight but to punish thee: the fault shall be thy own, if I do not procure thee a Pardon from the King of Medes, upon Condition thou wilt cease Arms, and help to preserve thy Princess and mine. But Aribees who thought his Crimes too great to be pardoned, in lieu of Answer, did run at him with his drawn Sword, and began a fight in the midst of fire: the fight was more terrible to him then the fire; for blowes fell from an invincible arm, in whom Love, hate and revenge, did kindle more then accustomed valour at this time, although he was ever the most valiant man alive. Hidaspes, Artucas, Chrisantes, Aglatides and Araspes, drew neer Artamenes: as for Feraulas, his orders were to quench the fire. The King of Assiria all this while did not once behold, that which would produce his safety or his sorrow, his weal or his wo, and would either lose his life or kill his enemy. Artamenes casting up his eye often towards the Tower, said to himself, I should be infinitely happy, if my Princess did but see what I do to preserve her: were I certain that she were an eye-wit'ness, either of my victory or of my death, I should desire no more. Mean while, the fight was furious: in the midst of fight, Artamenes minde was much upon Feraulas, and his orders in quenching the fire: In conclusion he undertook a single Combate with Aribees, <◇> amidst all this confusion, which indeed was an act too opinionative and hazardous; for though this Traytor had to deal with the Gallantest of Men, yet despair might by chance have done that in him, which true valour might do in the other: yet for all this Artamenes fought full of hopes, and was confident that after this, there was nothing but a few walls between him and his Princess. Indeed his acts were Miracles; he slew all that stood in his way, and wounded Aribees in so many places, that in conclusion he had no other resolutions but to render himself, if upon a sudden an enflamed house had not falne upon the place of Combat, so that Aribees was covered with its ruin'd rubbish; and all men thought he had perished both by fire and sword, as deserving double punishment for his perfidious rebellion. Artamenes also, who though he had received but few wounds from his Antagonist, yet thought himself in a dangerous state, when he was surrounded with flames and smok; and certainly, had he not shielded his head with his Helmet, he had inevitably perished: his Cote of Arms was burnt, and a thousand to one but he had been smothered in this adventure. The fall of this house did raise so thick a dust, a smok so black, and a cloud of sparks so fiery, that for a long time nothing could be discerned upon the place. That which most vexed Artamenes in this accident was, that Aribees, who was upon the very point of submission, had retreated forty or fifty paces, and thereby escaped his revenge; Artamenes touched him with the point of his sword, but by a miracle of fortune missed him, and now found no enemy amidst these fatal ruins. After this accident, all they who had dependance upon Aribees, were all amaz'd and fled. But this Hero Artamenes runs after them, and cries aloud, that he came with intentions to save, and not to hurt them: In conclusion, he perswaded them, to lay down Arms and trust unto the word of a Conqueror, who heretofore had given testimonies of his Generosity; and so in a short time, all seem'd to be on one side. Artamenes encouraging his men, did shew them by example what they should do, and himself quenched the fire. All the people wondered to finde so charitable an enemy: his Souldiers pul'd down houses with their engines of Artillery: they did employ their Bucklers and Helmets in carrying water to throw upon the fire. In short, they neglected nothing which might be thought expedient in the business. Every Captain did admirably demean himself in this encounter; amongst the rest, Aglatidas seem'd rather to fight for death then victory, so courageously did he expose himself unto the fury of the fight and fire: Mean while, Artamenes seeing the fire decrease, was infinitely transported with joy and hope to see his dearest and fairest Princess. She is (said he in his heart,) within this Tower, and if▪ be not the most unfortunate wretch that ever liv'd, I shall presently bless my eyes with a sight of her, my most adored Princess. I may chance have the honour from her own lips to be ter'imed her Liberator; and now I hope to see both the object of my Love and of my hate. The fire is now extinguished and he approached under the walls of the Tower; he gave orders to secure all advenues and Ports of the Town: as he began to demolish the walls of this Tower, not yet knowing whether he should meet with any opposition, he espied a man of good handsome deportment, who opened the Gate unto him, and in lieu of disputing his entrance (which indeed he had done, had he not known Artamenes from the battlements of the Tower) he reverently addressed himself, and in a passionate manner said; S'r, if the Name of Thrasibulus be not quite forgotten, do him the honour to use all your endeavours to prevent the ruin of a most illustrious Person, of whose safety we shall utterly despair, unless your timely assistance help it. Artamenes supposed it to be the Princess who was in some extre'mity, Page 6 and therefore did not insist upon the nicety of Ceremonies with Thrasibulus, whom he presently knew by his voice: Come along my old Conqueror (said he to him,) let us haste to relevee this illustrious person. As soon as ever he had uttered these words, he ran hastily up the stairs, and many followed; among the rest Hidaspes, Chrisantes, Aglatides, Thrasibulus and Feraulus: but they all, except Thrasibulus, wondered, to see no Souldiers in the Tower, nor in any other place of the fort: Araspes by order from Artamenes staid at the Gates, to prevent surprisals: Artamenes was so transported with desires of seeing the Princess, that he was at the top of the Tower before the rest; but, O Heavens, how sadly he was surpris'd with amazement, when in lieu of the Princess, he found none but the King of Assiria, who was his Rivall, and Ravisher of the Princess, also his utter enemy? an unarmed enemy, sunk in sorrowes: Artamenes turned toward Thrasibulus, and askt him, if this was his illustrious Person he meant: he seeing all the Company following with desire to come unto the top of the Tower, and considering with himself, that his discourse with the King of Assiria would not be fit for all publike ears, beckned unto them to retire: Then he asked where the Princess was, imagining she might be in some lower room of the Fort; but he was much more surprised with wonder, when the King of Assiria said unto him, You see Artamenes, a Prince more unfortunate then you self, since he is the cause both of your disasters and his own. You may see (said he, shewing him the Galley which was not yet far off, by reason of contrary winde) another Ravisher of your Princess more guilty then my self, because he professed amity and friendship unto him, whereas I never gave you the least hope of any Love from me. What (cried out Artamenes in looking upon the Galley, and not regarding his enemy) is not the Princess here in your Power? No, no, answered the King of Assiria sighing) the Prince Mazares, that most perfidious Mazares, has Ravisht her both from me and you, and hath rob'd you of the glory of your Victory; but since you cannot satisfie your Love in seeing your Princess, satisfie your hate, and take a full revenge upon me your Rivall enemy: you see, I am not in condition to oppose you; I was resolved, as soon as this Galley was out of sight, since I could not follow it, to cast my self either into the flames or Sea, and so finish my misfortunes, rather then fall into the hand of you my Rivall enemy. The enemies of Artamenes (answered this generous and sad Prince,) have never any cause to fear him but when they have Arms in their hands. The Condition in which I finde you, is your umbrage from the heat of my anger, and preserves you from the fury of my resentments. After these words, poor Artamenes was so sadded with sorrow, as never man was more. He sees his Princess, Ravished away the second time, but cannot follow, since all the Ships were consum'd, so that there appears no possibility of relief or revenge upon this second Ravisher. He looks upon his first Rivall Ravisher, and sees him in his Power, but sees him unarmed, and without any design but death. Artamenes has now no heart, he sees his disasters are without either parallel or remedy; he had sometimes some thoughts (had not the generosity of his soul stayed him) of satisfying his revenge upon his Rivall, and sometimes upon himself: he was so surrounded with sorrow and anxious cogitations, as he neither knew what he should or what he would do. Presently he heard the King of Assiria say, I see Artamenes, Fortune is your good friend, and the very windes are obedient unto your wishes, in blowing back the Galley to the shore, so that happily you may safely receive your Princess again. Artamenes looking toward the Sea, did plainly perceive the Galley was forced by contrary windes so neer back again, that Women might perfectly be discovered upon the deck; and might easily see how Saylor's tug'd with all their strength, to part the violence of the waves, keeping themselves as far from Land as they could by force of oar. At this sight Joy might be seen to sparkle in the eyes of Artamenes; but as for the King of Assiria, sad sorrow and despair seem'd to be all his hopes; knowing vvell enough that though the favorable winde did waft▪ the Galley safe into the Port, yet the sweetness of that fortune would be all Artamenes, and not his; yet he cheered up himself with hope of seeing Mazares punished. I hope you will permit me (said he to Artamenes,) that if it be the pleasure of the Gods to make you happy, in safely restoring you the Princess,) to save you the labour of punishing this Ravisher: be pleas'd, but to allow me Combate with him, and furnish me vvith a Sword, and I vvill promise you, that immediatly after my revenging victory, I will force it through my own heart: by this means I shall permit you to enjoy that Happiness quietly, which as long as life is in me I shall always disturb. This Revenge must I reserve unto my self (replied Artamenes) yet in consideration of that respect which I bear unto the King of Assiria and his misfortunes, I will deprive my self of that satisfaction which I could finde in revenging my self upon his own Rivalship: But as for Page 7 Mazares, I must reserve the punishment of his perfidious fact unto my self. After this, these two Rivals, without any more memory of old hate, applied themselves to observe the Galley, both wishing Happiness to the Princess, and Curses upon the Ravisher, as if both of them had one and the same interest. This object had such pleasing influence, upon their eyes, their spirits, and their imaginations, as that now they seem to be very good friends. But in conclusion they see the Sea begin to change colour, the windes rise, the waves boisterous, sometimes tossing up the Galley as high as Clouds, and sometimes bulging it to the bottom of the Sea with its surges. This sad sight, had likewise the same effect upon both their mindes, and moves them equally unto Passion; Artamenes lookt upon the King of Assiria with an unexpressable sadness, and the King of Assiria lookt upon Artamenes, with a face full of black despair; the equality of their misfortunes did suspend all their cogitations: and they apprehended all that Love could possibly imagin dolorous and resentive. They saw, if the winde continued where it was, that the Galley would be driven against the foot of that Tower wherein they were, and so dash all in pieces; so that now they begin to fear vvhat before they desired, vvishing the vvindes vvould now second the Prayers of the Ravisher, and blow them far from Land: Mean vvhile, the storm encreaseth, and according to the ordinary capricious inconstance of the Sea, a vvhirl-winde, did upon a sudden so intershock the waves, as the Galley was carried far from the Town with incredible celerity, so that these two Rivals lost the sight of it, and vvith it all their hopes and their hearts. What fears of shipwreck these two illustrious, but improsperous Princes, did resent, is not imaginable. Fain they would exclude Mazares out of their Prayers for Mandana; but rather then she should want a wish of safety, they pray for both, and repent them of their first desires. Now, when that object, vvich before did take up their passionate resentment of each other, was out of sight, they began to conceive of one another as two Rivals and two enemies. Artamenes was upon departure, vvith intentions of committing the King of Assiria into safe custody, when the King began to speak thus unto him: I know Artamenes, that your Birth and Quality is equal unto mine; I am sure of it by infallible and most certain grounds: I do retain much Confidence in your Generosity, of which I have had so much experience, and of vvhich, mangre my hate, I have been a long (though tacit) admirer. Therefore I will both beleeeve and hope, that you vvill not deny me one favour vvhich I shall desire. As you are my Ri|vall (said Artamenes) I should deny you all your desires; but as you are the King of Assiria, I can deny you nothing, so it be not prejudiciall unto the King whom I serve, nor his Daughter vvhom I adore; and be confident, I will deny nothing which will not vvound my Honour or my Love: I oblige my self unto it by the vvord of a Man, vvhom you say is not inferior unto your self, although it pass not so in the opinion of the World: Demand then vvhat you please, but first consider well with your self, least, against my vvill you should provoke me to a deniall. The King of Assiria, as soon as Artamenes had said so, replied: I know that I am in your power, and you may transfer me into the hands of Ciaxares; I know again it vvill be of much advantage unto him, to get that King unto his fetters, a great part of vvhose Kingdom he hath Conquered: But I know you too Noble to triumph over me, or to insult over your Captive Rivall; vvhom you cannot chuse but know to be a Man of Soul, since he hath measured his Sword with yours: Suffer me therefore, to have so much Honour as to Contribute my endeavours towards the Punishment of our Common enemy, and of Releasing the Princess: And I do oblige my self by Promise, that if it please the Destinies to be so propitious unto me, as that I shall finde out the illustrious Mandana, yet I vvill never transact any thing unto your prejudice, untill first the fate of Arms in Duell, have decided our Fortunes: I confess Artamenes (said he further) that my request is something difficult, yet if your soul be not capable of any but easie things, I shall conceive you unworthy to be my Corrivall, 'Tis true (replied Artamenes) but <◇> cannot Consent unto your desire: It is much more easie for me to determin our Controversie by the Sword, then Consent unto your Liberty; nor is it in my power so much, as perhaps you imagin. As my Love is not inferior into yours Artamenes (replied the King of Assiria) so my desire of Combat is no less violent in my soul then yours; yet I vvould not fight for the enjoyment of the Princess, since she is not in a Condition to be the Prize of the Conqueror: but Artamenes, our best and most expedient course, is to pursue the Ravisher of Mandana, and to Contribute both our endeavours jointly together for her freedom, since our interests unto her are so equal. Do you not apprehend, that if both of us should fall in Combat, then vvould the Glorious Mandana, remain in the Possession of our Common Rivall, vvithout either protection or defence? At these words, Artamenes paus'd; and then replied; Page 8 Doubtless it were not just to expose our Princess unto so much hazard; nor is it fit for me who am entrusted by the King of Medes with his Army, to dispose so peremptorily of such a Prisoner as the King of Assiria; All that I can vvith Honour and safety promise is, to employ the best of my endeavours for his release. But to testifie in the mean time, how desirous I am to encounter so Gallant an enemy, and that I vvill if possible procure his freedom; I do now engage my Honour, never to pretend any thing unto the Princess, although she were in my possession, though the King of Medes should consent unto it, and she her fair self were pleased with it, before the fate of Arms has rendred me a Conquerour in Combat with you. I cannot deny (said the King of Assiria) but your Arguments are Convincing; that you have reason to treat me as you do; and that my request was unreasonable: And, though you be vviser then I am, yet I beseech you confess I am more Amorous, since I have lost so much reason, which you have retained. I must dispute vvith you (replied Artamenes,) that Controversie more obstinately then the other. Then, the King of Assiria vvithout any further replies, did entreat him to endeavour his release, vvhich once happily obtained, might much conduce to the safety of the Princess. Upon this Artamenes retired, and committed the guard of the Assirian King unto Araspes, commanding to treat him vvith all observance and possible Civilities, vvaiting upon him unto his accustomed Lodging, and so at this time they parted. Artamenes marched through all the streets; kept the People in good order, and quite quenched the fire: he sent out severall Men, to see if they could discover any happy tydings of that Galley vvhich had carried away his Princess: He dispatched Posts unto Ciaxares, vvith Intelligence of all adventures, and employed all the rest of the day in giving out Orders: At night he retired unto that Chamber vvhere his Princess was vvont to lie, vvhich he knew to be the same by the information of Thrasibulus, unto vvhom he applied himself, vvith as much Civility as the inquietude of his minde vvould permit him; he gave order for reparation of his Ships vvhich had been tom by the tempest, and consumed by fire: He related unto Artamenes, how the King of Assiria did treat him vvith much respect, and permitted him to lie vvithin the Castle, vvhere he did see the Princess Mandana; and how the last night, they were all vvry apprehensive of that noise vvhich the burning of Ships did cause; and how the King of Assiria call'd for his Sword, and never rested in a place; that he vviving a desire to go unto the Princess Lodging, found it lockt, but found no Souldiers vvhich used to guard the Fort, and especially that place; that he call'd for his Servants and broke open the Chamber-door, but found no body in it: afterwards, vvhen he desired to go out of the Fort, he found it a thing impossible, by reason of the fire: That after all this, he often went unto the top of the Tower, vvhere too deeply resenting his disasters, he resolved every minite to throw himself either into the fire or the vvater. Thrasibulus could make no further Relation because he arrived at Sinope but the day before; so he left Artamenes in his Chamber, vvho at their parting assured him, he vvould move the King to make him satisfaction for his Ships vvhich had been burnt: Thrasibulus did highly commend his Moderation, because in all these sudden and unexpected sad disasters, he did not deject himself by unprofitable sorrows, but Couragiously endured this so considerable a Loss. Artamenes did vvake away the night in such disturbed imaginations, as cannot be conceiv'd by any but himself. Behold (said he in his melancholy minde) the place vvhere my Princess is abus'd! Me thinks I see her vvith a dolefull memory think upon me, and vvhere perhaps she mours for the misfortunate Artamenes! Vvithout doubt she hath spoke something concerning me; for by vvhat other vvay was it possible, the King of Assiria could know, that Artamenes was more then reall Artamenes? I, vvho during the time I was in the Court at Cappadocia, passed for no other then such a one as Philidaspes, a sillie Knight, though perhaps I was as amorous as he, and by consequence as unlike to delude: But, alas, my most divine Princess, vvho fatally comes it to pass, that I should be here in your Prison? and that I should finde your Ravisher here, but not you? I finde a Rivall vvpon vvhom I cannot vvith Honour exercise my revenge; I have lamentably lost a Princess vvhom I know not how to follow; Her Beauty, vvhich vvvas my highest Glory and only Happiness, I finde now to be cause of my dire disasters, and her own miserable misfortunes; She has met vvith many adorers, but yet they are such as are vvithout becoming reverence. In vvhat places soever she came, she procured Rivalls unto me, and enemies: Ah Divine eyes (cried he out,) how comes it to be possible you should infuse such injust and so irregular resentments? You, I say, vvhich never charm'd my heart, vvith any other thoughts, but those of fear and reverence? I vvho never durst presume so high as to say I lov'd you; I, vvho never lookt upon you, but was Planet-struck and trembled: I, vvho have long, long adored you in the secret of my Soul: I (I say,) vvho had rather Page 9 die a thousand deaths, then any one of all my actions, should in the least degree in •ur your displeasure: But for all this, you are Courtted by hearts vvho are most unworthy of you; hearts vvhich never study that reverence vvhich is your due, but aym only at their private satisfaction; for my part I cannot repent me of my humble Passions; and in spite of this misfortune in missing this soul of my life, I had rather be Artamenes then Mazares; not but that he is happy in his vvry Crime; for he sees her, speaks to her, and has the opportunity to discourse of his Passions; but doubtless her answers are all disdam, and those eyes, vvhich are his glory and delight, vvill become his punishment vvhen they sparkle anger at him. In a vvord, I had rather lodge innocently in the heart of my Princess, then lie an offender at her feet: But oh Heavens (cried he out, in a sudden passion) vvill you permit this terrible tempest to continue, and be her ruin? As he was vvusing thus in these melancholy Imaginations, he heard a great noise vvithout: and presently Chirisantes coming hastily unto the Chamber; S' (said he) the King of Assiria vvill escape, or to speak truth, I think he is gone; for Araspes hearing a noise in the Kings Chamber, vvithin vvhich (out of reverence unto him) he did not lie; opened the door, but found no King: we vvvent all immediately out and searched diligently; we finde, that under his vvindow vvhich is directly opposite unto a fire|ruined house, there is a great heap of ruinous rubbish, vvhich hath filled up the Mote under the Castle in that quarter, so that it raised up a high hill of combustible ruins, by vvhich we suppose the King escaped. Artamenes, though he was much moved at this unpleasant news, yet sent out Orders immediately unto all the Ports of Sinope, and vvwent himself to seek his Prisoner. As he was at one end of the Town, he discovered a Troop of Men in Arms at the other end; and vvho endeavoured to become masters of the Port: he hastied thither, but all too late, for the King of Assiria was already gone, and had charged through the Court of Guard. These were some, vvho were commanded by Aribes, and vvho every one did beleeeve to be dead, but he did lie close under the rubbish of that ruin'd house, vvhich seem'd to bury him alive: This Man to gain more time for the King of Assirias escape, began a skirmish, notwithstanding all the vvounds vvhich he had formerly received. Artamenes no sooner saw him, but said, Vvhat, Traytor, art thou risen again to betray thy Master? if thou vvilt escape vvith thy life, then thou must give me my death: In saying so, he made at him vvith such a vvulgarious impetuosity, as Aribes, though vvouragious enough, was forced to retreat a little; yet it was but to retard his death one moment longer, for Artamenes did press so sore upon him, as he had enough to do to defend himself, and must needs fall under the vvallour of him vvho never fights but conquers: In conclusion, he bestowed upon him such a fatal blow across his body, that in spite of his Curass he fell at his feet. Before he died, he confessed, that being so concealed under that heap of rubbish, he rallied as many of his men as he could, and hid them amongst the ruins of houses; and vviving in the interim enquired vvhat Chamber the King of Assiria did lie in, he got up to his vvindow in the beginning of the night, by that heap of cinders and half-burnt vvood vvhich vvvas under it, and so vvith as little noise as possibly he could, he helped the King of Assiria to escape. At the end of this Confession, this vvperfidious vvretch lost both his speech and his life both together. All his vvcomplices, seeing him in so sad a condition, betook themselves to their heels. Artamenes could pursue the King no further by reason of the nights obscurity. Upon his return unto the Castle, he sent unto Ciaxares, to advertise him of the accident, and spent all the night in contemplation of all the mutable and capritious humour of his fate: he was much amazed, vvhen he considered all his adventures, and that one so vvyoung should be the subject of such vicissitudes in Fortune: Whilst he vvvas thus deep in thoughts, and vvalking in his Chamber (for his turbulent minde vvould not permit him sleep) he found upon the Table a vvry rich Table-book, vvvhich leaves vvvere of Indian Palm; But, oh Heavens, into vvhat an extasie vvvas he vvrappt, vvhen upon the opening it, he found the hand of his Princess: he looked upon it again most earnestly, and the more he lik't the Lines, being now fully perswaded it vvvas her hand, and thus began to read.

The Princess Mandana to the King of Assiria.

REmember, S', you told me a hundred times that you could deny Mandana nothing; if you think upon that, you vvill not accuse the generous Mazares of any infidelity, since he was moved at my desire, to act as he did; not that he has any other interest in my Liberty, then such as vvirtue does infuse into souls vvell descended. Resolve then to pardon him that Crime, vvvhich to speak truly does Page 10 in some sort reflect upon your own advantage, since it is a means to lessen my aversion, by the testimony vvvhich you gave me of your Love. Know, that I vvill protect him in my Fathers Court, vvho hath protected me in yours. Know also, that it is by the Pardon of Mazares, by vvvhich you may obtain yours from Mandana, and may finde more room in her esteem, then ever you could in her affection.

Mandana.

As soon as Artamenes had read this Letter, he presently repented of his malignity against Mazares, and now made as many Prayers for his safety as he had before for his ruin: Appearances (said he) are fallacious, and it is too much rashness to Censure upon the Actions of another, vvithout most certain knowledge. Would not any one have concluded Malzares, the most unworthy man upon earth? and that his infidelity unto the King of Assiria, had no other foundation, but his unjust Love? but it seems, that Pity and Compassion vvvere the only Motives, vvvhich prompted him to his transaction: I perceive it is not his fault, I am not the happiest man in the vvorld; but if the Tempest do not prevent me, I shall hope to enjoy my Divine Treasure; and in the mean time, I shall resent the actions of Mazares, as vvhaving no other design in them, then such as vvconduce unto the Liberty of my Princes, though it vvvas my cross fortune to come too late to relieve her: But, said he, vvwhat imports it, by vvwhat means Good fortune come, so I enjoy it? I vvwill therefore in this hope revive; and resolve to become a friend unto Mazares, in protecting him against the King of Assiria. After he had thus vvreasoned vvith himself, and ruminated upon vvwhat his Princess vvrites; he looked if there vvvere any more vvithin the book. But, alas, he found that vvvhich he expected not; it vvvas a Letter from Mazares to the King of Assiria, and thus ended.

Mazares Prince of Saces to the King of Assiria.

I Vvill now no longer conceal my Crime, but vvwill ingeniously discover unto you how great it is: I have not only been vvperfidious unto you, but have also vvdeluded her, vvvhom of all the vvworld I most adore, vvvhich is, the Princess Madana: She thinks I endeavour to lessen her misfortunes, vvvhilst my Aimes are only for my self. In short, my sinne is against her as vvwell as you, and it vvproves also against my self, since for ought I see, all my endeavours are ineffectuall. But vvwhat should I do? It vvvas Love constrain'd me, and I must obey. If you be truly Noble you vvwill pity me, vvwithout any thoughts of revenge, unless upon your Self as well as me. Yet I must tell you, that I shall be sufficiently Punished by Mandana, as long as Artamenes keeps such strong possession of her heart, and denies admittance unto you, unto me, and unto all the Princes in the world, except him: It is against the Law of perfect Generosity, to punish me for that crime, of which your self is guilty. Mazares.

What's this I see? said Artamenes; I expected to finde a friend, and in the turning of an eye, I have found a Rivall: and a Rivall too who perhaps has used my Name, and abus'd my Princess in conveying her away, she supposing it to be my design, which he transacts for himself: But most Glorious Princess; can I hope for so much blessedness, as to be enter'tained into your heart, as Mazares thinks? If it be true; then I am the most happy; and the most unhappy man, both together, that ever breath'd: happy in having that Honour which all the Princes in the world cannot deserve; and unhappy in having a Title unto that Treasure which I cannot possess. Capritious Fortune which orders all occurrences, does never afford me any good, but she makes me more resentive of it by a deprivation; as if sweets would not relish unless I tasted the bitter also: I should never have known, that I was thus Loved, unless by the extremity of my misfortunes I had been thus brought to hate my life and wish my death. Whilst he was in these Contemplations, one came and told him, that no Intelligence could be learnt all along the Sea coast, concerning that Galley in which the Princess was: this gave him some hopes to mingle with his fears of her shipwrack, and did so elevate his spirits, that he admitted of the company of his Commanders in the Army, who followed him. Hidaspes, Chrisantes, Aglatidas, Araspes, Feraulas and Thrasibulus that famous Greek, all came into his Chamber; where Artamenes entertained the last of these more particularly, and told him how sorry he was, that he could not so readily as he desired, Page 11 furnish him with Ships; but if it were so, that his designs at Sea were only to secure himself from his enemies (as some had formerly hinted unto him) then he would promise him a safe Sanctuary in the Court of the King of Medes; and did further oblige himself to remit him unto his former estate, as soon as he had found out the Princess his Daughter. Thrasibulus returned him most humble thanks, for this obliging offer, and accepted of it, since this was all he was able to do for the present. The valour, and winning qualities of Artamenes, had possessed this mans soul with so much Love, ever since he first knew him, that this happy meeting proved an Antidote unto him against his former misfortunes. After Artamenes had thus honoured him, he went out with him and all the rest of the Officers into the streets of the Town, where the fire was quite quenched, yet all the rude rubbish remained; the sad sights which every where appeared, great beams half burnt, whole houses quite demolisht, and such lamentable objects, infused such melancholy imaginations into them all, as it was impossible to think of any thing but sadness in a place so dismally dismantled: there they saw some men searching for their Treasure which was buried among the cinders of their houses. Others, who were composed of a more tender disposition, were raking among the ruins, for the bones of their burned kindred and Friends. Artamenes was much mov'd with these mournfull spectacles; he commiserated and comforted all he met, and promised unto the Inhabitants in generall, that notwithstanding their Rebellion, he would move the King to rebuild their Town. Feraulas then presented a man unto him who brought a Letter from the King of Assiria; He took the Letter, broke open the Seal, and reading it in a low voice unto himself, found these words.

The King of Assiria unto Artamenes.

I Commend your scrupulous virtue, which would not permit you to make use of your generosity: Doubtless you could not well have consented unto the Liberty of your Prisoner who desired it, unless you had failed in that duty which you owe unto the King of Medes: As I will be just to you, be not you unjust to me, nor blame a Prince who had not made an escape, had you trusted him upon his Parole; nor can he think he hath committed a Crime, since he escaped your Guards with intentions to endeavour the delivery of our Princess. To testifie unto you that in breaking my Prison I have not broken the Conditions of our Treaty, I do here promise you again, that I will advertise you of all Passages, and that I will make no war upon the King of Medes, but afford him some Auxiliaries: And that which is most difficult for me to perform, I promise you not to speak a word more of my affection to the Princess, though it should be my happy fate to deliver her; nor will I think it was your neglect which gave me my Liberty; Keep Promise with an Enemy if you would have him keep Promise with you.

The King of Assiria.

Artamenes read this Letter with a double resentment both of joy and sorrow; he was well pleas'd with the King of Assirias Promises, for the Princess might as soon fall into the hands of Labinet as his; but on the other side it much griev'd him, that he should, in the face of all the peoole, receive such a Letter from the King of Assiria as he must not shew unto Cixares, for many reasons therein contained, and therefore he would not impart it unto any. When he was come into his Chamber, he took a leaf made of the bark of Cedar, or some such like (for the Ancients were not acquainted with Paper,) and writ these words.

Artamenes, to the King of Assiria.

I Will never fail where once I Promise, but shall account it as a due Debt, which must and shall be paid: Be confident, that I will punctually Perform every circumstance which was agreed upon between us; I wish we were now in a Condition to dispute the Prize of which I am unworthy, which yet none shall ever enjoy but by the death of Artamenes.

Page 12 When this Letter was sealed, he gave it unto the same man who brought the other; who drawing neerer, whispered him in the ear, and told him how he had Command from the King of Assiria to acquaint him, that if he had any occasion to send unto him, he was retired unto Pteria, a Town whereof Aribees had been Governour, as well as of Sinope, and that it was now committed unto his fidelity: After this the man departed. Artamenes went out also, and continued his walk round the Town; he went unto the Temple which he most precisely viewed, since it was the place where first began his Love: upon his departure from thence, not well knowing whither he went, or what he did, he continued his course along the Sea side, where the Galley which conveyed away his Princess did once stand: whilst he continued his melancholy walk, with his two faithfull Companions in all his Adventures, the wise Chrisantes, and the valiant Feraulas, Was ever time so ill imploy'd (said he to them) as since we came to Sinope? It is impossible to be more tost and crost with multitudes of sad events, then we have been: The time is tedious also in consideration of the small or no utility which any of our transactions have produced ever since: I came with hopes to relevee my Princess, and alas, I finde her in most eminent and dreadfull danger, where I cannot bring her any Assistance: When I gave any credit unto those fears which seised upon my soul, then was I ready to cast my self into the flames and be reduc't to ashes, as well as the Town: on the other side, when I rows'd up my soul, what pains did I take to relevee my Princess? I fight, I quench the flames, and puzzle my self, but when all is done, in lieu of my Princess, I finde her Ravisher, and finde him in such a condition as I cannot take revenge, without a stain unto mine honour: And then again, I finde another new Ravisher of my Princess, and in such a place as is inaccessible: Presently, I finde my Rivall Prisoner make an escape, and must pray for Mazares, whose ruin I desire. Oh Destinies, cruell Destinies, who order all our Fortunes, I beseech you, make me either absolute happy, or absolute miserable; and toss me not continually between hopes and fears, between life and death. S^r (said Chrisantes unto him) after so many misfortunes which you have either suffered or prevented, you must hope to surmount them all: And it is to be hoped (added Feraulas,) after all these cross events, Fortune will be weary of her obstinacy and give over. During all this time, the Heavens were clear, the wind soft, and the Sea serene; the waves dash gently upon the banks, and in a calm temper seem'd to be obedient unto that Supream Power which prescribed them their limits. Artamenes was much pleased with this Halcion serenity; he was as much transported with Joy as the Ravisher himself could be. In conclusion, he looked along the Sea side, and saw many People assembled together, who by their busie actions did seem to be much amazed: Artamenes was exasperated with much Curiosity, and changling colour upon a sudden, What can this People be doing, said he to Chrisantes and Feraulas? S^r, answered they, Perhaps they are Fishers, and are untangling and drying their Nets upon the shore: whilst they were walking towards them, Feraulas spied upon the water side, some wreck of a Ship, but beckned unto Chrisantes, not to take any notice of it unto their Master, who was so intent upon those Men by the Sea side, that he took no notice of what Chrisantes and Feraulas had seen; yet he had hardly gone twenty paces further, but turning his eye towards the water which was upon his left hand, alas he saw it all covered with broken planks intermingled with Cordage and other wreck, and amongst the rest a dead Corps. Oh what horror did Artamenes apprehend? he stood stone still; lookt upon the wreck, viewed the Corps; gaz'd upon Chrisantes and Feraulas, and durst not move a step further towards those Men, who were not above forty paces from him, fearing to finde there the dead Corps of his dearest Princess. Feraulas seeing him in this perplexity, said unto him, What S^r; do you think there was no Ship upon the vast Ocean but this, that you should be thus troubled at it? Do you not consider, that shipwrack is a thing most common? This is the cause of my grief, answered unhappy Artamenes; if these misfortunes were Rare, I should not fear so much. Then, maugre all his apprehensions, he drew neerer those Mariners, whose trade it was to look for wreck, and thrive by the misfortunes of others: Artamenes enquired of them, what they knew concerning this fatall accident; one of them answered, that they supposed it to be some Galley which perished this last night in the tempest, as might be conceived by what the Sea brought to the shore, and by what they had collected from a handsome and well fashioned Man who was taken up and carried into a Cabbin some hundred paces from the shoar, and who violently refused all those assistances which we endeavour'd to afford them: Artamenes without any further inquisition, went to the Cabbin, where he found them all officious to help this half-dead Man: he presently knew him to be Mazares, for he had often seen him at Babilon in the Court of Nitocris, Mother to the Page 13 King of Assiria, so that he perfectly knew him to be the Ravisher of Mandana: He lay upon a bed more drown'd in tears than water of the Sea, and more changed by his despair, then by shipwrack. This dejected Prince, did sometimes lift his eyes up to Heaven, and sometimes cast them down upon a rich Scarf which he held in his hand, and which Artamenes did know to be the scarf of Mandana, because she had heretofore refused him the Honour to bestow it upon him. This sight had such a sad operation upon the heart of Artamenes, as he resolved to live no longer: But when sorrow had silenc'd his Tongue, he understood that Mazares who seem'd to be at his last gasp and striving to speak, cried out as loud as his weakness would permit; Oh miserable remainder of my fair Princess, why did I not perish with her, since I could not preserve her? Alas, alas, what do you do unto me? why do you shew me the mournfull Reliques of my unfortunate Princess, whom I have destroyed? On ye Gods who guide our Destinies, and are not ignorant of my endeavours to preserve her, why did not you assist me? At this Artamenes drawing neerer, whose Grief, Anger, Rage, Despair and Love, would not permit him to resolve, whether he should kill this more than half dead man, or no; or whether he should charge him with his Crime, or further inform himself how this fatall Accident happened. Sometimes he was in that cruell resolution; and sometimes he would Question him: Sometimes he would lament his Princess, and sometimes accuse the Gods; sometimes he would kill his Rivall, and sometimes himself; his Tears and Lamentations would sometimes break forth whether he would or no, and that so passionately, as Mazares understood who he was, by some who pronounced the Name of Artamenes. He then turned himself with as much precipitance, as a man in his feeble condition could do; and beholding Artamenes with a most pitifull and resentive aspect; Is it you, said he, who was the most happy Man in the affection of a great Princess, and whom I have made the most unfortunate by her ruine? Is it thou (answered Artamenes with a heart wounded through with woe) who by thy injurious act, has undone the world, and deprived it of Her who vvas the fairest and most illustrious in it? It is I, replied the unfortunate Prince, with his eyes drown'd in tears, who am the same unworthy wretch you speak of; and vvho would immediatly punish my self for it, if I had but strength enough; but death I hope ere long will do it for me: me thinks I finde you too calm; I should be obliged unto you, if your hand vvould undertake that office. Those vvho first found me floating upon the wa|ter, I beleeve, do know I did not much court them to preserve me; for it is infinitely against my vvill to live after the death of this divine Princess. But is it certain, said Artamenes, that the Princess is dead? did you see her perish? did you use all your power to preserve her? did you not part from her? did you see her in the water? did you see her dead? I saw her upon the Galley (answered the said Mazares,) I saw her fall into the Sea, and I cast my self after her; I took hold upon her by this Scarf, and held her up a long time upon the waves; but oh ye cruell Gods, one rowling billow unloos'd this fatall Scarfe, and parted us, so that I could never see her more: Ask me no more after this what I did, or vvhat I thought, for I desired death, and freely bequeathed my self unto the waves, not valuing my life at any rate; and at last I vvvas found floating upon the water, by these charitable men who brought me into this Cabbin: Now Artamenes, you have all I can inform you of: Here, unhappy Prince, said he, take this Scarf, which more belongs to you than me; I desire nothing in this world, but the glory to die by your hand, if you would please to honour me so much; Malzares pronounced these last words so faintly, that every one thought him dying. Artamenes seeing him in this sad condition, took the Scarf, which feebly fell from the hand of this faint Prince; and he went away from this despicable weak enemy, who was not worthy of his Revenge, having too sadly satisfied his Curiosity. He dolefully droopt, as he walked along the Sea side, being followed by Chrisantes and Feraulas, who observed as they went whether they could espie any thing belonging unto this dead Princesse: He commanded the Mariners to go all along the shore, and among the Rocks, to see what they could discover: Never was man in so pitifull a plight as poor Artamenes. Chrisantes and Feraulas had not hearts to speak unto him; nor did he himself know that they were near him: He low'd, and look't upon the water, supposing every thing he saw to be the dead Corpse of his dear'est Princesse: he would sometimes stride a most precipitate pace, then upon a sudden stop, and stand in a deadly dump: after he had in vain walked very long by the water side, he stept upon a small Rock which stretched it self a little into the Sea, to see if the waves would restore unto him that which they had taken away; and commanding every one to continue their Quest, their remained none with him but Chrisantes and Feraulas, who, say what he could, would not leave him: But alas, what lamentable expressions did poor Artamenes utter? Page 14 What did he think? Am I not, said he, the most unlucky man that ever lived? Can a more horrid torment be imagined than this, which by the Tyranny of my Fate I now endure? Ah my fairest Princesse, was it the intentions of the gods only to shew you upon the earth? Did they make you to be the wonder of the world, and must not we all adore you? Ah! alas, alas, ye furious fatall flames, (cried he out looking upon the Town, whose ruines might be seen far off) what cause have I to curse you for the losse of my unparalleled Princesse? I know too well it was your opposite element which gave me my dire and dismall losse; yet merciless though you be, you would have left me her precious ashes, that so mine might have had the glory to be mixed with them: but the rigour of my fate is such, that this inexorable element of water will not render me my Princesse either alive or dead, although it is her will to save the life of her Ravisher and my Rivall: Had the fates left this Rivall in such a state, as I might without blemish unto my honour have satisfied my revenge, it had been some light consolation amidst my grand misfortunes: But this barbarous Element retains my Princesse and saves my Rivall, only to tell me the sad news how he saw her in inevitable danger, and left her in the arms of death; that he saw her in such resentments of me, as I durst never hope for, and at last lost his tongue, so that I could gather from him nothing but despair. You have this comfort yet remaining (said Chrisantes) that he could not say he saw her dead, that ultimate and fatall syllable was not yet pronounced: Also it may rationally be hoped (added Feraulas) that the same fate which followed Mazares might also follow her; and haply hers much better than his, for she hath no reason to wish her own death like him: yes Sir, it may very well be she lives, and hath no sad resentments but of you. Ah Chrisantes, ah Feraulas (cried he out) this poor pittance of hope which remains at the root of my heart, may chance to cause a greater evil. Yet if this were not, you might be sure, my Friends, that without any further cries, or tears, or sighs, I would presently follow my most adored Mandana, there is not any thing but this faint hope which restrains me: And though it be a good Preservative, and a cordial Antidote against all misfortunes, yet it is too weak to hinder me, if I once were fully perswaded my Princesse were perished: Alas Chrisantes, me thinks I see her in the Sea how disdainfully she receives help from her Ravisher: Methinks I see that boisterous wave take her from him, who when he he had ruin'd her, would then too late preserve her: Me thinks I see the waves (oh ye gods what should I say, what should I think?) smother her, and sink her to the bottome of the Sea. I saying so, tears did flow: He kist the Scarf with profound sorrow, and sadly said, Oh thou which heretofore was the height of my ambition to wish for, and thought thee the greatest honour I durst presume to aspire unto; I could never beleeve that I should re'sent thee with so much sadness: All I desire from thee now is, to inspire me with courage enough to vanquish those who are enemies unto my King and my Princess. I look upon thee now as a motive unto my memory of Mandana, which will double my despair, and hasten my death. Now Chrisantes, said he, do you not now wonder at the odde contrivances of my humorous fate? that I should receive more testimonies of my divine Mandana's affection to me, from my Rivall then from her self? Her severe vertue did distribute her favors with so much wisdom and reservednesse, that I my self could never presume of so much happinesse: as I understood from the King of Assiria, from Mazares his Letter, from Malzares himself, and from Mazares dying, who all do tell me I had a greater sharer in her heart, then ere I could hope for; But oh ye gods why do you afford me so great a blisse, so much certainty of her affection, since she in whose election my felicity consists, is not in a condition to love, and since I must abandon life, hope, and all which can be called happy? After he had thus vented his sorrow, he was a while silent, sometimes looking up on the Sea, sometimes whether those he had sent to search were returned; and sometimes casting his sad eyes upon the Scarf, Chrisantes seeing the day was much spent, would perswade him to walk towards the Town, because the day was far spent. This reason, though it had argument enough in it to perswade him, yet it could not have caused him to remove, if he had not seen at a good distance off Thrasibulus, Araspes, Aglatides, Hidaspes, and many others coming towards him, who out of civility did retire, to give him the liberty of enjoying his thoughts, but after they had a reasonable time absented themselves, they drew near; he no sooner saw them but he rise up, and looking upon Chrisantes and Feraulas, said, What shall I do to perswade these men that my Passion for the Princesse is for her, as the daughter of Cixares, and not as the Mistresse of Artamenes? happily you may (said he unto them) but certainly, my friends I cannot; I know if Mandana could appear at this nstant she would command it, and would charm my tears; as soon as he had spoken, Thrasibulus Page 15 and all the company came near, so that he became silent and met them. They percei'ved some odde adventure had chanced, and because he was infinitely beloved of all, especially those who had neer relations unto him, they changed countenances also, and did participat of that grief whereof they knew not the cause; They were ignorant of it a good while, and it was a very very death unto Artamenes to tell them: Feraulas saved him the labour, and by a short relation told them the sad news; he was very brief, lest if he should aggravate the matter, Artamenes would not be able to contain himself, but would give too many testimonies of what he desired to conceal. Thrasibulus lamented the losse as much as possible; Hidaspes being more concerned as having interest in the house of Cixares was deeply perplexed; Araspes also did sadly resent it; Aglatidas who naturally was of a Melancholy Composition, did best sympathize with sorrow, and was so sad as if he had a particular interest in the Princesse. Artamenes who thought the Town would be a better umbrage for his grief then where they were, because he might ret <...> unto his Chamber under pretence of writing unto Cixares, therefore he walked on, giving order into Feraulas, to take them which came with Thrasibulus, and go seek out for intelligence either of the safety or losse of the Princesse: All the way he passed to the Town he observed much silence; Mean while, every one got information of the accident: There was an universall condolement for the Princesse, and of those eminent excellencies in her; Her amazing beauty; her transcendency of spirit, and her Divinity of soul: Some lamented the King her Father, and his sad resentments: Others sorrowed that such an illustrious Race as the King of Medes should extinguish in the Princesse by so fatall a Chance. In short, they all lamented; and amongst them all none knew who had least cause to complain; Hidaspes speaking to Chrisantes, said unto him; This accident makes me remember what grief the King of Persia my Master resented, when he first received the sad news of young Cyrus his shipwrack, who as you know better then I, was a Prince of the most superlative hopes in the world; and unquestionlesse Cixares will be as sensible of the Princesse his daughters misfortune, as Cambises was of that Prince his sons. I did extreemly lament that losse, for though I was not so nearly concerned as the King his Father, yet I could not chuse but as much bewail him: Chrisantes diverting this Discourse, said unto the sad Artamenes, that happily the messenger whom he should send unto Cixares, would finde him forward in his march, he having mustered together his men when he came away, with intentions to follow presently after. Aglatidas, whose thoughts were all compos'd of Love and Melancholy, addressing his Speech unto Artamenes, I assure you, said he, although I be the subject of Cixares, and by consequence an enemy unto the King of Assiria: yet I cannot chuse but pity the last, as one who when he shall hear of this sad accident will think himself the most undone man upon earth; for (said he) though he was not beloved, yet he was a Lover, and love doth so exceed all the other resentments, which either nature, reason, or friendship can give, that there is no comparison between them. As for my part, said he, if in heu of a Lover who was hated, as the King of Assiria was, I should know a Lover which was beloved, who had such a losse, I am perswaded my very pity of him would endure unto my death. But as the vertue of the Princesse was too reserved to expresse any affection unto any one, therefore I must needs lament the King of Assiria, who indeed really deserves it. Artamenes was too much troubled to answer unto this urgent Discourse, and though he had power to restrain his tears, yet he had not enough to stop his sighs; he only told Aglatidas that the Princesse was so full of all admirable virtues, as that all who knew her did adore her; and therefore all those who had that happinesse must needs lament her, whether Medes, Persians, or Assyrians. Then Artamenes, because he grew weary of all company, did go some thirty paces before all the rest. Mandana was the subject of every ones discourse, but of Artamenes grief. Every one commended the affection, which Artamenes bore unto the King his Master. Although that sad accident had as sad an influence upon them all; yet some amongst them had never seen the Princesse, and some again had never been in Love, so that a vast difference might be observed between their losse and his, and they were ignorant of the main principal cause of his grief. When they were come into the Town, Artamenes went into his Chamber, and dismissing all his attendants, remained sadly by himself alone, entertaining nothing but despair, by calling to memory all his dire disasters: He took Mandan's scarffe, which he found in the hands of miserable Mazares, and lock't it in his Cabinet; but all his care in keeping it was rather an addition unto his despair, then any consolation to him in his sorrows: And to augment his injury he recalled into memory every sleight favour that ever he had received from Page 16 his Princesse. This great soul, whose thoughts had never any reflexion but upon Heroic atchievements, did upon this occasion permit the Idea, of so many hardy combats, so many victorious battles, and so many glorious triumphs as he had obtained, to come afresh into his imagination, to the end his despair might be more excusable, and that they might better colour the weakness which he should discover in this adventure: he resented all his atchievements, as performed in the service of that Mistresse whom now he thought not to be in this world. The memory of these were great additions unto his misery; if it can be conceived possible any addition can be unto a sorrow, which from the first resentment was extream and unsupportable. He could not resolve with himself, whom he should send to carry this sad news unto the King of Medes, and far lesse could he resolve to tell the dismall story with his own mouth. In such confus'd and anxious thoughts did he passe away all that night, as he could not determine any thing upon it. In the morning, Feraulas coming to him, Artamenes asked him what news of Mazares, and whether he recovered that weaknesse wherein last night he left him. Let some run, said he, to know; and if he be able, let him be brought hither: he gave this order very hastily, not knowing almost what he said; but a while after, news was brought, that the Fishermen in whose Tent Mazares lay, did report, that Mazares never revived out of that sound in which Artamenes saw him, but died immediately after his departure out of the Tent. The report of his death infused various imaginations unto Artamenes; He admired divine justice in destroying a Prince whom he knew to be most criminall, and murmured against those rigid gods for ruining a Princesse whom he knew most innocent: And as his spirits were wholly taken upon with the grandure of his losse, so he made no strict inquisition concerning the Funerals of Mazares: The very thoughts of this Ravisher were so tormenting to him, that he did quite obliterate his memory. Amidst these restless thoughts, news was brought, that it was supposed Cixares was upon his march, with all his Army, near the Town; for a great thick dust rising out of a Valley was discovered from the top of the Tower, which could be nothing else but the march of his Troops. This news did much surprise Artamenes, but much more, when he saw Andramias arive, who informed him that within a little more then an hour Cixares would be in Sinope: Artamenes then began to bestir himself, and so discreetly, that he was in some hopes to hide part of his sorrow: he commanded all the Officers to draw up into Bateria; he mounted himself on horseback, and was followed by Thrasibulus, Hidaspes, Chrisantes, Araspes, and Aglatidas; he marched to meet the King, who when he was within the sight of Sinope, left his Army, and marched in the company of the King of Phrygia, of the King of Hircania, of Persodes Prince of the Caducians, of the Prince of Paphlagonia, of the Prince of Licaonia, of Gobrias, Gadates, Timocrates, Artabases, Madates, and Adusias, who were Persians and Grandees amongst the Homotimens, like as Hidaspes and Chrisantes, who accompanied Artamenes; Never was meeting more sad then this; Cixares seeing the Town so ruin'd, could not chuse but sigh; Artamenes seeing Cixares, unto whom he must be a Messenger of such sorrowfull news, had not the heart to move towards him, yet stirring a little, and the King coming very fast, they were presently within thirty paces of each other. Then Artamenes, and all who accompanied him, alighted, and went on foot to meet the King. Artamenes, notwithstanding his sorrow, presented Thrasibulus unto him; then Cixares giving them all his hand to kisse, commanded them to Mount; And calling Artamenes unto him, he began to discourse of their transactions in generall; and to aggravate their misfortunes he told Artamenes that he understood Mazares had carried away his daughter. S', said sad Artamenes, you will think your self more unfortunate when you shall know that Mazares lives not, and that it may be—At these words Artamenes pensively paus'd, and could tell no further. Ciaxares looking upon him with a moved aspect, said to him, What, Artamenes, have you any more ill news yet to tell me? S', answered Artamenes, the news is so very bad, I dare not tell it; I beseech your Majesties patience untill we arrive at the Town, before you be further informed; for your sorrows will be lesse seen in your Closet then in the open field; Ciaxares wondred at his dark discourse, and looking him in the face, he perceived such signs of sorrow in his eyes, that he durst not presse him any more to relate that which rather then his life he desired to know, lest if he found what he feared to be true, he should discover too much weakness before all these illustrious Prin[ces]: He gaz'd in the eyes of Artamenes, and consulted with his own reason, and winded all his own thoughts to guesse at it: but it was easie to be perceived by Artamenes his deportment, and by his silence, that he much feared to relate all he knew, and Ciaxares durst not enquire of that whereof he was ignorant: Mean while, those which came with Ciaxares, Page 17 and they who came with Artamenes talking together, the Accident was divulged amongst them: The sad news caused many murmurs and mourning exclamations amongst them; so that the noise reaching the ears of Ciaxares, he knew well enough there was some strange adventure happened, which he must know: Being come to the Town, the souldiers which Artamenes brought with him, observing the orders which they received, made a guard for the King to passe through, and though Ciaxares did extreemly long to satisfie his curiosity, yet would not before all the world, but silently went on till he came to the Castle: As for his Army, he ordered it to incamp in the valley, which was between a great Hill and the Town, and which was spacious enough to lodge them, though they were a hundred Thousand men. The King was no sooner lighted, but Artamenes conducted him unto the best Chamber of the Castle; he was no sooner there, but he carried him into a Closet; Come my Dear Artamenes, said he to him, what strange news have you to relate, which yet I have not been acquainted with? This demand did much surprise Artamenes, yet seeing there was no remedy, he was constrained to acquaint him with the Princesse sad fortunes; he could not contain but his tears went before his tongue; Ciaxares seeing his tears trickle down his cheeks, said to him, What would your tears tell me Artamenes? Is my Daughter dead? Then Artamenes with a profound sadness, told him in few words all he knew concerning Mandana's shipwrack: The report struck Ciaxares to the soul; Never did Father expresse more tendernes and grief for a daughter then he. Artamenes seeing he might now well weep it out, and not be observed by Ciaxares, who was blinded with his own tears, began, and continued it so long, as never was sight more sad; he spoke not a word to Ciaxares by way of comfort, neither could Ciaxares finde any fault with the tears of Artamenes. Was there ever (said this mourning Father) any Prince more unhappy then I? Could not I have foreseen my misfortune, by so many Oracles, told unto Astiages, that the Scepter which he bore and left unto me, should ere long be transferred into the hands of a stranger? might not this ere long be transferred into the hands of a stranger; might not this have informed me, that I having but one daughter should inevitably lose her? Alas, Astiages turmoiled himself himself, and turned every stone to destroy them who might usurp the Crown; but he never dreamt of preserving her who should lose it in losing her life! Is there no hope remains? Is it certain, said he, she is quite gone for ever? Well well, said he, my Dear innocent daughter shall not die unrevenged: The gods who have punished Mazares one of her Ravishers, hath taught me what I shall do unto the King of Assiria: He shall die, he must, and that immediately. As he is the cause that the Illustrious race of the Fam'd Dejoca is extinct in the person of my Daughter, so shall the King of Assiria's also extinguish in his own. The gods, no not the very gods shall prevent his death, nor mitigate my fury: Artamenes amazed at this expression, said, S', did you not meet with him whom I sent to acquaint you with the King of Assiria's escape? What do you say Artamenes, that the King of Assiria is—(replied he angrily) I say Sir (said he) that I sent one to acquaint you with the King of Assiria's escape; how (replied Ciaxares angrily) is not he in my power? Is he at liberty? Ah no no, it cannot be; I cannot beleieve he is gone; I cannot easily think Artamenes will suffer a prisoner of such a consequence to escape. It is too true (answered Artamenes faintly) It was my ill and his good fortune to escape my guards: But, Sir, said he, let not this trouble you so much; for if it were as easie for me to regain the Princesse, as it is to give you the death of the King of Assiria, your desires should have satisfaction: Ciaxares was not pleased with this Reply, and though he alwaies loved Artamenes, and had great obligations towards him, nor did he ever entertain the least suspicion of his fidelity; neither did he beleieve this accident proceeded from any other ground then from his negligence and providence; nor yet could he in all his transactions accuse him of the least fault, yet he resented this escape but odly, and went out of the Closet without speaking one word. Then finding all the Commanders and Grantees who followed him in the Chamber, he dis[course]d unto them concerning his lamentable losse with much constancy, though with much sorrow, and every one of them according to their several relations, did testifie how they shalred in his misfortune with him, alwaies hinting unto him that as long as the Corps was unfound, there was some hopes remaining: As for Artamenes he retired a while into another Chamber, where several Complements passed between him and all the Princes which came with Ciaxares, for they all honoured and esteemed of him as much as of the King whom they served: Mean while, Ciaxares was very desirous to have all the passages concerning the King of Assiria's escape to be made more apparent unto him: he understood that Artamenes ordered Araspes to command the Guard over the King of Assiria, and that Araspes was Page 18 one whom Artamenes loved; yet do what he could, he could not discover that Artamenes had any consent in his escape: But amongst those who came with the King there was one who was an intimate friend of Aribees; this man when he understood that Aribees was dead, entertained much hatred against Artamenes, who finding out by chance that the King of Assiria had writ unto him, acquainted Ciaxares with it: Ciaxares sent immediately for Artamenes; he no sooner saw him but he asked him very sharply, why he did not acquaint him how the King of Assiria did write unto him concerning his escape: Artamenes was much startled at this Question, because the Letter contained such matter as must not be made known, and stood a good while before he answered: at last he told Ciaxares that it was not strange he should forget a thing of so poor importance as that, since he had so many passages of sad concernment to acquaint him withall: and since the letter contained nothing but how the King of Assiria told him he had not transgressed the Laws of generosity in making an escape, since he was not trusted upon his Parole: We shall be better satisfied, said Ciaxares, by the Letter it self then by words. Sir, replied Artamenes, I should most willingly satisfie you, but as I was walking yesterday by the Sea-side, hearkening after news of the Princes, I unfortunately lost it, and I suppose it fell into the water: Artamenes made this answer so coldly that it moved Ciaxares to tell him roughly contrary to his custome, that he thought this chance very strange, and in plain terms that the managing of this businesse did not please him. Artamenes, who bore much reverence unto him as the Father of his Princesse, and who knew he had reason to say as much as he did, therefore he did silently withdraw, and because Ciaxares turned his back, and would hear no more, he went out of the room. Night being come, some Commanders retired to the Camp: All the Princes were lodged in the Castle, and fairest Houses of the Town, which the Fire had spared; Ciaxares did passe over the night with restlesse minde, but Artamenes much more, who besides his own Passions did participate of the Kings, notwithstanding his jealousy and rough deportment towards him. It seems Fortune observes no mean, neither in her favour nor her frowns, but exalts her Favourite unto the highest top of felicity; and sinks those whom she is displeased with into a Gulf of misery: Thus she dealt with Artamenes, who now seem'd to faint under the pressure of this disastrous accident, and thought himself and his honour deeply concerned. The next morning Ciaxares sent for him into his Closet: When he was come, there appear'd more anger then grief in his Countenance, which plainly told Artamenes there was some fresh misfortunate storm arising; but as the state stood with him, he valued his life and his death at the same rate, and was indifferent whether of them should be his fate. The violences of Ciaxares, and his angry looks did not much trouble him, but he reverently asked him if he would command him any service; Ciaxares answered, yes, he would see the Letter which the King of Assiria writ to him; And looking upon him with eyes full of anger; Look you Artamenes, said he, see how innocent you are of the King of Assiria's escape; expound unto me this mysterious Riddle which I cannot understand. Artamenes was wonderfully astonished at it, because he saw it was the same Letter which he writ unto the King of Assiria, and which he gave unto that man who brought the King of Assiria's Letter unto him, yet to be better satisfied, he opened it, and read the very same words verbatim which he had written. As he was reading, he often changed colour, and was as long about it as he could be possible, thinking in the mean time for some handsome reply; for he plainly saw that if he did not ingenuously paraphrase upon the Letter, his honour would receive a great blemish, since it would seem, as if he had been perfidious unto his Master, and held correspondency with his enemy: On the other side, he thought, that if he should discover his love, then he should too much traduce the honour of his Princesse, which he valued at a higher rate then his own. Ciaxares who had not yet sounded him to the bottom, was displeased at his long silence. What look you for Artamenes (said he unto him) in that Letter? Is it for some fine excuse you are so long pumping? Speak I say, and explain what you have writ from the first to the last syllable; In saying so, he took the Letter out of Artamenes hands, who all this while behav'd himself with much reverence; S', said he unto Ciaxares, if I could produce the King of Assiria's Letter, your Majesty might see I am not so guilty as you suppose me; nor that these compacts between us are of such a strain as you imagine: If you be not faulty, then inform me better, said Ciaxares, supposing he had some secret reasons in his heart which happily might justifie him: Ciaxares opening the Letter read aloud what Artamenes had writ, and looking sternly upon him; How expound you these words, said he unto him,

I will never fail where once I promise, but shall account it as a due debt, which must and shall be paid; be confident, I will punctually perform every circumstance which was agreed upon between us.

Speak Artamenes, said he, tell me what you have promised the King of Assiria: and in[deed] how could you promise him any thing without breach of duty to me? Sir, answered Artamenes, you know there hath been some small differences between the King of Assiria, and me. There is also some transactions between us, which do not at all concern your Majesty; And that the love of honour hath a long time made us Corrivals. Tell me then (said Ciaxares, asperating his speech) what colour can you glosse upon these words at the end of the Letter,

I wish we were in a condition to dispute for that prize of which I am most unworthy, yet, which none shall ever enjoy but by the death of Artamenes.

What proze is this Artamenes which is so dear unto you? I told you Sir, answered he, that glory and honour is the prize, and the only cause of all the differences and transactions which the King of Assiria hath, or ever shall have with Artamenes. It is for the first rank in point of valour, for which I will contend as long as I live. For my part, said Ciaxares, af[ter] all your plausible expositions, I cannot conceive what prize you should contend for, unlesse my Crown or my Daughter: and which of these soever it be, it makes you equally culpable; yes, and you Artamenes, much more in fault then the King of Assiria, since her quality may pretend to both; but your condition, by all appearances, is far below them. Sir (replied Artamenes faintly) by this argument, you may suppose that the King of Assiria would never contend with me about such a thing into which I could never pretend. You speak (replied the King) in a tone so dissonant unto your condition, that it doth rather confirm my jealousy then extenuate it; for though the King of Assiria be my enemy, yet he is a King, and in that respect you owe him more regard then is fitting for your Discourse: When I have a sword by my side (answered Artamenes who could no longer contain) it may be, I should make a King look about him as well as another man: you know some who can inform you whether I speak truth or no: and he whose part you scorn to take can tell you something, if he had not a very bad memory; I do not question your gallantry (said Ciaxares) nor make any doubt of your valour; but I have some cause to suspect your fildie <...> lity. Your Majesty needs not to doubt of either, if you did but know me well (said Artamenes to him.) It cannot be imagined his faith should be corrupted, who hath had so commanding a power as I have had: why then (replied the King) do you not make your actions more clear and intelligible, since you are so innocent? I beseech your Majesty (an[swered] me) Presse me no more to discover a thing which I neither ought nor can reveal: It is sufficient, said he, that the gods have so often employed my hand to support that Scepter unto which you think I pretend, and kept your Crown upon your head; Upbraid me not with your services (retorted Ciaxares angrily) for if you remember what once you were, and what now you are, you will acknowledge they have not been ill rewarded: I have remembered them too much, and if I had lost the memory of them, perhaps you had ere now lost your life: Consume no more time in contriving excuses to palliate your crime; I should be as glad as you, that you could purge your self from them. Sir, replied Artamenes, I am far from upbraiding you with my services; for they have been so inconsiderable, I should not so much as have thought upon them but in vindication of my injured Innocency. Can you produce any proof of your pretended Innocency, said Ciaxares to him; yes, answered Artameus, from arguments drawn from my virtue, if you were capable of knowing it. Well (Replied Ciaxares) you will not then discover unto me what this correspondence is which you hold with my Enemy and Ravisher of my daughter. Sir (answered the innocent Artamenes) you shall never know that Artamenes; this man whom it seems you know not; the man who as you are persuaded would betray you; the man whom once you loved, that this man did ever hold any intelligence or correspondence with your enemies. I shall in time make you confesse (replied Ciaxares) for it is apparent enough both by your Letter and your Discourse: and as the knowledge of every particular in this close conspiracy is necessary to my own safety, and good of my Kingdom; so perhaps, when you are in a close Prison, safer Page 20 then that wherein you kept the King of Assiria, then I say you may perhaps better inform me; Sir, answered Artamenes (without any passion or transportation:) Prisons and punishments compell Artamenes to reveal what he hath a minde to conceal. My prison shall thus far comfort me, that I have exchanged my sword for fetters in a time when your Majesty have no potent enemies to molest you; so that thus losing me, you have but lost an unprofitable Servant. I understand you very well, (replied Ciaxares in much choler) you can not forbear upbraiding me with your services; then going to the Chamber-door, he call'd for the Captain of his Guard, and commanded him to conduct him unto his Chamber, and keep him safe upon forfeiture of his life. The Captain who dearly loved Artamenes, and who knew how great a favourite he was, stood amazed at the command, not well knowing whether he should obey or no; and finding so sudden a Revolution in the fortune of one who the very day before was the only man in the Kingdom, and who ordered the destinies of Kings and Princes as he pleased, he was so confounded that he knew not what to do. But Artamenes observing his astonishment, Come (said he) let us go (giving him his sword) and pay this last service unto the King, thereby teaching the rest of his Subjects to obey with a willing minde more course commands then these: In saying so, he made low obeisance unto the King, and followed Andramias with as slow a motion as if he had been free. After this, the King commanded to secure Araspes, and was obeyed. It were a very difficult task to relate fully how Artamenes resented this passage, and what strange thoughts he apprehended. The King of Medes also had much reluctance for what he did: Artamenes did more wonder at the oddness of his Fate then lament it: The King repented almost every minute of what he had done: What shall I do, said he, with this offender who hath done me so much good service, and whom I loved so well, who hath stolen away the hearts both of my friends and enemies? this offender I say who all the world esteems, yet none knows where he was born; Who ever met with so crosse an accident? Can it be imagined that Artamenes by whose valour I have obtained so many Victories, and conquered so many Kings and Countries, should wound his honour with Treachery? On the other side, what can I conceive of this Letter, which puzzles him to explain, and the Crime is so great that his pretence and colours cannot hide his correspondence with the King of Assiria; No, no, said he, Artamenes is guilty: And though it be either in matter of love or matter of ambition, he is culpable, and deserves punishment. The worst is, loving him as I do, I shall grieve more for him then he will for himself; but said he suddenly, the sorrows which I resent for the losse of Mandana, will quite me from that of Artamenes: And my soul will be so sensible of the one, that there will be no room for the other. But let us use all expédients to bend this obstinate spirit: Let us do what we can to make him confesse his fault, that so we may have occasion of pardon. Whilst Ciaxares was thus arguing the matter with himself, Artamenes, whose amorous soul could not be separated from the memory of Mandana, was more troubled at her shipwrack then his prison; and entertain'd more sad apprehensions of her losse, then sorrow for his own: Do your worst, ye rigid destinies, said he, you cannot afflict me more; My soul is not sensible of any sorrow, but for Mandana, therefore I defie you: Multiply your penalties upon my Person, and I will not complain of your injustice. Since my Princesse wants a Tomb, it is no matter though I languish in a Dungeon, the worst is, it can but hinder me from a more high and generous death. Ah fairest Princesse, said he, whether you inhabit amongst the dead, or amongst the living, in heaven or upon earth, If you could but see the unhappy Artamenes in Caixares Prison, you would resent it with wonder and sorrow; However I complain not of his severity or injustice since I seem culpable in his eyes; and indeed I am so, but it is in a far different manner then he apprehends it. I am culpable Dearest Princesse, but it is against you, indeed I am, I confesse it, I am culpable in loving you, not as you are the daughter of the King of Medes, but as you are the fairest Angel that ever lived. As you are the daughter of a great King, it was lawfull for me to love you; But as you are Mandana, I must love you, and not reveal it; I must suffer and not complain; I must adore you in my death, and I must die dumb, and not speak a word of love: Yet alas Mandana, (cried he out) I fear, I am the cause of your dire misfortunes: for if I had not loved you, and your soul not possessed with any thoughts of grace towards me, then perhaps you might have plac'd your affection upon that great Monarch of the world, and without all these misfortunes have been Queen unto the King of Assiria: then, said he further, I should not have been so happy, in the glory of her Love, nor would you have had any thought of Artamenes, the unfortunate Artamenes, a lover whose observant passions never offended against the Laws of vertue, by any exorbitant desires; and whose obsequious soul was ever Page 21 obedient unto your will, whose life and death is consecrated unto your service: In sum of all, I will die (my Princesse) and never let Ciaxares know what the ground is of Artamenes correspondence with the King of Assiria. Think not this (my Divine Mandana) a small sacrifice which I am resolved to offer unto you in the carriage of this affair. The desire of glory is a Passion as well as Love; a passion most violent and imperious; yet for all that I must value the honour of my Princesse above it: What though Ciaxares think me perfidious, it is no matter, since I am not so; I know the King of Assiria, though my enemy, will vindicate me; and though he be my Corrivall, yet he will speak in my behalf: Beleeve on, Ciaxares, and think me a Traitor as long as you please, since you do not know the true state of the matter; for though my Princesse was most innocent, and her vertue had but too much strictnesse in so pure an affection, yet for all that Ciaxares and the censorious Court, it may be, will never beleeve that I could be so long disguised, without her consent. If I should discover who I am, it would more confirm Ciaxares in that opinion which he entertains, that I aspire unto the Crown, although I am not born so far from a Crown as he imagins: Alas, said he, how rigid are my destinies! I am afraid to justifie my self, though it be most naturall to do it: My fears to offend my Princess transcend my fears of infamy, although the fear of infamy should be above all other whatsoever, and though never any did more greedily thirst after glory then Artamenes: But why should I fear it as long as I have the Testimony of my own conscience, and the testimony of my most mortall enemy? The gods who are protectors of oppressed innocency will surely vindicate me after I am dead: They who now accuse me will then justifie me, by waies which I cannot apprehend. Truth in conclusion will be found the strongest: Whilst Artamenes and Ciaxares were thus tormented in their own melancholy resentments, all the Court and all the Army were thraged at the accident: The King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Cadusians, the Prince of Licaonia, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Hidaspes, Chrisantes, Aglatidas, Athribulus, Madates, Megabites, Adusius, Artabases and Feraulas; all these were wonderstruck at the imprisonment of Artamenes; and not only these Princes and Captains, but also all the Inhabitants of Sinope, and the whole Army, all these did ill resent it: As soon as the news was divulged, all the Kings, Princes, and Commanders, went unto the Lodging of Artamenes but were denied entrance; Ciaxares sent for them all, and told them that he was compell'd for the good of his affairs to arrest Artamenes, and commanded them to have a care that the souldiers who he knew loved Artamenes very well, did not mutiny: He told them that this transaction would conduce much to the safety of the State, and the good of all the Princes his Allies. This far fetcht Discourse made no impressions at all upon their spirits, but all of them unanimously did beseech him to act warily in this businesse of so great importance: You know Sir, said the King of Phrygia, and I do beleeve it an absolute impossibility, that Artamenes should betray you; you may remember Sir, that the time was when we were at variance, and I fully perswade my self if any such thing had been transacted by him I should have known it. The King of Hircania, seconded and said, it cannot sink into my belief that ever he can be guilty of any treasonable designs. No I warrant you, said Hidaspes, I would not beleeve it though he himself should say it. If my head would be accepted as a gage for his innocence, said Aglatidas, I would throw it at your Majesties feet: If so much innocency as he carries, about him, had half the Army for his accusers (said the Prince of the Cadusians) the army of Artamenes would confound them all if they should resist. I should shamefully belie my own eyes and my own knowledge, said the Prince of Licaonia, if I should witness against him. I do not think, said the Prince of Paphlagonia, that there can any one in the world be found who can or dare accuse him. I am his Complice, said Chrisantes, if he be criminall, and yet I am most certain that I am far from any treason: I have seen his soul stand firm, amidst the cloud of his misfortunes, and cannot think it should shrink in the Sun-shine of his prosperity: It is neither credible nor possible, cried Madates and Migabites both together: If your Majesty would ◇ be pleased to bring his accusers face to face, I should soon stop their mouths, said Feraulas: In short all these Princes and all the Captains one after another, and sometimes altogether, did strive who could plead with strongest arguments in behalf of this unfortunate, yet famous Artamenes: one put him in minde of his victories, another of his generosity; one extold his valour, another his fidelity: In conclusion, they all fell off from the reverence which they owed unto Ciaxares, because he would not allow Artamenes time to answer in his own defence: The King was then much transport'd with passion, and shewed unto them the Letter which Artamenes acknowledged to be his own hand, and said unto them in great fury, Look I pray you, whether he whom you so violently Page 22 defend be so innocent as you suppose him. The King of Phrygia read the Letter, and upon the first apprehension did think it a little odd, yet for all that he could not alter his minde, no more then all the rest which heard it: after they had a while considered, that appearances were fallacious, but no proofs; they all unanimously concluded, with one voice (though they could not well argue it) that still Artamenes was innocent; and that he was so considerable a Person, as though he were culpable, yet the King ought not to lose him upon a slight occasion. So we do apprehend it (answered Ciaxares,) yet notwithstanding, I would have you know, that in this juncture of time when the Souldier is insolent and ready to revolt, it is not safe to countenance turbulent spirits too much. When the Kings, Princes and Commanders, perceived the King so much in passion, they would press him no more: and the valour of Artamenes had made so perfect a purchase of all their hearts, and made them all either his very subjects or allies, therefore they would never quit their respect unto him, nor ever become unserviceable unto him whom they so much loved, as doubtless they had done, if they had exasperated that spirit, which was already too apt to kindle: Therefore they left Ciaxares to ruminate upon the matter, and gave him time to recollect what he had done, and what was best hereafter to be done. Mean while Chrisantes and Feraulas, upon their departure from the King; did vent a thousand Protestations in behalf of their Masters innocency, and stuck close to their resolutions of Constancy in his service; They protested to perish, rather then one of so high a soul should suffer such injuries: There was nothing they dur'd at but this Letter, and Artamenes had this good fortune, that every one beleeved there was some mysterious matter in it which he himself would clear. There was not one could beleeve him to be guilty, for there was no probability, that he should comply with that man whom he endeavoured to conquer, and whose Empire he strove to overthrow. The Officers had much to do to keep the Souldiers in order; they so tampered with them, that they left them in a disposition to be at Artamenes service when ever he should need them: they were glad to give them good language, and desire their patience, telling them that Artamenes would be presently at Liberty; and that if they should rashly go about to deliver him, it would make his Condition worse: so that mixing commendations of Artamenes with their plausible perswasions, they cherished them, and prevented their Revolt both together, and did suppress their violences which yet did not need, without losing their loves. But for all this, the whole Camp and all the Town did ring in his Commendations; the Name of Artamenes Echoed every where: the Medes; the Persians, the Cappadocians, the Phrygians, the Hircanians; the Cadusians, the Paphlagonians, and all other Nations whereof the Army was composed, all cried up Artamenes, and made Songs and Elegies every one in his own Language, and after his own Custom, in commendations of Artamenes, and who but Artamenes in every mouth? There was not a Captain in that vast Army, which vaunted not of some Honour which he particularly had received from Artamenes; nor was there a common Souldier which did not brag that Artamenes knew his Name and himself too: In summe, Artamenes was the subject of every ones discourse; every Souldier left the Camp, and went into the Town to learn how Squares went with Artamenes; and every Inhabitant of the Town went into the Camp, to incite the Souldiers in behalf of their beloved Generall Artamenes: there was not one to be found, only except this friend of Aribees, who transacted privately and prejudicially to Artamenes in incensing the King against him: Every one except him I say, was a well-wisher unto Artamenes.; It was this man, who had not only got knowledge that the King of Assiria had writ unto Artamenes; but it was he also who gave the Letter unto the King of Medes: Chrisantes and Feraulas did much admire which way Ciaxares could come by it: but Heaven which would have Crimes alwayes discovered, made it evident at the last, they much beat their brains, and turned every stone to finde it out, but could not. But thus it fortun'd; the Messenger whom the King of Assiria sent unto Artamenes, and by whom Artamenes returned this Letter in Answer unto the King of Assiria, did in his return back, meet with one who was Brother unto Aribees, who falling into discourse with this Messenger, asked him whether he travelled and from whence he came, and by degrees scrud out of him, what his business was: this Brother so tampered and suborned this Messenger, that he shewed unto him the Letter, and when he had read it, did by his permission copy it out: he also told the Messenger, that he might do a most excellent piece of service, not only unto all Medea, and all Cappadocia, but unto Asia also, and indeed unto all the World, if he would return back again to Sinope, and carry this Letter unto a friend of his who waited upon Ciaxares (the very same man who was so close an enemy unto Artamenes,) he further told this Messenger, that it would be a most acceptable piece of service unto the Page 23 King, so that he need not doubt of being largely rewarded: and that the King of Assiria who sent him, would also be much pleased at it, he having so great an interest in the ruin of Artamenes: and that the King of Assiria would be as well pleased with the Copy as the Originall, and that he himself would carry the Copy to the King of Assiria, whilst he did return unto Sinope, and carry the Originall unto this friend of his. He perswaded him not to scruple at the Ruin of an ambitious man, whose aims were at universall Monarchy; a man whom all men seem'd to love, but their loves did proceed from fear, so that if ever fortune should frown upon him, he would assuredly be ruin'd without recovery; and that all things would then look with new faces; and that those who were now in appearance his dearest friends, would then become his utter enemies; and that for his part he would be sure to have the benediction of all the world, if by his means this design were brought about, which though it was great, yet might safely be negotiated without any danger at all: for all the difficulty was in delivery of this Letter unto the King, and if that were done undiscovered, then all the peril were past. In short, this Brother or Aribeas, whose Name was Artaxes, did know well enough how to deal with him he spoke unto; so that giving a bag full of golden perswasions unto him, he gul'd this poor fully mercenary wretch, to do as he would have him. Artaxes writ unto his friend, how he had met with an admirable expedient to be revenged for the death of his Brother, and desired him by all means to put it into execution: and that for himself, he would go unto Pteria, a Town not far off Sinope, whether the King of Assiria was retired, and would transact with that Prince against Artamenes, and there wait upon the success of that design, which he had now committed unto him, not daring to appear at Court. This mercenary Messenger arrived at Sinope, found out that friend of Arabeas and Artaxes; found him disposed according unto his wish, and prosecuted the design so close, as he brought it unto that state wherein you finde it. It is a very remarkable passage; that this Messenger who was fully perswaded he should act an universall good unto all Asia, in Ruining Artamenes, did to his great astonishment finde, in lieu of a generall Joy, that he had caused an universall sadness; and how he had brought all things into so great a disorder and confusion, as it was hard to reduce them into their former tranquillity. This man, who certainly had a soul as simple as sinfull, was much moved and angered, he should be so gul'd as to swallow such a gudgeon: so that he did absolutely resolve to address himself unto the friends of Artamenes, and acquaint them it was he who had incensed Ciaxares against Artamenes. This man, repaired first unto Feraulas, and ingeniously confessed all the passages, but with such signs of so sad remorse, that although he was the man who had brought his Masters life in danger, yet he would not treat him hardly. Then after he had souldly chid him for his first act, he much commended him for his second, and resolved to make more use of him in discovery of this secret enemy unto Artamenes. He presently acquainted his Master with it, though Ciaxares had forbid any should speak unto him; for the Captain of the Guard being fully satisfied concerning Artamenes Innocency, did not observe his Order so exactly, but he gave him liberty of intercourse by Letter: Artamenes was glad when he knew how this Letter came unto the hands of Ciaxares: for though Great Souls who are incapable of Crimes, cannot easily believe others are more culpable than themselves; yet he entertained some light kinde of jealousy, that the King of Assiria had a hand in the business; and the thought of that did much torment him: For, said he, If by happy Fate Mandana should be alive, and should accidentally fall into the King of Assiria's hands, then what confidence, said he, can I have in the word of such a Prince, who is guilty of so perfidious a fact? All this while Chrisantes and Feraulas endeavoured to use all means that Fortune would afford them, towards the preservation of Artamenes; and found it to be a very difficult business, for as the Case now stood, they knew not whether or no it becom'd their duty, to acquaint Ciaxares with the truth of Artamenes his story, and all his adventures: they saw it would accuse him one way, and excuse him another: yet they conceived that his Life would be less in danger, as a Lover of the Princess, then as a Friend unto the King of Assiria; his Quality which was much above what it seemed to be, did appear unto them to be but an ill expedient, thereby to advantage him. They were full of so many fears and doubts as they knew not what to resolve upon or to imagin: In conclusion, they thought it not fit or just, to trust intirely unto their own opinions in a matter of such high importance; nor to charge themselves solely with the event of an affair, whereupon depended the safety or destruction of the most eminent man in the world. Therefore they concluded it most fit and safe, to make choice of some principall Persons, and other strange Princes who were most affectionate unto Artamenes, and whom he had most obliged to be of their Councell: They thought it best to let these Page 24 know, that he whom they so well loved, was much more worthy of their affection and assistance, then they thought him to be; and to desire their advice, what course were best to be taken in this transaction. They had a great desire to ask the leave of their dear Master, before they went to work, but that was so nice a thing to trust unto, as they would not hazard it; for he seem'd to be so careless of Life, that they thought, he would not take the pains to preserve it, or use the best expedients for it; and therefore they did imagin, he would never consent they should reveal him. In their laying a foundation for this design, they resolved not to trust this secret unto any but Persians, and stranger Princes, and not to impart it unto any Mede upon any condition: because they being Subjects unto Ciaxares, might perchance dispense with the Laws of Friendship, and reveal it, or at least observe them with some reluctance and scruple: So when they had fully resolved upon this design, they sought out opportunities to put it in execution; and they hoped to receive this satisfaction from it at the least, that they had not neglected any expedient which might preserve him who is the most fortunate, and unfortunate man both, that is in the whole universe.

ARTAMENES: OR CYRVS the Great. BOOK II.

THE Design which Chrisantes and Feraulas undertook, was so Just, that Fortune, who is an enemy to Virtue, and was much incensed against the illustrious Artamenes, did seem to smile in lieu of frowning upon it. These two faithfull servants, intending to assemble together those who had been dearest friends unto their Master, excepting against Medes, made choice of the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caducians, and Thrasibulus, whom Artamenes sent to visit since his Arrest: Adusius and Artabaces met also in Councell: Likewise all the rest of the Princes, except the King of Phrygia, who kept near Ciaxares, in hopes to mitigate his choler: who notwithstanding all endeavours to the contrary, was in all discourses concerning Artamenes much incensed against him. In conclusion, the King of Hircania, addressing himself unto Chrisantes, did entreat him, that since he had so great a share in the friendship and affection of Artamenes, and had also so long a time been related unto him, he would be pleased to inform them of all his Adventures, ever since he came into the Court of Ciaxares, also acquaint them with his birth, to the end that thereby they might happily finde out some conveniency which might conduce unto his preservation, by the interest of that Prince, under whom he was born a subject, or at the least, to make use of some handsome pretence, which might keep Ciaxares in some suspense, untill his anger was a little over. Furthermore, Hidaspes added, That Ciaxares his Army consisting of so many severall Nations, he might perchance be one of them; if so, it were good to know his Countrey, because it would be a strong motive unto Ciaxares to be reconciled unto him, for by that consequence he might win the hearts of all those who have the honour to be born in the same Country, under the same Laws and Prince that Artamenes is: if he should prove to be born in an enemies Country, then Ciaxares, it may be, considering he hath a man of that Concernment in his Power, will be sooner induced to Preserve him, as a means to draw some advantage from his enemies by it. As soon as Hidaspes had delivered his Vote, all the rest Page 26 did concur and approve of it. Perhaps (added Thrasibulus,) by the knowledge of his story, we may come to discover the Reasons, why Artamenes held Intelligence with the King of Assiria, and what the Cause may be, that he will not reveal it unto Ciaxares; for these are the two mysterious Labyrinths which most amaze us. Sirs (answered Chrisantes) I apprehend it as a good Omen, that you should thus prevent the intentions of Feraulas and my self, for we came unto Hidaspes with the same design, and to assemble together all you whom good Fortune has thus happily brought unto this House: The sequell of my discourse will inform you, why we made choice of Hidaspes his house; and why we thought it fit, that so many famous Medes as were friends unto Artamenes do not meet here: In a word, Sirs we come to tell you who Artamenes is. Chrisantes had no sooner spoke that last syllable, but all the Princes interrupted him with Acclamations of Joy, and expressions of hope to have him of their Nation; No, said the King of Hircanias, I shall not be so happy as to have that Honour: The Prince of the Cadusians said the same, and all desired it, but tacitly confessed they were all unworthy to be Sovereigns over such a Subject, yet that he himself deserved to be Monarch of the whole world: In conclusion, all the Princes were full of impatience till they knew it; and commanding that the door should be shut, least the Narration should be disturbed, they sit down and pressingly desire Chrisantes to begin. Some did put it to the Question, Whether it were not fit they should stay for the King of Phrygia; but the major part did so burn with desire to know the originall of him who had so highly demean'd himself, that they would not permit so long delay, but did double their entreaties, that Chrisantes would satisfie their longing desires: After he had paus'd a while, and recollected into his memory the Idea of so many great exploits as he had seen him perform, resolving to follow the course which was concluded between Feraulas and him, he began the Story.

The History of Artamenes.

MY task is to speak of things so wonderfull, that I conceive it convenient to prepare you before hand, least you should be startled with admiration: for indeed Sir (said he, addressing himself to the King of Hircania) the Birth and Life of Artamenes, is so full of extraordinary glorious and transcendent circumstances, as will hardly finde belief in those who only hear and have not seen them: therefore I think it fit to protest unto you, that all is pure Truth which shall be related unto you, and if I shall chance to fail or lessen the Truth, it is the modesty of Artamenes, which hath accustomed me to conceal part of his Glory, and never to aggravate the greatness of his Acts. Nevertheless Sir, this Artamenes, whose Valour and Virtue has rendred him so Famous, is not lessened by the Greatness of that Prince who gave him Life: For Sir, when I shall tell you, that this Artamenes was before his birth Predestinated by the Gods to be a Terror unto all the Kings of the Earth, and that he is no other then CYRUS, Sonne of Cambises King of Persia, I shall tell you nothing but what is most true, and what I shall very easily make appear. At this, Hidaspes and all present cried out; What (said they with one voice) is Artamenes CYRUS? Is Artamenes Sonne to the King of Persia? Artamenes (replied Chrisantes) is the very same I tell you; and by consequence of the most illustrious Family in the world, since his Predecessors the Valiant Perseus, derives his Pedigree, from the Sonne of Jupiter. But (said Hidaspes) Did not you confirm me in that opinion which all the world had, of his Shipwrack? And did not you your self tell me, how you changed Masters after his death? and that he whom you then waited upon, was called Artamenes? Most true, Replied Chrisantes, I confess I did so, but I did it by the command of Cyrus, who desiring to pass under that Name, obliged me to call him so, and I will phrase him so throughout most of this Relation, to the end you may more easily understand it. In the sequell and conclusion of this my discourse, you shall know what were his reasons which moved him to assume this dignity. I must needs say (said Hidaspes) you had great reason to prepare those which hear you against wonder: But (said Artabases) Those have lost their reason who suspect the truth of it, when they shall consider on what affectionate termes of familiarity Chrisantes and Feraulas were linked unto him. There need not many Arguments (said the King of Hircania, speaking to Hidaspes, Adusius and Artabaces) to perswade me that Artamenes is Cyrus: It were more difficult to think that such an extraordinary man should be of a common extraction. For my part (said Thrasibulus) I have had some such thoughts ever since the first day I knew him: for his high Actions would not permit me to doubt of his Quality. Persodes Prince of the Cadusians, Page 27 applying himself unto Hidaspes, Artabaces, Adusius, Chrisantes and Feraulas, said unto them; You are so highly honoured in being Subjects unto such a Prince, that I must needs think your glorious servitude excels my Sovereignty; and that it is a greater Honour to obey Cyrus, then to command a hundred thousand men. Hidaspes was so inflamed with desire of knowing more precisely all particulars concerning the Life of him, whose first Adventures he had been well acquainted with, as he desired Chrisantes to begin his story, from the first departure of Cyrus out of his fathers Court. But because Thrasibulus knew nothing, and the other Princes never heard of the Passages in the Court of Astiages, only by common vogue, which often is a lyar, therefore it were more expedient he should begin his whole story; so that the memory of those who knew the Passages might be revived, and Thrasibulus who was altogether ignorant in them, might be informed. Chrisantes then, after a little silence, in contriving the method of his discourse, and turning towards the King of Hircania, began thus. Sir, I will not abuse your Patience in Repetitions of Artamenes his most glorious descent: It will suffice to say his Name is Cyrus, and derived from the illustrious Race of Persides. This is enough to inform you, that there is not one more Noble in the world: Cyrus hath this advantage above others, that he is Sovereign of a people (if it befit a Persian to say it) amongst whom Virtue is loved, and vice abhorred with such disgust, that it dares not appear unless under a cloak of Virtue: Artamenes moreover (for so I will call him yet) has the glory to be subject unto a Prince and Princess, whose Applauds fills the story of all Nations, so that he derives nothing from them but what is most Noble and Heroicque. Now since the History of the King of Medes, does much conduce to the clearing of my relation, I shall be forced to fetch far off a foundation to build the rest of my discourse upon. Be pleased to remember, how the Ancient Kings of Assiria became Lords of all higher Asia; and how the wise and famous Deiocus Sonne of Phraortes, did incite his Countrymen, to rebell against their Tyrant Kings: and after he had got the Sovereignty of the Medes into his own Powler, restor'd it into the hands of a Mede again: You know Sir, that this Great and Generous Prince, was Lineally descended from the Ancient Kings of Medes; and that it was he who ordained such excellent Laws; who built the stately Town of Ecbatane; and who reduced under his obedience all the state of his Ancestors, which were the Brussians, the Paratec|nians, the Struchations, the Arisintenes, and the Budiens. After Deiocus, who raign'd fifty three years, Phaortes his Sonne inherited the Crown, and raign'd so peaceably, as if the Assirians had never usurped. But being not content to sit quietly in the Throne of his Prede|cessors, he began to make war against the Persian, a People so rusted with more then a whole age of Peace, that they finding themselves assaulted by a most Martiall People accustomed to conquer, and to prevent the utter desolation of their Country, complied with them; and Peace was so concluded, that the two Crowns of Persia and Media were insepe|rably interested; so that as often as Phraortes should stand in need of their Assistance, they were obliged to lend it: Here Sir, was the first Connexion of the Medes with the Persians. I need not relate how Phraortes, swel'd with ambition, pronounced war against the King of Assiria, who slept securely in a downy bed of Peace within his own Dominions: Nor how, after he had raign'd two and twenty years, and besieging the Town of Minos, perished in the attempt: Nor how after his death Ciaxares his Sonne, the first of that Name among the Kings of Medes, succeeded in the Kingdom: nor how Fortune was sometimes a friend, and sometimes a fo unto this Prince: for I know you are not ignorant, how in giving Battle to the Libians, when he was at the very point of being victorious, it became so accidentally dark upon a sudden, that it was impossible for him to continue fight, and finish his almost gotten victory: You know also, that in besieging the Town of Minos (of which we spake before,) intending to revenge the death of his Father Phraortes, who was killed before this Town, and being at the very point of taking it, Medeas King of the Scythians appeared with an Army of a hundred thousand men, within shot of his Camp: You know also, how this King lost the Battle unto the Scythians, and his Empire with it, but got again into the Throne; for this Invasion of the Scythians lasted not above eight and twenty years: You know also, that this Ciaxares not changing his Resentments with his fortunes, revived the warre with the King of Assiria, and at last became Master of the Town of Minos: Then Sir, you know, how this first Ciaxares was Father unto Astiages, whom he left a quiet Inheritor of his Dominions: but as this Prince was born in a turbulent time, so I beleeve, that the restless spirit of the Father, was transmigrated into the soul of the Sonne, and imprinted such Melancholy thoughts in this Prince his Sonne, as caused him to passe his life with much in|quietude; and was partly a cause of all those thwartings in Artamenes his fortunes: He was Page 28 married very young, and in a manner, doubtless extraordinary, though out of my memory. The Battle which the King his father lost unto Aliattes King of Lydia, by reason of that ob|scurity which blinded both Armies, was a cause of this marriage; for after so strange an accident, the King of Medes consulted with the Priests, and Aliattes went unto the Temple of Diana at Ephesus, which by reason of the Oracles there, was grown in great repute: These Princes were told by the Priests and by the Oracle of Diana, that the Gods did express by this remarkable sign, they were not pleased with the warre, but that they ought to resolve upon termes of Peace. The King of Sicily, who was a mediator in the matter, did so negotiate between them, that the King of Lydia, who had but one Daughter, Sister of Craessus, should marry her unto Astiages, the Sonne of his enemy: So you may collect by this, that the marriage which was made up so soon after the warre of Lydia, gave me (some say) cause to say, that this Prince, born when the Starres had such tumultuous influence, received from them such troublesome Inclinations. As for his Raign Sir, because it is so late since it ended, it would be superfluous to relate it. Let it suffice to tell you, how he knowing that none of his Predecessors, ever since the Famous Deiocus had enjoyed their Kingdom in Peace, therefore he alwayes stood upon his guard, and feared some Revolt: You know Sir, that he had by the Queen his wife, and sister of Craessus, Ciaxares who now reigns, and retains the invincible Artamenes prisoner: You know also that he had one Daughter called Mandana, an admirable Beauty, of great virtue and wisdom: That long since the Queen his wife died, and with her all his affections to any other, so that he would never marry more: Since this losse, all his thoughts are upon his young Sonne Ciaxares, and his young fair Daughter Mandana; endeavouring to keep himself peaceable within his own limits, without any attempts upon his Neighbours: And though he had the good fortune never to be in any considerable actuall warre, yet he had to be in continuall preparations for it; sometimes against his an|tient enemy the King of Assiria, sometimes against his Allies, and sometimes against his own Subjects; yet for all these inquietudes, which his perpetual turbulencies did procure him, his Court held up the proudest head in all Asia: For (as you know,) the Medes were alwayes addicted to Magnificence and Pleasures, Astiages especially who was most of all devoted un|to all manner of Diversions of his Melancholy and pensive cogitations: Ecbatane, was the fittest seat for it of all places in the world. This Prince therefore ever since the birth of his Sonne Ciaxares, did alwayes every year Celebrate a certain day of publike Jollity. It was his Custom to go himself unto the Temple to thank the Gods for his Sonne, and offer Prayers for his Preservation: The young Prince Ciaxares was then about sixteen, and the Princess his Sister about fourteen years of age: when one of these Festivall Ceremonies were obser|ved, there chanced a strange Accident, which did much disturb their Devotion and Jol|candry; for as Astiages was going out of his Pallace in the morning unto the Temple, and carried with him the Prince his Sonne, upon a sudden, the brightness of the day became all dully dim; and the Sunne so eclipsed, as it cast such a black obscurity over the face of the whole earth, as none could almost distinguish each other; that little light which was, gave such a glooming shaddow, as was most terrible to them all: This Accident extreemly trou|bled Astiages: The People took it for no good Omen; for though those which saw this Eclipse, had seen others also, yet this was much more affrighting then they, as well because it was much greater, as because it happened upon such a remarkable day: Insomuch as they did think it more then a meer cursary and naturall accident, and concluded it to be a Com|met or some sign from Heaven, by which the Gods did portend and advertise the King and People of some important matter. Some remembered that terrible darkness which affrighted Ciaxares the Father of Astiages; and <◇> none made it any question but it was an advert|sment from Heaven, to move the t <...> gs of Medes and Lydia unto Peace, and there|fore they thought this Commet to signifie some such thing. To be short, every one vented his peculiar phansie, and explained the meaning of it according to his own capritious hu|mour: Some said it might presage the Kings death: others feared the destruction of the Empire: Some, the losse of the Prince his Sonne, and all did Augure mourning consequents. But although this obscurity did much amaze them, yet that which followed this Eclipse did absolutely confound them; for after it had continued thus dark four compleat hours, the Sunne, contrary to its common naturall course, discovered it self all at once in an instant; and was so hot, so clear, and of a light so transcendent, as it blinded all them who durst gaze upon it: the heat no lesse extream then the brightness, for it was so excessive, as the People thought all the earth set on fire. All this while Astiages, who was alwayes naturally too apprehensive and superstitious of such Accidents, and was fully perswaded that the Priests Page 29 knew almost all things future; therefore he assembled them together, and commanded them to consider seriously, what might be the meaning of this Prodige: Doubtless Sir, you know how these men lead their lives, which afford them leasure enough to contemplate these celesti|all Signs; and have so deep an inspection into the influence of Stars, that they can by them oftentimes divine long before, what shall afterwards come to passe. The Gods also, do sometimes inspire them by secret wayes which are unknown unto the vulgar: Their Answers are as certain as Oracles, and have this advantage above them, that they have much more cleer|ness, and far lesse riddle in them then Oracles use to have: so that Astiages, having got them together as I formerly said; and after they had pray'd unto the Gods, and contemplated the Starres, they told the King (having prepared him beforehand to receive patiently what|soever they should tell him, least he should break into any violent passion) That according unto their speculations, those gifts, and that knowledge which they had received from Hea|ven, this great Eclipse, which had such supernaturall Courses, did signifie either his own death, or the Princes his Sonnes, or the decline <...> his Sovereign Authority: As for the two first of these, they told him, that they <...> once it should be either of them; because they had heretofore, according to his <...> and Calculated both their Nativities, and had collected severall Astronomically Observations concerning both their Lives; they alwayes found and concluded, that both their Lives should be long; therefore, they must by Consequence conclude, that it Portends decay in Dominion; and that universall revolution threatens all Asia, particularly Medea; and that it shall be upon them suddenly, unless they make some happy use of those Advertisements which Heaven does signifie unto them, as Ciaxares his Father had done before him. Astiages was Planet-struck with this discourse; and conceiving that out of fear, the Priests had not yet revealed all they knew, did presse them further to declare their full knowledge: In conclusion, they told him, that in their opi|nions it was to be feared the extraordinary brightness which followed the darkness, and the Sunnes so sudden discovering it self in an instant, did signifie that the Prince his Sonne, following too much the Counsels of Ambitious spirits, would one day usurp his Crown: The darkness did signifie his Power, which should also be obscured; and the brightness did signifie the sudden splendor of the young Prince: But yet, for all this there was a Remedy; for the Gods did not admonish Men in vain: But that the King his Father when he was fore|warned, did appease them, in making Peace with Lybia: And so likewise ought he to render himself submissive unto them; by Sacrifices, by Prayers, and by his Virtues: and that he ought to have extraordinary care, in placing Wise and Prudent men about the young Prince, such as should infuse sapient Instructions into him, and root out of his minde all those cor|rupt seeds, which ill disposed men had sowed: The King no sooner heard what these magick Priests had said, but he was fully satisfied: for though his naturall disposition was alwayes prompt, and superstitious in such things, yet he had some apparent colour for this, because Ciaxares his Sonne did begin to put forth some ambitious budds: and all his inclinations were Grandure and Dominion: Also he had many about him who fomented this naturall propensity, so that the thoughts of Astiages no sooner reflected upon him, but he imagined him in his Throne, snatching the Scepter out of his hand, and throwing him into Prison. You may imagin Sir, how disgustive this discourse was unto the soul of a Prince, who priz'd his Crown above his Life, but who in spite of all jealous resentments, did yet retain the affe|ction of a Father towards a Sonne. In the mean while, he charged the Priests not to publish what they had told him; fearing that it might cause his ruin if they did: and that if his Sonne should come to the knowledge of it, he might chance think it no Crime to make bold with the Crown, since it seem'd to be the pleasure of the Gods to have it so: Therefore, he gave express command unto them, that they should tell the Prince his Sonne, and divulge it unto all the People, how this Eclipse had nothing extraordinary in it; that the Circumstance of Day upon which it happened, was a meer Casualty, from whence no ill consequences can be drawn; and that they should not cease their Prayers unto the gods for his good fortune: The Priests were obedient unto his commands, but he did not reap that profit from their obedience which he expected. For since the People were told it threatened no evil, they ap|prehended and feared much more: The young Prince did imagin, that perhaps the Magilicians found it foretold his death: so that both Court and People were in great disorder: The King did all he could to testifie he harboured no ill apprehensions in his minde: yet for all that in the midst of the feasting jollities, which were sumptuously prepared for his diver|sion, and disguise of his melancholy thoughts, one might see him troubled, and his minde much disquieted. His heart was posset with two Passions at once; Paternall affection Page 30 towards a Sonne, contending with Jealousie of his Sovereign Authority: so that it was easie to conclude, he was not at peace within himself: he loved the Crown as well as he did his Sonne; and perhaps was biassed on that side more then the other, as the sequell presently after made it appear; for advising with himself by what expedients he should divert the young Ciaxares from his aspiring thoughts, he concluded the best was to send him farre off from Court, where the Grandees of State were alwayes resident, and who all lookt upon him, as one, who one day should be their King, which was dangerous to a disposition too apt already to hearken unto ill counsell; yet this resolution of removing him, was not with|out much anxiety and sorrow: for he feared, least this course should more incense Ciaxares, for (said he to himself) as long as he is with me, and under my eye, I shall need no spies to observe his actions, I shall my self be a witness of them: but when he is in a farre off Coun|try, whom shall I trust to be his Protectour? may it not be well supposed, that many ill dis|posed persons will there speak aloud, that which here they dare not so much as think? In conclusion Sir, when he had throughly argued the matter, and weighed every Circumstance, he conceived he had found out a safer <◇> then to remove him; for when he remembred, that the King of Cappadocia had but one <...> ghter living, under the tuition of the Queen her Mother, he thought that if he could bring about a Match between her and his Sonne Ciaxlares, it would be an excellent way to remove him, without giving him any occasion of com|plaint, and without any appearance of any close design in it. Moreover, it might probably be conjectured, that the putting one Crown upon his Sonnes head, would satisfie his young Ambition, from aspiring unto the other, and stifle all usurping designs against his Father: To be short, he apprehended so much advantage in this Match, as he bended all his endeavours to bring it about. I will not trouble you Sir, with relating all the Passages in trans|acting it, nor the rubbs he met withall in the negotiation; for I do suppose you are not ig|norant of a Law in Cappadocia, which permits not their Kings to marry their Daughters unto any strange Princes, least their Kingdom should become subject unto the dominion of a Forraigner; yet Astiages acted his part so well, and with such good success, as the Marriage was concluded: for he found it out by chance, that Ciaxares was born in Cappadocia: For the Queen his Mother going a Pilgrimage to visit a famous Temple which was in that Coun|try, fell sick when she was great with childe, and was delivered of Ciaxares within the con|fines and jurisdiction of Cappadocia. At last, he married his Sonne Ciaxares, unto this young Queen, whose Beauty and Virtue might be rated at a higher value then her Crown: As soon as she was married, the Queen her Mother died: the People resented her death as a punish|ment for not precisely observing the fundamentall Law of the Land. Mean while, Astiages is secure, finding his Sonne wondrous well pleas'd with his condition. Also that the Crown of Cappadocia, and the Virtue of the Princess his Wife, did highly contribute unto his hap|piness, and that Ciaxares so esteemed of it. After this Marriage, all Pleasures and Delights do bid adieu to Ec|batane: The young Princess Mandana, Daughter to Astiages, will needs depart from that Court, wherein she was so adored; for since the absence of the Prince h brother, there was none could obtain any thing from the King her Father but by her inter|cession. Amidst this calm serenity and universall quietness, Astiages had a most odd and horrid Dream, which is talked on by every one. As he was in consultation again with his Priests, concerning the accidents of his Life; they told him, how they found, that all their former Prediction was in a likelihood to fail; but that infallibly, the Princess his Daughter should have a Sonne, who would make himself Master of all Asia, and by consequence should possess this Throne in lieu of his Sonne Ciaxares; and who, to conclude, should cause a generall Revolution. Astiages, contrary to his old custom, had much ado, to be|lieve a Tale so unlikely to prove true, and for a long time rejected the Priests, thinking all their Predictions to be no better then lies, since they so failed in their first. But those extra|vagant visions, and operations of his phansie did perplex him so many nights together, that he began to think again, that there might be some truth in their speeches; yet this had not caused him to fear the menaces of these signs so much (though Dreams were much con|siderable among the Medes, especially their Priests, who beleev'd them to be the ordinary wayes, by which the Gods did communicate themselves: unto men) if other signs also had not concurred, and augmented his fears, and seemed to authorise them. The Princess Man|dana, who knew nothing of all these Passages, being one night in her Closet, which was il|luminated by many Lamps of Cristall, it was told her, the King her Father intended a visit, for Astiages was resolved to entertain himself with her, in hopes to temper his disturbed minde, by the moderation of this Princess society; who, without doubt, was as virtuous as Page 31 ever any: He no sooner was settled in the Room, but all the Lamps did immediatly of them|selves extinguish, only one which was just over the head of Mandana, which still retain'd its light, and doubled that which all the other had lost: Astiages, more troubled at this Prodigie, then at all his Dreams, consulted afresh with his Magicians, who assured him that this was an infallible sign his Sovereignty should cease, and be all in subjection unto that one Son which Mandana should be mother of, according unto the dreams which before they had interpreted unto him: The next day after when the Princess was at the Temple, the Earth quaked, and all the ornaments of the Church fell to the ground, except the Image of a young Childe, which still stood upright, holding a bow in his hand: The Magicians con|strued this Childe to Embleme that which should be born of Mandana, and become the love of all Nations, but absolute Master of the most noble part of all the world. Since these ac|cidents and reiterated prodigies, the heart of Astiages was all fear; The Princess which before was his only joy, is now the cause of all his sorrow; Yet truly he suffered not alone, for she was sharer with him, though in a far different manner; so that when she knew what Expositions the Magicians had made concerning Ciaxares and her self, this wise Princess went to her Father, and most humbly desired him not to trouble himself concerning her, for she assured him, that if he thought it fit she would never marry; and by that means the me|naces which aim at him should all become void; or rather then her life should cause his dis|gust, she would resolve her death, and think it a happinesse to be a victim which would ap|pease the angry gods, and restore him unto his souls tranquillity: she told him that she thought it but her duty to value his satisfaction before her own life. When Astiages heard his daughter thus expresse her self, in lieu of being moved at it, he did beleeve she acted some peece of dissimulation: and that it was some fears made her speak so confidently: Moreo|ver, he bethought himself of a Prince his Allie called Artambases, who was captivated by the beauty of the Princess, and who entertain'd some far fetcht hopes of her favour. Astiages thought this Prince (who indeed was of a nature ambitious) might become the father of that childe which he so much feared, so that without returning any answer to what the Princess had so submissively said, he sternly commanded her not to stir out of her Cham|ber, and prepare her self to be obedient unto whatsoever he should command: The Prin|cesse after she had promised an absolute, though blinde obedience, retired. Astiages remained in the room and in a most restless minde: he could neither resolve of his daughters death, nor put any confidence in her promise of never marrying: for (thought he) though her re|solution perhaps for the present be so, yet Artambases in conclusion will winne upon her, or perchance make head against me without her consent; she is young and fair, and by con|sequence may be tempted beyond her green resolutions, therefore it is dangerous to confide in her words; though I should in close her, Love will break the strongest walls, and deliver her either by power or policy: If I should let her be at liberty they would court her before my face against my will, so that I know not what to do, or what to think upon: but at last since he had no minde to destroy her, he thought it the best course to marry her, yet to marry her so as in all likelihood there might be no fear of what the Fares threatened. After he had a while thus wandred in his own discomposed thoughts, he remembered himself of Cambises who lately succeeded in the Kingdom of Persia by his Fathers <◇> • him Astiages thought most fit to be his guard from all his fears: For (said he) I am sure the Persians are not ambitious: but they are just, and contented with their own, without any thoughts of enlarging limits: they securely rest themselves upon the downy Bed <...> peace, and will ne|ver disturb that soft repose in any hopes of uncertain conquests <◇> I know Cam|bises in particular doth as much exceed other Princes in point of <◇> as the Persians in generall exceeds all other people of the world: He governs his <◇> by Laws, not will: So that he is a father as well as a King unto his Subjects: Moreover the Kingdom of Persia is not so absolute but that it retains some shadow of a Common wealth, where many will not soon induced to undertake a war as one single man may be: nor hath ambition so predominate an influence upon a Senate, as it hath over the minde of an absolute Prince. In conclusion, Sir, (not to lengthen my Story with what is absolutely necessary) be pleased to know that the King of Medes resolved upon this Marriage, and presently propounded it unto Cambises, who resenting it with much joy, sent his Ambassadors unto Ec|batane to court the Princess. Astiages who himself procured the match, you may be sure would not refuse it, but presently consented, and sent the Princess his daughter into Persia. She, according to her accustomed vertue, is all obedience, and in a short time after, thought her self the happiest Princess in the world, when she found her husband owner of so many admirable Page 32 qualities, and received from him such ample testimonies of his affection towards her: To be short, Astiages, according to all appearances, seemed to rest in much satisfaction and security; and Ciaxares his Son was likely to succeed him in peace: Also the Princess his daughter was settled in so calm a Countrey, that according to all prudential appearances there was not any resemblance of a war to arise: But this serenity lasted not long in the soul of Astiages: Mandana was no sooner settled, but he repents of the match, and endeavours to get her again into his power. That which stir'd upon his jealousy, and begot new fears was, be|cause all the sacrifices which he offered unto the gods, did seem to be all rejected: And the Magicians who since his dreams had much busied themselves in contemplation of the starres, and observation of other caelestiall motions, did all unanimously conclude, that the great Re|volution which threatened Medea was at hand; and that they did every day more and more freshly discover the malignancy of those Constellations, which did portend a dire confusion to it; In|somuch as that there was more necessity to prepare how to endure it, then waies how to prevent it. Things standing thus, Astiages sends to entreat Cambises, that he would be plea|sed to permit the Queen his wife to come unto him. The Queen, although she was well ac|quainted with the humorous disposition of the King her Father, did desire her Husband that he would be pleased, she might have leave to pay this satisfaction unto him who gave her life, for since she knew her Fathers restless soul, she was in some hopes to qualifie him: And though she loved Cambises infinitely, yet she was contented, rather to leave him for a time, then cause a warre between him and her Father, which might chance to arise upon a refusall, Cambises, although extremely tender over the Queen his wife, was yet so complacential as to send her into Medea in an equipage befitting her quality: and to make her appear more Glorious in the Medean Court where she was brought up, then before she did; the King her Husband, conducted her to the frontiers, and there bid adieu with as much affectionate cere|mony as is imaginable: As for Mandana, she feared the King her Father would keep her for the satisfaction of his minde, and to free himself from all his jealousies and fears, so likewise her soul was sensible of much sorrow, when she feared also that her Husband would not so part with her: but for this time they parted, Cambises to Persipolis, and melancholy Man|dana to Ec|batane, where at first she was received with abundance of Joy, so that Astiages was more at hearts ease then he could have imagined: Before she was married, many dissuaded him from it, but now since she was married and so far from her Husband, he could not con|ceive any thing possible to disturb his quiet. He foresaw that if he should retain her long, and she desirous to depart, perhaps a warre might thereupon arise 'twixt him and the Per|sian, but he valued that lesse, then to see Mandana in a condition to have a Sonne: so then all was fill'd with welcomes, feasts and jocundary; in|somuch as the Princess began to be in some hopes she should be deceived in her former fears. Yet amid all these pleasant diver|sions, her health began to impair, and visible marks of indisposition appeared in her com|plexion: she beleev'd the cause might proceed from her weariness in her journey, or from the change of (though her native) air; only it might be her resentments of her Husbands absence; but within a little after, she certainly perceived she was with childe; and this troubled her so much as she fell absolutely sick: for she concluded it questionless, that her Fa|ther would not suffer her to return in that condition: and if she should so chance as to be delivered of a Sound in Ec|batane, the best of her expectations would be an exchange of his Cradle for a Prison, or so ordered that she should not have the dispose of her own Childe. Sometimes she imagined her Husband angry with her for concealing from him her Fathers humour, and so <◇> troubled thoughts did disturb her as she stood in need of all her Con|stancy to conceale Melancholy: Mean while, she resolves to conceal her Condition as long as she can: <◇> keeps her Chamber continually, and for the most part, her bed. A while after she complains of the Air in Ec|batane: and intends a request unto the King her Father, that she may return into Persia, or else that he would be pleas'd to permit her, to go unto a fair house in the Countrey, about some five miles from Ec|batan, conceiving that place was most fit to conceal her condition in: But as ill-luck would have it, one of the Physicians which came to visit her, discovered the truth, in spite of all her care to conceal it: for she often complained of so many untrue distempers, thinking thereby to delude them, and divert them from knowing the true cause, as made them more inquisitive. The Physician, hoping to be a welcome intelligencer, told Astiages she was with Childe: so that when the Queen presented her desires unto her Father, she was handsomely denied and told, this was much better Air, so that if she were in Persia so ill as she is, he would wish her in Medea for re|covery of her health; this being both her native, and incomparably better Air then that Page 33 of Persipolis, therefore he would by no means have her think of return: That he would most willingly consent unto her desires of going into the Countrey, if he could be perswaded it were better, for Ec|batan had more pleasant Gardens by much, and the Court was fitter for diver|sion of her melancholy, then any Countrey solitude could be: therefore he desired her to re|main where she was. Presently after, all her women about her are removed, and others put in their rooms: The time of her delivery drew neer, and Astiages is fuller, if fuller possible can be, of new fears: In few words Sir, Mandana is delivered of a Sonne; and timorous Astiages causeth his confidant Harpagus to take it, with express charge to carry it closely in|to some remote Mountain, and there leave it amongst Tygers in the wilderness: This Prince was so inhumane, as he would have presently killed him, but the Gods restrained him from a fact so foul: Harpagus being somewhat less cruel then he, would not at that time do it, but faithfully promised it should be done: and not daring to be seen in the destruction of this Infant, he committed it unto the execution of a Shepherd called Methridates, who dwelt at the bottom of a great Mountain in the wilderness, whom he sent for, and commanded him to do with this Childe, as he had received charge. And be pleas'd to know Sir, that this Shepherd carried this Childe away, which was the fairest that ever eye beheld: During the time that this Shepherd was at the Town with Harpagus, his Wife chanced to be delivered of a dead Childe: the Shepherd brings this live one to her, which presently began to Laugh upon her, she took in her arms, and forsaking the Corps of her own dead Childe, took the care of this fair Little one, and would never let her Husband rest untill he consen[t]ed: As for the dead Childe, he threw it out amongst the wilde beasts, to be there torn in pieces. This poor Nurse whose Name was Spaco, thought no more of the dead one, but re[solv]ed to become Nurse unto the other who she knew to be of some high quality, by the Mantle in which the Childe was lapt, it being made of cloth of gold. You may see Sir, It had been an easie matter for Methridates (living at the foot of a desert mountain far off, but towards the north of Ecbatane, and the Euxean bridge) to have put this Childe to death, and never fear discovery in a place so rude and desert: And you know Sir, as well as I, that all the parts of Medea towards Aspires, are mountainous wilde Forrests covered with woods, and fill'd with salvage beasts. Be pleased Sir to know further, that this Methridates, putt[ing] his own dead Childe into the Cradle which was very rich, and which brought Manda[na]es, shewed it unto those which Harpagus sent thither to see it: These men taking it, car[ri]ed it unto their Master Harpagus, who having acquainted Astiages with it, received orders to entomb it amongst the Kings of Medea. Thus you see Sir, the Sonne of a Shepherd in a Royal Sepulcher, and the Sonne of a great King in a Shepherds poor Cottage: Know also, how Astiages caused it to be divulged about the Court, that Mandanaes Sonne died of some disease, and told the same unto the Princess: he sent also unto Cambises to condole the loss: But poor Mandana all this while, although she did more then suspect the truth, yet she with much ado continued in her Constancy, and took no notice: And though the deep melancholy which dwelt in her eyes, did witness as much, yet since it could not be helped, she would not discover the cause, nor infuse any jealousies of it into her Husbands thoughts. The better to colour her grief, she desired the second time leave to go into the Country, which now without any repugnance is consented unto: And Astiages sent afterwards unto her, to let her know, that if she pleased, she might return into Persia; for he had this conceit, that it was the first Sonne of Mandana, only whom he had to fear, which being secured, he was then glad to be rid of the Mother, whom if she should detain any longer, would by her extremity of sorrow draw a thousand reproaches upon himself. As soon as this Liberty is obtained, she presently returns to Cambises, unto whom she opened not a syllable of her troubled soul, but attributed the alteration of her Complexion unto her absence from him, and her sorrows for the death of her Sonne. I am forced Sir, to be a little longer then is fitting in the relation of my Masters strange Infancy, who though all this while in a poor Shepherds homely Cottage, was notwithstanding Apprehensive of those Glories which belong unto a Kingdom: Be pleased Sir, to know in few words, that this young Prince, though then unknown unto himself or any else to be one, did then act the part of a King, and caused himself to be called so amongst all the neighbours Children, which played with him when he was but ten years of age: He made himself feared, loved and obeyed amongst them, as if he had been really their absolute Prince: One day, having punished one of the boyes whom he called subjects, for some offence committed, the Father of that Childe so punished, chanced to be an Officer in the Kings house; who coming to the knowledge of this passage, and wondering that this young poor Shepherds Sonne should act the part of Page 34 a King so well, told Astiages of it, and infinitely extolled the beauty and boldness of this Childe: The King caus'd him to be sent for, and asked the Childe why he punished the other boy: the Childe did return so quick an answer, as struck the King into a wonder, seeing him speak unto a King with as much confidence, as if he had been among the boyes: Moreover, Astiages was infinitely astonished, to see this Sonne of a poor Shepherd, so much resemble his Daughter Mandana, as never two were more like: Indeed, he had some secret suspicions in his soul, which told him, it was the same that he suspected him to be. In conclusion Sir, Astiages could not be satisfied, untill he sent for the Shepherd himself out of his Cottage, and asking him in a terrible tone, and with stern looks, where he got this Childe; the poor simple Methridates, thinking the King had known the passage, and being terrified with the Kings looks and question, confessed the whole story. The King, in spite of all his fears, could not chuse but like and love this admirable Childe; and after he had assem[b]led all the Magicians, they told him (whether it was the truth of their thoughts, or whether it was their pity which moved them to dissemble, I know not) that the Royalty which this Childe had exercised over the boyes, was an infallible sign that the Gods had heard their prayers, and that all the Dominion which this young Prince should have over the Medes, was limited and confined unto that which he hath exercised over the boyes, so that there need no more fears of him: They further told him, that the Gods do sometimes threaten great Princes by these Prodigious, only least they should forget that duty which they owe unto them: and in conclusion they told him, that if he would be pleased to follow their advice, he should send this young Prince unto the King of Assiria his Father. Astiages who con[ceiv]ed many affectionate thoughts of this Childe, was glad of the advice, and being himself of a weak soul, relied much upon the judgement of these Magicians, and was fully perswaded, that this imaginary Royalty, was the fulfilling of his Dream; and truly Sir, as the case stands now with Artamenes, it is apparent that Astiages has no reason to fear Cyrus: yet though he permitted this young Prince to live, whom he named Cyrus, he would not pardon Harpagus, for he banished him the Court and Kingdom: This man, who would neither be absolutely pittifull, nor absolutely cruell, is left without support or refuge, and compl'd to the rigor of a long exile. Nevertheless (as I know you are not ignorant) Astiages sent Cyrillus unto Cambises his Father, writing this excuse unto him, That to prevent certain malignant Constellations which threatened this Childe, he out of his affection was forced to hide him, and cause his sorrows in divulging him dead; but this sorrow will quickly change it self into a double recompence of joy, when he shall see him living, so well, and so amiable. Cambises received him with unexpressible joy; and the wise Mandana gave as many thanks unto her Father Astiages, as ever she received causes of displeasure from him; though she had learned the truth of the story by the information of Harpagus, who was fled thither and told her all, in hopes thereby to procure himself Protection. And though she could not be convinc't, that Astiages was so innocent as he made himself, yet by the knowledge of what was past, she was instructed how to prevent the like for the future: Mean while, the young Cyrus is in Persipolis: for joy of whose welcome, both publike and private Sacrifices are made throughout all Persia; and for whose Education, all men of high parts throughout the whole Kingdom are employed: When Ciaxares heard of these passages, he sent unto Cam[b]ises and the Queen his Sister, to congratulate their good Fortunes in finding their Sonne; and he writ in a high Complement unto the Queen, how he wisht his Daughter Man[dana] might hereafter become worthy to be the Mistris of Cyrus, whose fame fill'd all the world: This young Princess was born unto the King of Cappadocia, about three years after the birth of Cyrus, and had the Name of her Aunt Mandana given unto her? Now Sir, to tell you how young Cyrus was educated would but abuse your Patience, for his high achievements since, does sufficiently demonstrate it unto all the world: I shall only tell you, that both the King and Queens endeavours were with all possible care to infuse such good dispositions as now appears to be in him: For all men finde, in all his actions and all his words, something so sweet, so high, so complacentiall, and so full of goodnesse, as it is an absolute impossibility to know him and not to love him. He was marvellous well propor[tion]ed, exceeding fair, and as this charming Symmetry did from his very infancy appear in all parts of his body, yet his soul and spirit was infinitely above it. Perhaps you know, that in Persipolis there is a pleasant, spacious place, called the place of Liberty, in one Quarter thereof stands the Kings Palace: None inhabit within this square but Grandees, and wisest sort of Persians: for wisdom in that Nation is no lesse valued then Nobility by descent, which also is in very high esteem: It was within this famous Quadrangle, wherein none but Page 35 persons of great wisdom and Nobility did live, that the young Cyrus was educated. Amongst us, all private men do breed their children with as much care as if they were to be all Kings, and are perswaded that to be men, and to be virtuous are terms inseparable: Cyrus coming out of a poor uncouth shepherds Cottage, unto this most famous and learned Acad[em]y: it was a wonder that nature should furnish him with as much prudence and wisdom, as if he had been brought up here from his Cradle. He had for his Tutors in vertue, the wisest which could be culld out of the Old Doctors: Active young men for the exercise of his body, and a younger sort for his recreation, which were well educated in all virtuous qualities: Great care was had to prevent all sorts of vicious persons from coming about him, lest they should chance to corrupt his own naturall sweet inclinations, for they knew well, that if the soul of a Prince who must rule over a People be once poysoned, the people also will be infected, though here he saw none but examples of goodnesse and vertue. Moderation, Liberality, Justice, Valour, and all the virtues were so eminent in him, and got him so much applause among the Persians, that they extol'd him as a Childe sent from Heaven rather to instruct, then be instructed by them: But I fear Sir, that I have already transgressed my limits, and by consequence abused your Patience, especially those Persians which hear me, because perhaps they know these things better then I my self. My Master lived in this Quality until his sixteenth year of Age, And then Fortune began to offer him opportunities of discovering the greatnesse and generosity of his soul, both in his words and Acts; And to put in practice that greatnesse of spirit which his youth did promise: you remember Sir, how Harpagus was banished by the King of Medes for not exactly obeying his com[m]ands in putting to death this young Cyrus; This exile had formerly been of great power in Medea, being so in such favour with the King as he made him Governour in one of his greatest Provinces: This man did endeavour to reconcile himself unto Astiages, but all in vain: he was in this discontent forced to travel from Court to Court to finde out protection and relief from those Princes which were enemies unto the King of Medes; and being some certain daies disguised in Persipolis, found out an opportunity to discover himself. His habit was Persian, he mingled himself among the multitude which waited upon the Prince to hunt, and having the language of the Countrey passable enough, he was not known to be a stranger. Cyrus was lively and active at the sports, and none are lesse tyred, or more bold and forward at these sports then he, either in following the Chase, or assaulting the wilde Beast at a Bay: He drew a bow, threw a dart, and used a sword admirable well: he was allwaies victor in the publike games, and bore away the prize; but to return to Harpagus: he did follow Cyrus very close at this great hunting whereof I spoke; and waited upon him so near, when the Prince followed a wilde bore so eagerly and fast through the thick of the Forrest, lest he should lose sight of the bore, as none of all the Persians was able to follow, only Harpagus: Cyrus overtook this wilde Beast, bent his bow, and shot an arrow through his heart: After this Victory, whereof Harpagus only was a witnesse, he sat down, and rested himself until some of his own servants came in upon a bank close by a little brook, which ran across the Forrest in that place: In all these chases it is the custome of the Countrey for Hunters to carry a Bow, a Quiver, a Sword, and two Javelins: This gallant young Hunter wore them all, and his Buckler also, for them also they use in hunting as well as wars; Ys he was thus sitting, Harpagus drew near him: Cyrus who had not yet seen him, took him for a Persian, began to shew him the Prize, and cried out, I have killed him, I have killed him: but Harpagus, kneeling upon the ground, told him, that he knew how he might obtain a more glorious victory then this: The Prince, thinking the man had discovered some greater Bore then this which he had killed, rose up, and asked him heartily whether he should go to get this victory? Into the head of an Army of thirty thousand men (answer[ed] Harpagus) which I come to offer unto you; so that if you please to accept of it, you may make your self Lord of a Kingdom: Cyrus astonished at his words look upon him more earnestly then before, and supposing he had seen him formerly, Who are you (said he) that make this gallant offer? I cannot yet think my self worthy of it, since my valour was never tried against any but Bear, Bores, Lions and Tigers? I am Sir (said he) one that is sent by the gods to tender you a brave opportunity of getting immortall glory. If all be true you say (said Cyrus) shew me the way I must take, and let it be as difficult as it can be, I will follow it with all alacrity. I have already told you Sir (said Harpagus) you must repair unto the head of an Army of Thirty thousand men, which wait for your commands, and to conquer when you bid them. It becomes not him to command (replied Cyrus) who hath not yet learnt how to obey, it is far fitter I should be their Companion then their Generall. Page 36 But I pray you (Noble Stranger, whom I think I have seen before though not remember you) tell me where this Army is, and who they are, also who is the Enemy, and what the Kingdom you would have me conquer. Sir (answered Harpagus) I am not at all unreasonable in my desires, when I wish your assistance against a King who hath basely broken the Laws of humanity against a Prince who is both the Love and Wonder of all which know him; A King I say who hath acted against Nature, Reason, and Justice; who by an ill governed ambitious jealousy would against all humanity or conscience take away the life of such a Prince, in whose behalf I now salute you: It is in the Behalf of a hopefull, young, innocent Prince, and against such an unnaturall unworthy King I desire to animate you: It nearly concerns your own honour to condescend unto my desires: Your desire (answered Cyrus) is too full of justice to be denied: And not to keep me any longer from this Army which you desire I should repair unto; Inform me who is this barbarous King, and who is the injured Prince: for I do much wonder since I have been so carefully informed of all the prime pass[ages] of the world, I should not guess at them both: Sir (then answered Harpagus) you are the Prince which owes revenge. Yes, (said Cyrus.) And by whom Noble Stranger can I be injured? I who have hardly yet begun to live, I who ever since I first breathed have been rockt in a Cradle of slumbering Peace, who never had enemies in all my life, and who never yet was enemy unto any, but such wilde beasts as these which infest the Forrests? Sir (replied Harpagus, who perceived severall Hunters to come from several Quarters of the Wood:) If you please to go a little further into the wood, and lend me your audience, you shall understand that you have enemies, and more terrible ones then you imagine; such, as if you do not make open war upon them will make a secret one upon you, and that in such a manner as may perhaps become most fatal to you. Cyrus, according to his desire, stept some twenty or thirty paces into the Wood, and beckned with his hand unto those which followed, that they should not approach; Then looking most attentively upon Harpagus, Is it possible (said he to him) that what you tell me can be true? and that you should know my life better then I do my self? And since you have told me who the Prince is, pray tell, who is his enemy? Sir (answered Harpagus) the King of Medes is he, who endeavoured to kill you, and who will yet kill you, if you kill not him first. How (said Cyrus, more amazed then before) is Astiages my enemy? and is there a necessity I must be his? no, no, (said he) it must not be; but if he have any enemies, I pray tell me them, that in his behalf I may fight, and overcome them, if I can. But to undertake a warre against him is a thing I neither can, nor will, nor ought to do. Astiages is Father of that Queen whose Son I have the honour to be, and I must look upon him as one who gave life unto her who gave me mine: neither can I forget how he treated me, with many testimonies of his affection to me: It was he who had a tender care of my life at my birth, and caused those reports of my death to no other end, but to make me live: It was he who brought me out of the poor Shepherds homely house unto a Princes Throne; It is he who hath deserved my Love, my humble requests, and good opinion. Cyrus having ended his reply, Harpagus desired leave to speak, and related unto him the whole passages, of which the Prince had hitherto been ignorant, for the Queen his Mother spoke not a word of it unto him ever since his return: Harpagus began then to aggravate the cruelty of Astiages, and to assert the truth of his information, by this infallible proof, that he himself was the man, who received that bloody command to kill him, from the mouth of Astiages: yet he durst not tell unto Cyrus, how he left him with Methridates to do it for him; but he rather related, as if he was the means whereby he was preserved: at last he told him, how he had received Intelligence from the Province of Paretacenes, that if he would please to command all those forces which they would bring into the field, and Personally appear amongst them, all Medea might easily be conquered: Cyrus hearkened very attentively unto this discourse, and paused a good while before he answered: at last, he said to Harpagus with a countenance more dejected then before; I know not Harpagus whether I should be angry with you, or whether I should thank you, but I am sure you have made me very sad, in telling me that I should be the innocent subject of that Princes injustice, in whose Honour I have such an interest: But Sir (answered Harpagus) your own Honour ought to be considered in the first place: Therefore it is (replied Cyrus) that revenge is not permitted me: Cruell friend, said he to him; what Propositions do you come to make me? you offer me an Army, which I have a desire (but dare not) to accept of? you tell me of an Enemy whom I must not fight with; and you propound so many just and so many unjust things all together, that it is impossible but my thoughts must waver at them: Yet know Harpagus, though I have ardent desires of Glory, Page 37 to become Famous, and to Conquer Crowns, at least deserve them, yet I cannot now accept of your offer; And though I am arrived at that age which ought to give some tokens of valour, yet it is requisite as well that I give some testimonies of my Temperance; Hah Harpagus, what would you have me do? why did you not tell me of some lawfull Enemy? Sir (answered Harpagus very coldly,) I had thought that the King of Medes injuries had been convincing reasons for you to dispense with those obligations of Consanguinity, which otherwise would have required respect from you: but since I am (it seems) deceived, it becomes me Sir to be silent, and to be no more sensible of those affronts which are put upon you, then your self are: and since you are pleased to testify your temperance so far, as to forget your own injuries, I shall perhaps (whilst I passe the rest of my dayes in exile for saving you) be sorry that Cyrus, Sonne to the wise Cambises, and virtuous Mandana, should sink under the wrongs of the King of Medes, who without all question will attempt upon his illustrious life either by Poiard or Poison: upon Cyrus, I say, from whom such high acts are expected, and who may now if he had but a minde, take a full revenge, prevent the storm, preserve the Persian ancient Laws and Liberties, become Lord of a large Kingdom, and perhaps of all Asia; him whom the Gods by so many Prodigies do invite unto Sovereign Dominion, and act as I propound unto him; and who tell him that if he undertake this warre, if he ransack all Medea, conquer all the Land, and mount into the Throne of Astiages, he then does no more, but what is just, and the pleasure of the Gods for him to do. If it were their pleasure to have it so (answered Cyrus sharply) they can tell how to bring it to passe without my entremedling: However, I do not conceive it Just, and I am resolved never to wear a Crown upon unjust termes. Kingdoms are not got without Combat (answered Harpagus,) and Glory is a Cruel Mistress, which will never be enjoyed by any but such as Court her in a field full of dangers. I shall expose my self unto dangers enough (replied Cyrus) in not destroying him whose design is to destroy me: But let me entreat your Patience Harpagus, untill we can do it more Nobly, and if I be not much deceived, I shall acquit my self with more Honour in this innocent warre within these woods, then in that: Mean time, to make it manifest, that I am indulgent towards Astiages, so I will be just to you, know, that if you shall inform me of any other, who shall be culpable of the like injuries, he shall not escape my revenge: For your part, Harpagus, since you would not consent unto my death, nor put the cruel commands of Astiages into act; I will present you unto the King my Father, and the Queen my Mother; this Court shall be your Sanctuary, Provided that you do not hereafter propound any thing which may divert my duty to Astiages: I shall think it was the heat of your zeal to serve me, prompted you unto these unjust Propositions: and I shall consider that as it is my duty to respect my enemy, so I shall think my self obliged to gratifie him who preserved me from his injuries. But Harpagus said he with a more pleasant aspect, it is not now a convenient time to talk more with you, and I am very sorry to break off any discourse of Wars, Combats, Victories and Triumphs. After these words, this miraculous Childe turned towards the company; and Harpagus being ravished with the wisdom of so young a Childe, accepted of his offer, only desired him that he would be pleased to acquaint the Queen his Mother, and know her pleasure, before he appeared in Court; which Cyrus did also promise him: thus Harpagus parted from him, and mingled with the multitude; and Cyrus also went away with intentions to follow the sports no longer. I then had the Honour to be near him, and was appointed by the King and Queen, to have the particular care of him: And Feraulas whom you see here, being but too years elder then Cyrus, waited upon him as a Playfellow, being very fit for such a purpose, and of a close reserved inclination. Feraulas was the first, who observed how the minde of Cyrus was troubled, and coming unto me, who at that time did not minde him; Sir (said he to me) methinks the Prince is very reserved, and melancholy upon a sudden, from whence should this change arise? I know not (said I) nor did I perceive he has had any mischance all this day: Perhaps (said he to me) the man whom I saw talking a long time with him in private, hath told him something which hath angred him. As we were thus discoursing, Cyrus came near us, and said, Chrisantes, I would speak with you; all the company then kept their distances, and the Prince began to tell me, in a low voice, all which Harpagus told unto him, with his answer unto it: he told it me with such gravity, wisdom, generosity and spirit, as really I was amazed, and lookt upon him as a miracle: When he did express that Joy which he apprehended when Harpagus offered him an Army of thirty thousand men: Oh Heavens, with what unwillingness did he refuse it: and when he would shew his sorrows, that it was not permitted him to accept the offer, he expressed it to the life: I cannot beleieve any man of greatest wisdom and highest Page 38 parts that ever this age produced, could with more prudence, wisdom and nobleness, detertermine upon a matter so nice and curious, as he did upon a sudden. He repented him though of his promise to protect Harpagus, and of presenting him unto the Queen his Mother; for, thought he, if she should know of her Father Astiages his cruelty, it would but become her torment, and it would be an infinite grief unto him, to be a cause of hers. In conclusion, he said unto me, Pray Chrisantes tell me, whether I have done well or no, and give me your counsel what I should do in the business; for (said he) although I dare trust unto my own Courage, yet I dare not conclude too much in my own Prudence and discretion, since I have not yet attained unto such years of experience as I dare trust my self: When he had ended, I gave him his deserved commendations, and told him, I thought all he said was very well: but as for acquainting the Queen with what Harpagus told him, I did not conceive why he should not: Take it upon your self then Chrisantes (answered he,) as for my part, I confess it goes against the hair of my disposition to tell so bad a story: I promised him that I would; When we came to Persipolis, Cyrus went unto the Kings Lodgings, and gave me opportunity to go unto the Queens: I acquainted her with the Adventure, and it moved her unto much Joy and much sorrow, for she desired to keep the Prince ignorant of Astiages her fathers cruelty: also she did much rejoice that her Sonne was so rarely qualified, and had returned so wise an answer. Upon the whole matter she charged Cyrus to speak nothing of it unto the King his Father, since it was irreparably past, and would but most unprofitably vex him. As for Harpagus, she thought it but just to protect him; and that it was necessary to detain him still in Persea, in order to the Reconciling him unto Astiages: for said this virtuous Princess, although the King my Father was too too blame, yet I am his Daughter, which is argument enough, for me to preserve him to the utmost of my power; therefore Harpagus must not upon any terms depart a malecontent; since he has thirty thousand men at his devotion, which may kindle such a war in Medea as may prove its ruin: It were better Policie to let this my own Country be his Sanctuary, then another Princes, who by his power and Intelligence, may become prejudicial unto me and my Father also. Alas, alas (said he) what crosse Fate is this? Harpagus, as he is Rebel to my Father, should be my fo; but as he preserved my Sonne, must be my friend, and deserves protection. The King of Medes, as he is my Father, I owe him all obedience and love; but as he is my Sons enemy and would destroy him (if I may say it,) I do hate him. What think you Chrisantes? how can I reconcile these things? In conclusion, after she had well weighed all circumstances, she resolved to move the King her Husband for Harpagus his Protection, as one who had been an ancient servant unto her Father the King of Medes; and whom he banished for some cause which afterwards she would devise: and to stay him in Persia as long as they could, least he should cause a war in Medea: But withall to contrive it so, as that he should dwell in the Country, and not appear in Court, least the entertaining of him should become offensive unto Astiages. She gave me an especial charge, to prevent his coming near young Cyrus, least he should corrupt his thoughts: All things are transacted according to these Resolutions: The Queen is extremely fond of her Sonne, and commends him for his discretion in his carriage of the business; Harpagus is civilly treated, and presented unto the King her husband; afterwards sent unto one of the Kings fairest houses, with orders taken for his subsistancy, and kept continually in hopes. All this while, Astiages is not rightly composed in his minde; but still fears least the menaces of the gods should be seconded with some disastrous effects: He had Spies constantly at Persipolis, who gave him intelligence of Harpagus his arrival and reception; and how he had Conference with the Prince in the Forrest; for afterwards, several Persians knew Harpagus, and divulged it: He also had advertisement how the Province of Paretacenes, whereof Harpagus had been Governour, stood affected, and that he had opportunity to make head, if he had a disposition to it: He had also several Informations, of secret Assemblies and Consultations, the Causes whereof he was ignorant: All this, coming at one time to him, from divers places, added to his own timorous disposition, did cause him to reassume his former fears and inquietudes: He assembled the whole pack of the Magi; they consult afresh with the Gods and Starres; they pray, and offer Sacrifices; upon the result of all, they tell Astiages, that they would never fail in their fidelity, nor conceal what they discover in the Starres and Victims, which seemed to portend nothing but destruction and change, and that presently: for doubtless ere long the effects would follow the malignant signs: there needed no more to wound the soul of that Prince who was always naturally apt enough to beleieve them: and who by other concurring circumstances did too apparently see the probability of what the Magi told him. Page 39Ciaxares his Son was yet King only of Cappadocia, and had one only daughter. This jealous Prince apprehended that if young Cyrus had any design in forging, he might much more easily put it in execution then if Ciaxares had a Sonne, knowing well enough that the people do commonly more affect a King then a Queen: Moreover Harpagus being fled into Persia, who had such a strong Faction, and good intelligence within his Dominions, it was therefore to be doubted things would not succeed well upon that score. Thus Astiages, fearing every thing, and supposing his own shadow to be a Plot: and apprehending not only things semblable, but also absolute impossibilities, he became the most wretched man that ever was. The Queen of Persia had also intelligence of all her fathers distempers; for as he had his Spies in Persipolis, so had she hers in Ecbatan, who every hour advertis'd her; and who upon this news renewed her sorrows. It was her pleasure to honour me so far as to discover her fears, and tell me how she doubted the King of Medes her Father, being prompted by his old Passions, would take some violent design in hand to destroy her Son Cyrus; her experience of things past was a ground for her jealousy of things to come: I diverted her Passion as much as possible, but she being a woman of a high and apprehensive soul, it was not easie absolutely to remove her resentment, since there was so much reason in it, since Astiages might act such a thing in some close private manner as we could not foresee. However, she commanded me to have an extraordinary care of Cyrus her Son, and to prevent his hunting as much as I could, but not to let him know the reason; for it might be imagined that if Astiages had any Plot upon his life, he might there in wilde Forrests finde a fit opportunity for it. I promised my obedience, and found it no great difficulty to observe her order: for since the last time of hunting Cyrus became so deeply melancholy, so as that which before was wont to be a pleasant Recreation, did now but augment his humour: Yet notwithstanding he was of such a natural and sweet Complacency, that when I attempted to observe the Queens Commands very punctually, I was not denied my Request unto him: for as he desired one day to hunt, more for custome and company then any delectation he found in the sport, I told him that I had some advice to give him, which I humbly besought him might be well accepted: he assured me that he would ever follow my Counsel without contradiction; Then I told him that as hunting in his younger years might be allowed him as his businesse, so on his riper years of discretion, it should be used seldome and as a recreation only: therefore it would appear an act of wisdom to forbear it, or at least use it not so often as he was wont. Your Advice good Chrisantes (said he to me) is very good: and it is not long since I did entreat Feraulas to assist me in contriving some ingenious waies, wherein I might more nobly imploy my time. Sr said I to him, Feraulas deserves the honor of your love, and his advice is to be asked. But I conceive it no great difficulty to finde out many waies wherein your hours might be better spent then in hunting Chrisantes (said he to me) it is not so easie as you imagine. Whilest we were thus in discourse, the Queen sent to enquire for Cyrus, so that the hunting and our Discourse both, were at this time prevented. Some few daies after, the King took a journey about some great businesse, which would be a Moneth before his return: he left the Queen and Prince both at Persipolis, with orders to stay there until his Return: After he was gone, Cyrus would hunt no more, but was composed all of gravity and sadness: I pressed Feraulas to tell me the cause of his Melancholly, but I could not get a syllable out of him what the Prince had told him. I urged him again, and that so importunately, as at last he told me how Cyrus complained he could not endure this idle kinde of life, and often lamented it unto him: after this, the Prince grew to be of so dull a complexion as he was not knowable; The lively features which formerly moved adoration in all the Ladies of the Court, are all dampt and vanisht: his thoughts run no more of hunting, his study is musing and pensiveness: He forgot his exercises of darting, shooting, and the like: Solitude is the only life he leads: The Queen was much troubled at this alteration: And many times told him of it, but his answers were, that some sleight, simple indisposition had produced these effects in him, and humbly desired her not to trouble her self about it any more: Harpagus all this while, he cheers up himself in hopes that when Cyrus is elder, he may then chance to exchange some of his affection for some ambition; which might then afford him some opportunities of acting that which he was now but plotting. Thus being the state of things, I one day observed the Prince more pensive and sad then ever: and seeing he refused all manner of recreations or society, I said unto him, Sir, you have ever heretofore done me the honour to beleieve me whensoever I took the boldnesse to advertise you of any thing which might conduce unto your good: I perceive that of late you have habited your self unto such a quite contrary course or life then that which Page 40 you were accustomed, as I cannot chuse but ask the reason: Have you not often told me Chrisantes (said he) that the joys of children ought not to be the businesse of men? I have told you so indeed Sir (answered I) but yet there is a great deal of difference between playing the childe, and doing nothing at all. 'Tis true Chrisantes (answered the Prince) if I should do no more hereafter then I do at present, I were not worthy to live; yet the unhappinesse of my condition doth in this intervall, give me leisure to contrive waies of changing my idle course of life. Why Sir (said I to him) do you say your unhappy condition? Are you not the Son of a great King and a great Queen? Doth not fortune so much smile upon you as that you are beloved of your Subjects and feared of your enemies? You, I say, who shall one day be possessor of a great Kingdom, where such a lasting peace is so surely settled as nothing can disturb it: you whom the gods have adorned with so many admirable Qualities, of so generous a minde, so sublime a soul; all whose inclinations are noble, whose person is admirably handsome, whose strength so incomparable, and whose proportion of body, moved by so couragious a soul may easily prompt you to the most heroike actions. Suppose I were all these you tell me (answered Cyrus very quickly) and that they were spurs to quicken me unto high actions, and that the gods have given me such qualities to employ them in common, poor, idle things, am I not then the most unhappy man alive to make no bettler use of them? If I should continue this course of life long, posterity would not know that Cyrus ever lived: No no Chrisantes, I am not so happy as you think me, especially since the time that Harpagus talkt with me in the Forrest: Let me tell you, I have endured such anguish of soul ever since, as you would pity me if you knew it: and I would acquaint you with it, if you will promise to be faithfull and obey me; Sir (said I to him) I shall never fail in my fidelity, and I will promise ever to obey you so far as your commands are just. I desire no mote (said he) then looking upon me with such an aspect as would win the heart of a savage man, My Dear Chrisantes (said he) if you knew the torments of minde I have endured, I am sure they would move compassion: Harpagus you know motioned a war unto me, and I refused it. Doth it repent you Sir? (said I, interrupting him.) No, (said he) but it troubles me that any man should propound any difficult businesse unto me, and I not in a condition to accept it; not to dissemble with you, If I had followed the suggestions of my own minde, I should not have been eight daies after that crosse accident, but would have found out some ware in some Countrey or other, that I might thereby make it apparent unto Harpagus and all the world how the only reason why I refused his motion was, because I thought it unjust, and not because I thought it difficult or dangerous: Who knows (said he) whether Harpagus will think it cowardise or temperance in me? I am now of age wherein my valour may be suspected; and I shall never rest satisfied until by some honourable and dangerous adventure I have justified my self, and redeem'd my honor: This is it Chrisantes, I am infinitely weary of my idle, nor can I understand why you should commend me as you have done unless it were to rouse up my dull soul unto sprightly Action. It hath been my Lesson never to be weary in any Action I shall undertake, and that delicacy is a crime: I have been taught that Valour is essentially requisite in a Prince: and how he ought to fight, to know the use of his Bow, his Spear, his Buckler, his Sword; but to what purpose are all these if he never use them? what good is there in ability of body to endure hardship, if I should be ever treading in the smooth pathes of the Courts tranquillity? What use can I make of my Valour, as long as I am lul'd in a lasie Peace? What shall I be better for combatting with wild beasts, which know nothing but as nature teacheth them? In short, Chrisantes (not to conceal my soul from you) I conceive the sapient documents and instructions, which have been infused into me, do all authorise the design which I resolve upon as soon as ever I can get an opportunity for it; And what is your design, said I to him? I would (answered he) leave the lazy Court, and travel into Assiria, and from thence into Phrygia, or any place where I shall hear there is any war: I have a desire to instruct and improve my self to the best advantage, I would learn to know my self, and all the world. Your Design is great (said I) and proceeds from a most Noble Soul; But Sir, such designs as these ought not to be so lightly and inconsiderately taken up: I do not well know (answered Cyrus) how shall I take it, since fortune doth oppose me; but this I know, that I will employ the utmost of my power to undertake it. Good Chrisantes, Let me entreat you not to dissuade me, for all you can possibly say will be in vain; I am thoroughly resolved upon it: I am not ignorant of that duty which I owe unto the King my Father, and unto the Queen my Mother, I am infinitely tender of them both, but yet my desire of honour and love of glory is above both. Whether you allow or disallow of this Resolution, beleieve me, Dear Chrisantes Page 41 I will finde out a way to put it in execution, or death shall be the only obstacle which can hinder me. Cyrus pronounced these words with so much active animosity, and with such heroick violence, as I paw'd and wondered, and could not answer: his eyes more then ordiary sparkling: his complexion more vermilion; every part so agile, and his discourse so positive, that there was no contradictions to be thought upon. I must confess, I did much honour this budding virtue in him; and I could not contend, with what I so much liked and admired: In conclusion, I desired eight dayes time for consideration, not liking to undertake a matter of this consequence too rashly, but I had much ado to obtain it, for he was resolv'd to be gone whilst his Father Cambises the King was in his progress: Then Sir, I did think my self strangely entangled in the business: I did perceive by the Queens intelligence from Ecbatane, that the fears and jealousies of Astiages did rather much encrease, then any thing diminish: and I saw that this violent, scrupulous and superstitious Prince, would either destroy Cyrus, or declare a warre upon Persia; and that it was impossible to prevent the one of these two: I presently address my self unto the Queen, and told her, that I discovered every day more and fresh discontents in the Prince her Sonne, and moved her to perswade the King her Husband, that the Prince her Sonne might undertake some Travels; and in a disguise see the world, be acquainted with the Manners of other Countries, and remove from under that malignant Constellation, which in this place, at this time was so predominant. But she answered me, That she thought Cambises, being perswaded the Manners of the Persians, were more virtuous then those of other People, he would therefore never consent unto it, unless he had some strong Arguments to induce him thereunto: yet as for her part, in consideration of the King her Father his humours, she did not much disapprove of the motion: I perceived she had some inclinations that he Sonne should be removed, but, that her Maternall tenderness, joyned with her desires of concealing her Fathers cruelty from Cambises knowledge did impede it: and that this was her only reason which hindred her from absolute consenting to his departure: both she and I did conceive much likelihood of producing good effects, provided he were so handsomely disguised, and not discovered by the Spies which Astiages had lurking in every corner of Persipolis: Moreover, she considered that the King of Medes her Father was old, and of a mutable disposition: therefore it might so happen, that during her Sonnes travell, he might either die, or alter his minde, when he knew that he, who was the cause of his fears, was far enough remote from being in the head of any Army, to trouble him: and since he was so giddily travelled without any Accommodations or Train proportionable to his quality. And though the Queen did well enough resent and understand all this, and confessed it, yet the presence of her Sonne was so deer unto her, as she could not fix upon this harsh resolution, however so full of reason. I, pondering all these Circumstances, and knowing that Honour was the only motive which prompted Cyrus to this design, also conceiving it the only prudential course for the preservation and maintaining of Peace between these two great Kingdoms, then I resolved with out disclosing any of these reasons unto the Prince, to consent unto his desire, and I my self to be a partaker of his Fortunes, and a witness of his virtues, from which I expected high achievements. Certainly it was not without great reason that I concealed from him the causes of all our fears which we apprehended of his Life, if he had stayed any longer in Persia; for doubtless if he had known the truth, he would quickly have altered his resolutions, and would not have quit the Name of Cyrus for that of Artamenes, which now I advised him to take upon him, I cannot express the joy this Prince was in, when I went unto his Chamber and told him, that he had overcome me, and that I would consent unto his desires, upon condition he would promise me, that in all the voyage, he would be pleased to promise me, to condescend unto mine, and be rul'd by me: Indeed, I never in all my life saw so many signs of full satisfaction, as appeared in his looks: Ha, my Chrisantes (cried he out, and embracing me) since you have consented in this, fear not but I will obey you in any thing. Let us go; let us go upon any conditions; for as long as you shall demand nothing but what is just and honourable, be confident, I will never disobey. In conclusion Sir (not too much to abuse your Patience,) it was resolved, that Cyrus, and I, and Feraulas (from whom he had not hid the design,) and two other servants, should be all the number. As for our subsistence, we took with us all the Princes Jewels, which were not a few nor common ones, though the Persian Nation does openly profess to contemn all such magnificent superfluities; but the Queen following the custom of her own Countrey, brought with her a vast number, and gave the most and best of them unto Cyrus her Sonne, who seldom wore them, unless at publike Feasts and grand Ceremonies, intending to poise himself between the magnificent Mede, and Page 42 the moderate Persian. We put up all these Jewels, and pretending to Hunt with a small number, we did prolong the Chase until night; then dispersing our selves in the Forrest; and meeting at an appointed Rendez-vous, we took our way and began our voyage; the horrid sequel where of affrights me when I think upon it: But before our departure, the Prince writ unto his Father, asking pardon for departing out of the Kingdom without his leave: He wrote another Letter also unto the Queen his Mother upon the same subject; and without acquainting me, he left a Note to be conveyed unto Harpagus; in which he told him, that though he had refused his offer, yet he should see ere long, by what Rule he squared his Actions: As for my part, I thought it not good for me to write unto the Queen, least the King should come to see what I writ, and gather something out of it, which the Queen would have concealed. Now Sir, Cyrus must cease to be Cyrus; and under the Name of Artamenes you shall understand some of his glorious Acts. After we had layn three dayes in the wildred Forrest, where we chang'd our habits, and travelled three nights, we arrived at Susianes; that way seeming more safe then the other to passe into Assiria, of which you know Babylon is the Metropolis; a Town, then of the greatest splendor of any that ever was. But Sir, it befits me not to speak of it before you, since you all, except Thrasibulus, contributed to the destruction of it, and therefore are not ignorant: I will only tell you, that though Artamenes had no intentions to take part with the Assirian against the Phrygian, because the Assirians were the old enemies of Astiages; yet we went thither to see the Court, which then was the greatest and most pompous in all Asia. When we approached neer it; the object did much delight Artamenes. As we passed along the banks of the River Euphrates, we admired the situation of this proud Town, which stood between two of the most famous Rivers in the world, Tygris and Euphrates. Here, passed by us, two men talking together, how that the Queen was possessed with great Joy, and great sorrow, both together: Artamenes did overhear them; and you must know Sir, Cambises had alwayes a great desire that his Sonne should be taught the Languages of all the prime Nations in the world: It was his customary Speech, that it were very strange a Prince should not understand the Language of that Nation from whom he would entertain an Embassadour: so that both Artamenes and I understood that Language: Artamenes then understanding what these two men said, addressed himself very civilly unto them, and asked them in their own Language: What did the Queen so much joy and so much sorrow at? The one answered; That her joy was, because about some eight dayes since, the tedious warre between the King of Assiria and the King of Phrygia, was happily ended: a happy Peace was concluded upon advantageous termes, and joyfully proclaimed about some two dayes since: But the joy of this great Queen, who solely governed the Kingdom since the death of the King her Husband, although she had caused the Prince her Sonne to be crowned King, this joy I say was turned into great sorrow; the reason of it is, because she having but this only Sonne, whom she intended to marry unto the Daughter of a Prince called Gadates, with whom this Peace was concluded, and whom this Prince could not affect, was gone from the Court, and none knowes what is become of him. After the man had thus satisfied the Princes demands, and the Prince returned thanks, the man took his way and we ours: But when I lookt upon Artamenes, and found him all sadness, What Sir (said I to him) have you any such interest in the business of the Queen Nitocris, as that you should be a partner in her grief? Chrisantes (said he to me) Although I know this Princess to be the glory of her Sex, and the fame of her Name and Vertues moves me to a high esteem of her, yet it is not her sorrow troubles me most; but I am vexed at the giddy fantasticalness of my fortune: I come hither to seek for a warre and finde all hushed up in Peace: I thought to finde a turbulent Country, turmoil in confusions and divisions; and behold, all compos'd into tranquillity: I hearkened for the shrill sound to Trumpets, and I hear nothing but acclamations of joy: I went to the Court to see how the most potent Prince of Asia lived in this most stately Town, and it seems hee's fled, and nothing but Cries and Tears where I expected such Magnificence: But Feraulas (said he turning towards him,) this shall disquiet me no more, and if other business troubled me no more then this, my heart would be more at ease: Feraulas, as well as I, did cheer him up, and told him, that the disgrace which he apprehended concerning Harpagus, was nothing, nor so great as it seems he thought it: yet notwithstanding we went into Babylon, and observed it with much circumspection: The Prince viewed the Fortifications, and I was amazed to hear with what judgement he spoke of those things in which he had never been versed or instructed: The Martial humour of this Prince, caus'd us to stay longer upon such things then any other: He did most seriously view the prodigious walls of the Town; the Moats and Ditches Page 43 full of water which inviron'd it; the hundred gates of brass, which shut and opened into it; the River Euphrates which added much strength unto it: He lookt upon these more precisely then upon the magnificence of the Kings Palace, or the rare Gardens, which may be said to be in the aire, because they are over all the Houses and all the walls: Nor did he much minde the Temple of Jupiter Belus, which you know is one of the greatest Rarities in the world: In all his walks, and all his Journeys, all his thoughts, and all his discourse was all of warre: If I were to take this Town (would he say,) I would assault it on that side: And when he saw a great Plain which had any rising ground about it, he would tell me, that he should be Master of the Field, if he gave battle unto the Enemy from that piece of ground: Thus did we view Babylon; and because many things were very remarkable, we stay'd a moneth in it: During which time, we often saw the Queen, who doubtless was one of the greatest Princess in the world: It was she which built that magnificent Bridge, that huge piece of work, whereby she turned the course of the River Euphrates, which hath since caused much sorrow unto Artamenes: Notwithstanding her grief for the absence of her Sonne, yet she did not desist from the work, but we saw her every morning and evening, go her self to halsten it on, which has rendred her famous unto Posterity: In this Court we saw Mazares Prince of Saces, who since, was much engaged in my Masters Adventures, and has caused him a thousand sad disasters, such as was like to be at the Price of his Life. Artamenes one day thinking upon Nitocris and her great work, turned to me and said: This Princess makes me wonder at the industrious care which she takes about this work: Certainly her aims in it are all for Fame and Glory; But poor I have not yet done any thing to advance my honour. Disquiet not your self Sir (said I to him) since you are yet but young and cannot complain of any lost time, you have much before you, and will have occasions enough to make you talk on: At last we satisfied his impatience and left Babylon, because we had intelligence that there was some signs of a war began to appear between the King of Lidia and the King of Phrygia: But as I was not so forward as he to run into danger, so I endeavoured to stay him until such time as the wars were publicly declared, yet to travell both the Countries without engaging on either side: at my desire he consented, when he call'd to minde his promise of being ruled by me all the voyage: and he resolved to perform his word though with much repugnancy: So we travelled those Countreys which were govern'd by those great Princes, and Artamenes, though as impatient as any to have his arms on, yet was perswaded by me: It must be acknowledged that the Greek Nation hath many advantages above others, and if it were united as it is divided, and if those which dwell in the ancient Countrey would concur with those who inhabit Asia, then perhaps they would teach obedience unto all them which they term Barbarians: Well Sir, after we had seen many places, which would be over-tedious to relate, we came to the Town of Milete, which we found to be very factious, some lamenting their Prince which others had deposed, and those others plotting how to prevent his ever-restoration, lest they should be treated as Traitors: We saw the Towns of Mius and Prienns both of them within Caire: We went afterwards to Classomenes, to Phocius, and Ephesus, where the beautiful Temple of Diana told Artamenes, that our own Nation might be ashamed they did not build such another, but that they should so offer their sacrifices upon the tops of mountains: Concerning that, the best works of all the Sons of men were yet farre too unworthy to be the house of God. Certainly this Temple is a peece so magnificent, that it well deserves the name of the worlds wonder. We understood that the late King of Lidia named Alliatte, Father of Craessus, who now reigns, had great devotion unto this place, and how he sent hither offerings so rich as the Temple of Delphos had not the like, although it was fam'd all over the world, and more ancient then that of Ephesus: We understood here also, that the Inhabitants of that Famous Town were not well pleas'd with Craessus, as they were formerly with his Father, having some jealousies he intended war upon them: Artamenes stayed here some daies longer then intended, purposely to draw into the businesse: During which time we could not chuse but wonder at the multitudes of strangers which resorted hither to consult with the Oracle. I moved Artamenes to enquire concerning the successe of his voyage and fortunes, yet he would not, but told me that he had more reverence unto the gods then to pry into their secrets, nor was it fit to satisfie fond curiosity so far as to fore-know his future Fortune: yet that which chiefly restrain'd him (as I conceive) was his fear not to finde that in the answer of the gods, which he so much desired, to wit, Glory, and the occasions to acquire it, War: but the Event of things did shew how his fears were falsly groundd, and that the Destinies would have told him nothing but of his Victories and Triumphs: Whilst we were at Ephesus Page 44 we conversed with many Grecians which came to that place, some out of Devotion, and some Curiosity: amongst the rest Periander King of Corinth came hither in disguise, and lodged in the same place with us: Many terms of Friendship past betwixt him and me (if it become to say so of a Sovereign.) This wise Prince whose wisdom was in highest esteem throughout all Greece, had so great a phansie unto Artamenes, as he forced me to promise him, as soon as our affairs would permit, to travell unto Corinth. After we had past over all Chaire and part of Lidia, we visited both high and low Phrygia: in the first of these we saw that great Town of Apameus, and in the other the mountain Ida, the Port of Tenedos, the River of Xanthis, and the deplorable ruines of Troy; Artamenes staid here with much delight, and viewing the places where the valiant Hector and famous Achilles fought, he could hardly stir off it: at last we past on, and behold the Tomb of this Demigod. As we came into Jonia, we procured a man of the Isle of Samos, who being a great Scholar, well travelled, and very knowing in all Antiquity, became our guide, and shewed unto us all that was rare: Artamenes asked him a thousand Questions concerning Troy and its Leaguer. There remains yet some ruines of the two Marble Castles which neither the Flames nor old Time had yet demolished. The Prince was much pleased with the sight, and went over all the Ruines, and Rocks, and over the Famous Rivers of Scamander and Simois. This Countrey, which heretofore did flow with Noble blood, seemed now to be a Land consecrated unto the gods of Peace; This Leamed Grecian which we had with us, told us that Periander whom we had seen in Ephesus, was not the only wise man of Greece, but that the Nation was now as full of wise and excellent men, as in the daies of Agamemnon, Ulysses, and Nestor. This commendations moved Artamenes to have a great desire of going thither. So that we seeing the wars in Phrygia proceeded no further, I perswaded him to passe into Greece, to which he consented, and we went. To begin with the most famous first, We came to Athens, which we much admired, as well for that Famous Port of Pireus, as the excellent order of Laws here established by a man of great wisdom whose Name was Solon, and who did voluntarily banish himself ten years for his own Countrey: To the end his Laws might thereby not be changed, he having obliged the Citizens by Oath to observe them until his return: Artamenes came here acquainted with Pisistrates, who as some said became Tyrannicall; Whilst we were at Athens, there was a flying Report that Solon was in the Isle of Cyprus. so that I confesse I did forward Artamenes his desire of going thither, as well to see that fair Island sealted in the Aegian Sea, also that Famous Temple of Venus, as to be acquainted with that prudent Graecian, but we were not so fortunate as to finde him there, yet it was Artamenes his good fortune to contract friendship with a Prince called Philoxippos, a man of high spirit and great vertue: But I will not trouble you with every particular passage of our Voyage, and omit many Islands which we saw in the Aegian Sea; I will only tell you that after our coming to Athens, whether my Master promised Philistaates to return, we went to Lacedaemon, which government did not please him who thought all the Earth too little to fill up the chinks of his ambition. This Great Soul, thought two Kings in one Kingdom incompatible: At last we came to Delphos, Argos, Micenes, and Corinth, where we were magnificently treated by the wise Periander: for this gallant man ever thought the Laws of Hospitality inviolable, and that strangers could not be welcomed with too much Civility: It was his pleasure that the Princess Cleobuline his daughter, whose beauty and wit was fam'd throughout all Greece, should honour Artamenes with her converse: he was as exact in the Greek tongue as any Native. Periander to entertain him caused Arion (that famous Musician as well for his excellency in that Art as for the Dolphin which preserved him) to play before him. I will trouble you no more Sir with many remarkable passages, and how my Master did infinitely better himself by the observation of the several Manners and Customes of those people and places where he came: But in the Conclusion of all, I must tell you, that at the Port of Corinth where men from all parts arrive, there we came to know, that the war between Lidia and Ionia was now broke out and published, and that the storm which had long hovered, was now fallen upon them: Upon this Artamenes becomes all Impatiency till he were in Arms, and presently resolved for Ephesus, there to engage with them against Craessus their Enemy. In taking leave of Periander he told him how desirous he was to recompence the Graecians for the Civilities which he had received from them. So Periander furnishing us with a well tackled Ship we put to Sail with a favourable winde. Artamenes thought now he had met with an opportunity to put that prodigious valor, which nature had infused into him into practice: his desire of glory did elevate his soul so high, as that he was wrapt into a heaven of unimaginable joy? But Fortune which had made him wait so long for an opportunity, Page 45 did now offer him one which he looked not for, and which was like to have proved very fatal unto him; for suddenly a Marriner cried out, he discovered four Sail of Ship coming towards them, and if we looked not well about us, they would immediatly fetch us up: The Pilot he lookt, and was more dismayed then the first: for he discovered that it was certainly the valiant Pirate who made up to assault us. Pardon me, Generous Thrasibulus, (said Chrisantes, and breaking of his Story) If in following my Narration exactly, if I give you a Name which was so much renowned in all the Seas where we passed. No no (said Thrasibulus to him) I think never the worse, that you should give me a name which my ill Fortune made me assume, and which perhaps better Fates may render more considerable upon the Aegian, Hellespont, and Euxian Seas, and which may wipe off all that infamy which waits upon the Quality of a Pirate: Continue on your Story, and omit not the least circumstance which relates unto the Story of Artamenes. Chrisantes, seeing Thrasibulus silent, and all the Princes prepared for attention, he went on. The Pilot then being confident it was the valiant Pirate which came with resolutions to set upon us, without any further order endeavoured to shun all encounter, and fly from such an enemy as alwaies used to conquer; especially since their number so exceeded us: which Artamenes no sooner saw but he took hold of him with one hand, and hold of the stern with the other; No no, said he, thou shalt not be Master of this Ship if thou beginnest to run away; Mark me, if thou dost not immediately carry me straight unto the enemy, I will throw thee into the Sea, or run thee through with my sword: The Pilot as well as I was so amaz'd at his violence, as he threw himself at his feet, and said, that he did not think he would undertake such an enemy as there was no hopes or possibility of overcoming: Do as I bid thee, said Artamenes, and leave the rest to the gods and my courage, When I heard the Prince say so, and having learned from the Marriners how the famous Pirate was mighty stout; Sir, said I to him) what do you mean to do? I will either conquer or die, said he, and will not loose this first opportunity which Fortune <...> to make use of my valour: But Sir (replied I) how can you conquer where there is neither possibility or hopes of it? Have I not told you (said the Prince) if I cannot conquer I can die; and I had much rather do so then fly and not fight when I have occasion offered: Sir (replied I) to retire from an enemy too numerous and strong, is not a disgraceful flight, but a prudent and honourable retreat, and you ought not to mix rashnesse and valour together: Discretion is the better part of valour; I know not how to make these faint distinctions (said the Prince very roughly to me) I am afraid to be deceived by them in a business which concerns my honour; the surer way is to fight, and that I'll take: Therefore (said he, speaking to the Souldiers and Mariners) I heartily desire you all to prepare your selves for fight, and imitate me: During this Argument the four Ships which gave us chase, and were much better Sailors than we, were come so near us, that I saw there was no way but to prepare for defence: and it was not to be imagined that the Prince would now retreat or submit without combat: Then I began to assist the Prince in giving orders: And after we had commanded them all not to row when we were almost within Oar-reach of the Ship, and the Pilot to make towards their Admirall, Feraulas and I rankt our selves next him: I must needs give this Testimony of his vertue, never was seen more constancy and alacrity in so great a danger, as appeared in the soul of this young Prince; He had got ready by him a Bow, a Quiver, abundance of Arrows upon his shoulder besides some in his hands, also many Darts and Javelins, but he thought so little of a Buckler and of any danger, that he had wanted it, if I had not brought him one just when we began to accost the enemy: All this while the Renowned Corsaires sees our inequality, and thought to take us without a blow, but Artamenes is of another minde, and inspires mettle into the Souldiers and Mariners, and commands the Pilot to make towards the enemy who doth so punctually obey, that we were presently within reach of each other; so that in lieu of Vailing Bonnet as Corsaires did believe we would, we saluted him with a Cloud of Arrows which killed many of his men whom we saw tumble down upon the Deck; This bold attempt made the Pirate conclude, that either some man of a most high courage was in the Ship, or else some desperate enemy who would die fighting without submission: He being thus incensed with our bold affront, begins to order himself like a Souldier who knew how to fight: He commanded all his Ships to enclose us round, that so he might the more astonish us and take us without boarding: yet do what they could it was two hours at the least before he could compass us, and if the Prince would have been contented with fighting thus upon such unequal terms, and have retreated without an absolute victory, he might easily have avoided that danger wherein afterwards we were surrounded; for at last these four Ships (in spite of all our Pilots art) did compass us about, Page 46 and fell upon us with such fury, as we fought in darknesse, by reason of the showers of Arrows which covered our Ship, and fell upon our her heads. Artamenes seeing it thus, commanded <...> to make at the Admiral and assault him: we all obey, we grapple, we board him, and begin a fight, the like was never seen: Artamenes leapt into the Ship of Corsaires, at the same time when the Pirate leapt into his: so that in an instant of time these two Generals were amidst their enemies: The fight is now most strange; and that happened upon this accident, as the like I believe will never do again: for we were all very attentive unto Artamenes, and when he leapt unto the Pirates Ship, all of us leapt after him, except some few that were repulsed or killed: on the other side, the Souldiers of Corsaires did the like, and followed their Captain with the like fury that we followed ours. By this confusion Artamenes became Master of Corsaires his Ship, and Corsaires Master of Artamenes: At their first entrances they both rejoiced and thought they had been Victors, but when they perceived their error, and that they had only changed Ships: Artamenes by menaces made the Mariners of Corsaires Ship obey him; Corsaires did the like with Artamenes Mariners; they then began to fight afresh, and strive to reenter into their own Ships: The fight is furious, and this odd chance did a while prolong it, and our destruction; for the three other Ships of Corsaires did not perceive this changing chance, as well because they were far off, as because of the thick clouds of Arrows: therefore they move not a finger against the Ship of their Admiral in which we were, but they assault our Ship in which Corsaires was; so that he could neither defend himself nor offend us; My Master knowing him to be the Chief of the enemies, did undertake him single, with so much vigour and resolution, as none ever saw the like: And all the Mariners who were Spectators of the Combat, did assure us, that Artamenes more than twenty times entered the vessel: and the Valiant Pirate did the like before any advantage on either side did appear; All after their example pushed the Pike, shot Arrows, and did slash with swords: As for Artamenes, he used all these weapons: for when he was far off he shot Arrows; when nearer he used the Pike; and when joyned, his Sword was not idle: The truth is, he was so admirable at them all, as I could not believe it to be him: Presently after, the three Ships discover their error, and fight no more against their Master: but fall all pelmel upon us: Now when Artamenes saw no hopes of any thing but perishing; and spying Feraulas and I near him, (Feraulas I say, of whose valour I will not speak in his presence) he turned towards us all in a fury, and said, I see, My Friends, we cannot overcome, but if you will second me, the Pirats shall pay very dear for their Victory; After this, what did he not do? or what can I say more than is truth? Though he saw the Ship beset round with enemies, and though he found their Commander Corsaires of great courage; and though he saw most of his own men which remained alive almost all wounded, and himself also received a wound with an Arrow upon the left shoulder, yet for all this he was not at all dismayed; he was sometimes at the Prow, and sometimes at the Poop of the Ship: Here he pushed a Pirate into the Sea, there he killed another with his Sword at one blow; and so bestirred himself that one might well know he was incapable of submission: All this while, Feraulas and I had the misfortunes to be so wounded, as we were carried out of the combat; Feraulas having two wounds with a Javeline through both his thighs; and I, two cuts with a Sword upon my right Arm: Yet for all this, though Artamenes saw he was quite lost, and heard me cry unto him, that it was no dishonour to render himself a Prisoner, and that the Pirate would save him; and though he saw the Deck covered with blood, and dead men, yet this Imp of Mars, this inflexible heart of steel would not surrender, but fought on with more violence then before: In conclusion, a Valiant Greek, who was very eminent for combat, did grapple with him; they both tumble into the Sea: Then did all the Souldiers which were alive submit, and the Pirate now having no enemies to resist him, did see some 30 paces off his Ship the invincible Artamenes; who swimming with one hand, and holding his Sword in the other, did yet maintain fight against that Valiant Grecian, which tumbled into the Sea with him, who seeing Artamenes lance always against him with much courage, began a terrible strong Duel: This Greek being elder, much stronger, and lesse wounded, did better resist the violence of the waves, which sometimes did separate them, and sometimes brought them together, sometimes seemed to choke them both, and end their quarrell in triumphing over both; the like Combate was never seen upon Land: I leave you Sir to imagin what effects this wrought upon my soul, who by reason of my wound in the Arm, had lost so much blood, as I could not move or help; Imagin, I say, what I thought when I saw this excellent Prince in such a condition: I know not well what my design was, but I remember how I would have thrown my self into the Sea, but was not able: at last the Pirate being Page 47 charmed with the valour of Artamenes, and seeing him in this danger, commanded five or six of his men to take a little Boat and save him: These men did presently obey his command; and making towards Artamenes, commanded the stout Greek to forbear Combate; whereupon, he got into their Boat, and changed his desires of killing, into endeavours of saving Artamenes. They did their best to catch hold of him, which they could not have done, if he had not been much wearied with swimming, and had received another wound in his right Arm against the Point of a Rock which was invisible within the water: he strives to swim faster, and accost this Boat; and a violent wave wrested his Sword out of his hand: as he was about to dive for it, those which were in the Boat, caught hold, and drew him in; brought him aboard the Ship, and presented him unto the renowned Pirate, who received him with a generosity beyond example; and said unto him, Have I fought with so poor a courage, that you think me unworthy to be both your Conqueror and deliverer? You have fought (answered Artamenes) with so much Courage, that my fears of never equalling you make me despair, and I care not for receiving my Life from that man whom I would have killed and could not. The inequality of your number (answered the most illustrious Pirate very sweetly) does justify your valour sufficiently, and gives excuse enough unto your defeat: if I should Triumph thus again, I should never Triumph more: and I finde my victory so dearly bought and honourable to you; that if there were a Prose to be given unto the Conqueror, I would give it unto you, and not assume it unto my self: When he had spoken thus, he gave command that there should be as great a care of Artamenes as of himself: And after he was informed whose this ship was, and understood them to be meer strangers, whom Curiosity only brought into Greece, then he treated us with much more sweetness then before: I shall not now tell you Sir, of all the Civilities which this Noble Corsaires used towards Artamenes and us all, because the honoured Thrasibulus knows it well enough: I shall only tell you thus much: that if Artamenes had been his Brother, he could not have expressed more indulgence: My Masters wounds were not dangerous, Corsaires was the worse, but both quickly healed: yet Feraulas and I could not so soon recover. Now, although Artamenes could not comfort up himself with any honour he had gotten, since he was not absolutely Conquerour in this first Combate which ever he had made; yet Virtue, being ever full of attractive charmes, caused a great league of Love, insensibly to grow, between him and the renowned Pirate: This Amity was the Cause why this illustrious Pirate was not so forward in offering my Master his Liberty, and why my Master was so backward in asking it. So that the occasions of Corsaires being towards the Euxian bridge, we went along with him: not considering whether or no it would conduce to the good or bad fortune of Artamenes. In our passage thither we put in at Lesbos, where the Noble Pirate had some business: my Master and I went to see a cry'd up Beauty there, whose Name was Saphon, whom all Greece admired; indeed, we found her worthy of that fame, both for her Beauty, and the Verses which she compos'd. But Sir, to come unto the business of my Story: I must tell you in few words, that in our passage to the Euxian bridge, after we had sailed three days and three nights, Corsaires who used to assault others, was now assaulted himself by six Ships. This Combate, which was both long and fierce, Artamenes would needs be in; and performed Acts so gallant and high, that the modesty of the famous Corsaires made him say after the battell, that he ought the victory unto Artamenes: In conclusion, he thought himself so obliged unto my Master, that of three Ships which he had taken he would needs give him two: yet Artamenes would take but one; in which he design'd himself for the Hellespont and the Aegian Sea, and so for Ephesus, intending to send Periander this Ship in lieu of his own, which was much torn and leakie, since the last Combate. Thus he parted from this generous Pirate, not knowing him nor being known unto him; for as they were both resolved not to discover themselves; so they would not ask one another that question which they themselves would not answer unto: And thus their friendship, though very great, did cause them both to moderate their desires, and would not be too inquisitive into what both of them desired to conceal: Also such was the discretion of my Master, that he fought in this last encounter, and never knew against whom, nor so much as asked the question, because he found that the generous Pirate made a mystery of it. Artamenes then, with Feraulas, my self, and to servants more which Corsaires gave my Master, returned from whence we came, and at first found a favourable winde; yet we had scarce sailed six hours, but a terrible tempest began to rise, and that so extraordinary and violent, as the Pilot himself began to tremble: the Air was duskie, the Sea boisterous, and rowled (Montes voluntur aquarum) mountains of waves upon us, and upon one another; it roared horribly, and tost the Ship so Page 48 high, and then again so low, as the Mariners had much ado to keep it upright: the flashes of Lightning, the rumbling of Thunder, and the nights obscurity, all these, made us see when we could see nothing else, That they who are of a lofty compounded soul, cannot fear death, let it appear in what horror it can; for my Master was no more moved at it, then if he had been floating in the calmest River in the world; he gave out Orders without any confusion: Though the Danger was so great, and Death looked so inevitably grim; yet fear did not so much as make him alter his Countenance or discourse. We continued three days and three nights in this manner, and were quite driven out of our aims; for intending at the Euxian Bridge, we found our selves upon the fourth day at Sun rise, cast upon the Port of Sinope, which you know is in Cappadocia, towards the Frontiers of Galatia. I relate this Sir, that you may more wonder at the oddnesse of phantastical Fate, who preserves Artamenes from the fury of the incensed Sea, to cast him in the midst of his enemies Land; for Cixares you know was the Sonne of Astiages; and indeed it was he who had more reason to fear the menaces of the gods then Astiages his Father; who was so old, as he had as many feet in his grave as in his Throne: Yet when we understood that the Court was not at Sinope, but at another Town called Pteria, I was in lesse fears; and though I did not see how it was possible Artamenes should be known, yet I endeavoured as much as might be, not to put in there, but it could not be avoided. We saw from the place where we were, that stately Temple dedicated unto Mars, which, as you know, is a little out of the Town. The next morning, whilst our Ship was repairing which had been much torn by the Tempest, we went to visit the Temple: And as things that are extraordinary, are commonly the discourse of them who travel for Curiosity, and have nothing else to do but see Wonders, the Prince began to ask the reason, why in so many places as he had travelled, he should finde fewer Temples dedicated unto Mars then any other of the Gods or Goddesses; and as if he were jealous of the Honour of that God, he called to memory all the Temples which had been dedicated unto Venus: and found, that there was many more devoted unto that Goddess of Love, then to that God of War: and why Sir (said I to him smiling,) are you an enemy unto that Divinity, which is so much adored throughout all the world, and every one does offer Sacrifices unto her? I am no enemy, answered he, but I am very jealous of the others Honour, and think it fitter that Mars should have more Altars then she: Perhaps (said I) you will not be always in that minde: I know not (answered he) but in the minde I am in now, War shall ever be preferred before Love: You have reason Sir (said I) for the one is much more Heroick then the other, but as zealous as you are now for Mars, you may perhaps one day become a Convert and pay as much Devotion unto Venus. I cannot think so (said he,) I am much deceived if ever that come about; As soon as he had said so, we entered into the Temple, which we found magnificently adorned. There was then very few

People in it, so that we had convenience of observing every thing: we found here in the Temple a stranger of a very handsome garb, and well proportioned, much about the age of Artamenes, or about two years at the most more than he: This Gallant, observing the custom of the Country, where they use to be soon acquainted, came amongst us and discoursed with Artamenes: They earnestly view one another, and with some astonishment: This Stranger found we spoke the Language of that Country which much resembles that of Medes, as well as that of Assyria by reason of its nearness to both: he spoke in the same we did, and seemed to be one of an ingenious spirit: Presently we see much company come into the Temple, and observed to passe before us preparations for some costly Sacrifice; they were a hundred white Bulls crowned with Garlands of Flowers, driven by two Men, the ordinary number for Hecatombs: we saw many vessels of Gold passe by to receive the blood of these Victims: we also saw men carry the sacred Chafing-dishes, on which to burn their Incense; also their rich Knives wherewith to cut their Sacrifices; and all the Sacrificers in their Ceremonial habits, walked two and two together: Presently all was ready to be sacrificed, only there wanted the persons who must offer them: As we were looking upon all these things with much delight, upon a sudden we heard many say aloud, Room for the King; Room for the King: at these words the People pressed unto both sides and made a passage for the King: I confess to you Sir, this accident did much surprise me; and I was very angry to see Artamenes so near Ciaxares, who came this morning from Pteria unto Sinope to offer these Sacrifices: Artamenes, too curious and forward to see these passages, would, whether I would or no, range himself in the first rank of the People, just in the Prince his passe: The train of Courtiers which use always to walk before the King, were come to the Altar: Artamenes who much longed to see the King of Cappadocia, sees him enter, and leaning upon the Arm of Page 49 Aribeas, who was then a great Favourite; after him entered the Princess Mandana his daughter; who without all manner of dispute was absolutely the fairest that ever eye beheld: I no sooner saw her appear, but I saw Artamenes also pressing near her, and leaving the stranger which we met with for a fairer object: This Princess might well kindle such curiosity in the soul of Artamenes as she did: Be pleased Sir to remember, as I told you in the beginning of my Relation, that this Princess was born about three years after Artamenes, so that the first time he saw her, she entered upon her sixteenth year: she was this day most richly drest, and though there did not appear any affectedness in her habit, yet it was infinitely becoming; her Tiffany Vail of Silver did not at all hide the splendour of a thousand rich Jewels set in Gold to deck her Hair, which was the fairest flaxen that ever was seen; her Ornaments did not Eclipse the vivacity of her sprightly looks, which is the essential part of a perfect beauty: She was of an excellent stature, and walked with so much modest Majesty, as she did attract the eyes of all beholders: Her neck no snow so white, her eyes were bluish fair, but so sweet, so lovely, so sparkling, and so full of inviting charms as it was absolutely impossible to look upon them and not admire; Her lips no Rose so red, Her teeth no Ivory so perfect white, nor no Rule so even: Her complexion so pure, so clear, so smooth, and so exact vermillion, that all the lustre of a flowry spring was ugly in comparison of her glorious Idea: Her hands as white and clear as ever any eye beheld, for I beheld this last piece of beauty, as she lifted up her Vail, at her entrance into the Temple, and as afterward with wonder I beheld all the rest: In short Sir, all these beauties and attractive charms which last I related, are good arguments to render Artamenes more excusable: He was so Planet-struck with all the actions and motions of this Princess, that whether she walked or sat, whether she spoke or were silent, whether she smiled or frowned, she was all charms, all attracts, all admirable: With this Divine apparition was Artamenes surprised, and amorously blasted: So that not regarding Ciaxares, he beholds Mandana coming in such a manner as I told you; but fairer by a thousand degrees than any tongue can tell: He was so ravished, that removing from his station, he got up close to the very foot of the Altar where she kneeled: Feraulas and I seeing him do so, pressed up also: and we saw him so placed that he might both see and be seen by her: for I never in the whole course of my life saw such a passage: since the Princess of Cappadocia came into the Temple, Artamenes minded nothing but her: he knew not whether it was a sacrifice, or only an Assembly, or some publique game for a price; he saw nothing but Mandana: He looked upon her continually, and the more he looked the more he liked, and often changed colour: he told us afterwards how he was so wrapt with the Divine Vision, as he had not power to look off her: and he assured us he did what he could to divert his eyes and thoughts, but it was not in his power: Mean while the Sacrifice begins, and the Chief Priest being prostrate at the foot of the Altar, pronounced these words; the King, the Princess, and all observing a hush silence.

For the happiness of this blessed Peace which we enjoy, Accept (O Mighty God of War) these pure and innocent Victims which here we come to offer, in lieu of those which young Cyrus, the terror of all Asia would have offered, if the goodness of Heaven had not established the Thrones of all the Kingdoms of the Earth in Peace by his death. Receive from the King, from the Princesse his Daughter, from all Cappadocia, and from all Medea, these their most devout thanks for the great benefit of his death. His death I say, which hath given a happy Peace unto all Asia, and whose life would have put the whole Earth into confusion and misery.

I leave you to judge Sir, in what a case I was in, and how my Master was started though he minded nothing else but Mandana; for he was much astonished when he heard himself named: I looked him in the face, and he looked upon me, but his mind was upon something else; I removed from my station to come to him: Sir, said I very low, we should not do ill to be gone from hence, but we shall do better (said he blushing) to stay here; When I saw the Prince in that Resolution, I durst not presse him further lest some notice should be taken of us: Then I staid by him, who notwithstanding all this did still look upon Mandana with so much earnestness that he neither minded the death of the sacrifices, nor the perfumes: He perceived no such thing until all the Ceremonies were over, and then <...> King and Princesse his Daughter were going out of the Temple. Then he followed them out, and I think he would have followed them into the Castle whither they went to dinner, and which was some sixty paces out of Sinope, if I had not stopt him. Sir (said I, shewing him the way) that is your way to the Town: then Artamenes, without any answer Page 50 to what I said, but still looking after the Princess Chariot: as long as they were within sight he never turned his head that way: at last we came to the house where we lodged. All this while our Ship was trimming, and putting into some condition to make sail; but when we came to it, there was a great alteration; for Artamenes at his going to the Temple, was all for haste; but at return, he said they made too much haste to do it well. All dinner while, he spoke little, ate lesse: for my part, although I saw him look very attentively upon the Princess of Cappadocia, yet I did not think he could so suddenly, in so short a time be charmed. Presently after dinner, Feraulas, whom we had lost in the crowd, comes back; and he having more particularly enquired into the cause of the Sacrifice, he drew Artamenes and me aside; Sir (said he to him) you must prepare for your departure hence, and that presently: and Why such haste, answered the Prince smiling? because (replied Feraulas you are in a Country where the People give thanks to the Gods for your death; and think it such a happiness as they have offered Sacrifice for it. I know that already, answered the Prince without any motion, but since they think me dead they will not seek me alive. But Feraulas (said I) do you know any more than what you had from the mouth of the Priest when he spoke in the Temple? I have learned (answered he) from one of the Sacrificers, that Astiages, being assured by several intelligences that young Cyrus is perished by shipwrack, and beleeves him to be dead, therefore he hath commanded that same day which is supposed he perished upon, to be a day of Thanks unto the Gods in all the Temples of Medea and Cappadocia, for delivering them from the cause of that apparent danger which the Starres did threaten unto them. Therefore (said he to me) it concerns you to have a care of the Prince his safety, and to consider what would be his Fate if he should be known unto the King or the Princess of this Country, who do so much rejoyce for his death, as that they render publique thanks unto the Gods for it. During this Discourse of Feraulas, Artamenes was very pensive: and perceiving I was going to speak unto him, he prevented me, and said, with a most sad and discontented countenance, Fear not Chrisantes that I shall be discovered, if any thing do it, it will be our too hasty preparations of departure: This may make us suspected, therefore let us stay, and rest quietly: Let us not depart tumultuously. In saying so, he turned from us and would not stay our Answer: Then he took a walk by the sea side, being followed by two Slaves which the valiant Corsaires gave unto him, and Feraulas and I followed presently after: But alas, this walk little pleased him, for we found him in a profound melancholy dump. In short Sir, he was in Love; and loved so desperately, as never man was in more deep Passion. And as this Passion had taken such strong possession of his soul; so the expressions which he had used against Love in his first going to the Temple, caused him to conceal it from us, he being ashamed to discover his weakness. He was continually expostulating with himself what it was which thus troubled him, not well knowing whether it was Love or no: What kinde of torment (said he to himself) is this which I endure? From whence proceeds this restlessness of minde? If the sight of the fairest Angel upon earth, be the cause, then am I the most miserable man alive? Yet methinks such beautiful Objects should not infuse any Passions but delight and joy: How comes it to pass then that the Fairest Prospect which ever eye beheld, should cause my sorrow? I know not (said he) whether I should think it Love, or whether some worse humour: But what is it I would have? or what is it I can have? Alas, alas, I neither know what I would, or what I can have; and hence comes all my misfortune and my sorrows: Yet I am most certain of this; that if I follow my own inclination I must Love the Fair Mandana, as great an enemy as she is unto me; But what do I say, I must Love? Ha, no no, I do explain my thoughts but ill; and my tongue betraies my heart if it do not say, I do Love Mandana, and that I will for ever Love her, and that I think my self the most miserable man unless she Love again. But alas, alas, Miserable unfortunate Artamenes? Came I here to see her offer Sacrifices of Thanks unto the Gods for my death? Did I come to learn how Cyrus can never please her, but in the Tomb wherein she thinks him buried? After these Contemplations his Passion was a little qualified: But presently hope which makes Love live, and undertake all impossibilities, and without which there is no subsistence, did perswade him, that Artamenes and Cyrus were two: and that he, as he was Artamenes, was not at all interest in those things which the Medes resent against Cyrus, son to the King of Persia: and that although Cyrus was hated, yet Artamenes may happily be beloved, if he used the means, and endeavoured by his services to render himself worthy of it: As he was thus entertaining himself with this flattering argument; the ardent desire of Fame and Glory which heretofore had held a strong possession in the heart of my Master, began to come in competition, and dispute Page 51 for victory, with the Princess of Cappadocia: When his thoughts reflected upon this glorious Rival of Mandana, he then began to rouse up and resolve never to think upon the Princess any more: Why should I (said he) forsake a Mistress which will never fail to recompense me and all which follow her; and whose servitude is so glorious, as she rewards them which are faithful unto her, with no less then Kingdoms, Crowns and immortal Glory: What is become now of my eager desires, to know and to be known of all the world? Poor I, who sculks under the false name of Artamenes; and am buried alive to satisfy my enemies? Have I left Persia for nothing else, but to become a foolish Lover of a Cappadocian Princess? and have I left Cyrus to become a Slave unto one who thanks the Gods for my misfortunes? and who perhaps her self with her own hands would throw me into my grave? No, no (said he) I must not be so foolish as to fetter my self. Recollect thy self Artamenes (said he) and remember how oft thou hast been told in Persia, that Love is a dangerous Passion: Stop entrance therefore into thy heart at first, never let it take Possession, and domineer. But alas, (added he presently) what do I say? what can I do? I speak of resistance, and am already fettered: I speak of Liberty, and I finde my self in strong Chains: I think of Reigning, and am a Slave: I speak of Glory and Ambition, and heaven knows, I have no higher then to be Mandanaes servant: and I will never seek any greater honour, then I can finde at the feet of my Princess: I plainly see, that I am more hers then my own, and that all my Reason is farre too weak to oppose Love: My own eyes betray me; my heart has left me, and my will is all hers; I would not Love my life but in hopes to employ it in her service: And I finde that my Reason, as rebellious as it is against my heart, begins to argue in behalf of my Princess; it tells me secretly that Love is the noble cause of all Heroick Actions; that it took up Lodgings in the hearts of all the Heroes: and that the famous Persian, the first King of my Race, for all his valour, was overcome by it, when he first saw his Andromede: It tells me that the Gods themselves were sensible of it; And that it is never idle, but in the hearts of sluggish spirits; yet most agile in the souls of them who are truly generous. In conclusion of all, it tells me, That since Mandana is the Fairest, and most absolute Beauty in the world, I am excusable if I love her: And that though perhaps I shall not be much commended for it, yet it assures me, I shall not be much blamed; Follow on then Artamenes, pursue thy humour which thus transports thee; and make no more resistance against a Fair enemy, whom thou canst not vanquish, or if thou didst, would repent it. After the agitations and tossings of this violent and noble spirit, the Prince began to mend his pace; Feraulas and I followed, but found him so altered, that we began to wonder; such a sorrow sadded his eyes, and all his gestures were so turbulent and disordered, that I began to undertake him, and said; Sir, I cannot understand, from whence all this melancholy can proceed which thus discomposes your face: for though these Sacrifices for your death, I know, cannot be pleasing to you; yet me thinks, such a soul as yours should contemn, and not permit them to trouble you: you I say, who have been taken for dead more then once, and in a more gastly manner, You have reason Chrisantes (said he to me,) to think that this publike thanks is not the cause of my grief; for I assure you, that as soon as Cyrus does revive again, this false joy of his enemies shall be turnd into sorrow. But Chrisantes, there is another cause, which I would tell you if I had but confidence enough; for I do confess your wisdom makes me fearfull to reveal it: Sir (said I to him) one of your age had need be wise to judge of the wisdom of another: This wisdom whereof you speak, knowes no causes of any fear you should have, but shall think him|self honoured where you shall impart any secrets unto him. I know not said Artamenes whether or no I should tell you that—at these words Artamenes stopt, and could not for his heart go any further; but not being able to expresse himselfe he blusht, and sigh'd, and smil'd; at last looking me in the face he said, Do you not guesse my Dear Chrisantes at what I dare not tell you, and for which I fear you will chide me, when you know it? When I heard him say thus, the zeal he used in the Temple, and his eyeing the Princess, made me conclude he was in Love: And remembring what I said unto him, at his first entrance into the Temple; I said unto him, Is it not, that Venus has a minde to be revenged on you for taking Mars his part so much against her? I said this unto him in a laughing and jeasting man|ner, supposing that this humour might chance be but a peece of Gallantry, and a light Phansie which might easily be blown over: But alas, Artamenes, who asked me the question more in earnest, answered me in such a tone, as I saw it must be no common remedy that could cure his disease. But after he had fully opened himself, and told me all, I contributed all I could to divert his thoughts and dissuade him; Page 52 I urged the little reason he had to love so violently, and the impossibility of ever being beloved again: for Sir (said I to him) if you appear as Cyrus, the Princess will be so far from loving, that she will hate you, and Astiages will be sure to load you with fetters at the least: on the other side, if you court her as bare Artamenes, what hopes can you ever have from Mandana? Can a poor simple Knight pretend unto the Daughter of a great King? A Prin|cess who is lookt upon as the sole Successor unto the Crowns of Medea, Cappadocia, Galatia, and Persia also? for since they think you dead, Astiages and Ciaxares will doubtlesse prepare themselves to usurp it, if Cambises die first; And though they both know that the King|dom of Persia is elective, yet since it hath continued successive in the illustrious Line of Per|sides, ever since his time, they will now pretend it ought to be so still; Recollect your self therefore Sir; be a man, and assume your Reason: Cast not your self away frivolously: Hath the gods design'd you for such high things, and must you dream away your time in Love? What would you have me do (said the Prince) I have not rendred my self captive with fight; I have consulted and argued with my self as much as you can, and produced as many reasons: therefore Chrisantes, I cannot promise to cure my self upon a sudden, there must be time for it: therefore urge me no more to depart from hence, but give me time to consider: Sir, Replied I, Love is a disease whose venom is contagious, and of a nature so malignant and subtle, that one cannot too soon fly from the place infected: Those who are already infected, do carry the Disease with them (replied the Prince) although they do change Air; therefore presse me no more to depart I conjure you, unlesse you intend to make the Disease worse. But (said I) if you should chance to be discovered, your Ruine were most certain. It would be more certain (answered he) if I should depart, therefore pray let us submit to Fortune, and talk no more of it; The Prince spoke to me in such a manner as it was apparent he desired I should have some indulgence towards him, so that I was glad the Ship was not trim'd up; The next morning Artamenes went again to the Temple of Mars, pretending to inform himself of some particulars concerning the Country: but indeed his design was to finde out some Subjects, to speak concerning the Princess: He fell into Dis|course with one of the Sacrificers, whom he found to be a man of good ingenuity; he asked this Priest a thousand Questions, before he could handsomely bring in Mandana: at last he asked him, whether Ciaxares had any more Children besides this Princess his Daughter? No, said the Priest, And it is very strange, for the people were wont to affect a King rather than a Queen, but now they have left off that humour; for since this Princess came at age of dis|cretion, her beauty, and her vertue hath so dazled the eyes of all, that they will not change the Queen for any King. Artamenes was ravisht to hear the Priest say so, and said unto him, if the beauty of her soul were like to that of her body, doubtlesse then she deserved that good opinion; Yes, yes, (answered the Priest) a thousand times more excellent and more vertuous then either you or I can imagin: for she is wondrous fair without vanity or affe|ctation; she sits in a Throne without pride, and considers the misfortunes of poor men with compassion, and her bounty doth often relieve them: Those who have the honour to be more about her then I have, do say, that she is of a most winning conversation: As for my self I cannot speak of her but with thoughts of that Piety which she expresseth towards the gods: I can assure you Sir there is none more religious and vertuous then she, nor of great|er wisdom and knowledge in all things that a humane soul is capable of: In a word (added the Priest) she is the honour of her Sex, and a shame unto ours. I leave you to judge Sir, whether the Amorous Artamenes was not in an extasie of joy, that he was not deceived in her; and whether or no this did augment his Passion; He lookt upon me all the time of this Discourse, and was glad he had found so good an excuse for his weaknesse: He lengthened the pleasant Discourse as much as he could, and asked the Priest if she came often unto the Temple? When she was at Sinope (answered he) she came hither almost every day. And where ere she is, she will come one day in a year with the King, to render thanks unto the gods for the death of a young Prince, who if he had lived had usurp'd all Asia; Then she hates his memory (said Artamenes blushing and interrupting him) and is very glad of that mans death, who would have hindred her from being Queen of so many Kingdoms? I never discovered any thoughts of hate in her (said the Priest) and I beleeve her too good to carry malice to the grave, or to hate the man she never knew, especially such a one as he whom report speaks to have been rarely accomplished; she knows it her religious duty to take both the good and the bad which the hand of heaven doth give with an equall Thanks; and since she knows that Conquerors and Usurpers cannot act their designs but by the permission of the gods, who makes them only Instrumental to chastise those whom it is their pleasure Page 53 to dethrone; therefore I suppose her joy proceeds from her knowledge that the gods are appeased by the death of that young Prince whose life did portend destruction to us, but then this Joy is so moderate, and sweetly tempered without the least ingredient of hate or anger, that her soul keeps hell within her limits and without disordered passion. To thank the gods for the death of a man, considering him simply as a man, were impious and sacrilegious rather then any devotion: and neither the King nor the Princess, nor any of the Magi are so ill instructed in Divinity: But to render thanks for the death of Tyrants and Usurpers, who would pull down Thrones, and depopulate Kingdoms, is an act both of justice and piety, which doth not contradict the Rules of Religion, humanity or justice: Artamenes did hearken unto this Discourse with such different resentments, as indeed I pitied him: some|times he was all joy, and sometimes all sorrow; now in hope, then presently in despair: but however he thought it a great happinesse to hear that Mandana was owner of as much vertue and wisdom as he saw she was of Beauty: Mean time, this Priest liked Artamenes very well, and said thus unto him: Friendly Stranger, If you desire to see our stately Ceremon|ies, Come hither three daies hence, for those which we shall then celebrate, will be much more magnificent and sumptuous then these which you have now seen. Artamenes thanked him, and desired to know the end and reason of them; to whom the Priest answered, that there was a Prince and Neighbour unto Cappadocia, called the King of Pont and Bythinia: This Prince being in Love with Mandana, had sent his Embassadours unto Ciaxares to de|mand her in marriage; Artamenes being much moved at this, interrupted, and asked him, Whether this Ceremony was for the Marriage of the Princess? No, no, answered the Priest, for we do observe the custom of the Assirians, who were our ancient Lords, that when a Prin|cess must succeed unto the Kingdom, she cannot by this Custom marry a stranger: and therefore Ciaxares had refused the King of Pont; who being not content with this answer, nor able to help his passion to the Princess, hath confederated with the King of Phrygia, and declared War against the King of Cappadocia: so that their Army being ready to march, the King and Princess come at the time I told you, to supplicate the Gods, especially him to whom this Temple is dedicated, that he would be pleased to prosper their Proceedings, and assist them in so just a War, which maintains the fundamental Law of their Land: Artamenes was so surprised with different Apprehensions, as he had no minde to ask any more questions, but after he had in few words given many thanks, he civilly took his leave; and as he was fully resolved, not to hide any of his thoughts from either Feraulas or me, because he could receive no assistance but from us; so, as soon as he had opportunity he said thus un|to us; Was ever such conceited Fortune as mine? are the Gods resolved I should be tor|mented with two violent Passions at one time? I am no sooner in Love, but I am Jealous al|so; I no sooner saw her Beauty and her Wisdom, but I understand how it has captivated the heart of a Prince, and that an excellent Prince, whom only one bare Custom of the Cap|padoicians has caused to be rejected, and nothing else: Who knows, whether the Princess does not in her heart disallow of this Custom? and whether I do not Love one whose soul is already bestowed? Alas, alas, this Customary Law, which makes something worse for the King of Pont, makes me despair: For as he is a stranger, so am I; therefore, for that reason, as also many others, I can never have any hopes of Pretence unto her. Sir, said I to him, if all these difficulties which you imagin, and which are a thousand times greater then you do apprehend, would alter your resolutions, I should with all my heart consent unto it: but since I cannot, yet do not (I beseech) you contend with monsters, and almost impossibilities: No, no, Chrisantes (answered he,) never hope to make me give over my design; especially now, since I can satisfie my desires of Glory, and my Passions for Mandana both together: And since I finde a War in Cappadocia, why should I go seek it at Ephesus? But Sir, said I to him, If you should chance be discovered, in what danger are you then? It is not the consideration of any danger (replied he) that can alter me; but I ought, on the contrary, to seek after dangerous enterprises: and to give you full satisfaction, know, that I am absolutely re|solved to carry my self so Gallantly in this War, under the Notion of Artamenes, as that Cylrus may without danger come out of his Tombe afterwards. Sir, said I to him; all this while the King your Father and the Queen your Mother, do think you dead, and doubtlesse are infinitely troubled at it; it is a piece of inhumanity to suffer them continue in it: Why should not you think (as I do, said the Prince,) that this report of my death, is nothing but a device of my Mothers, to divert Astiages from seeking me? and that she hath acquainted the King my Father with his cruelty, so that this false news is dispersed by his consent, and hath sent it to Astiages as true; so that Chrisantes your reasons are too weak to convince me, or make Page 54 me alter my resolutions: Indeed, I did finde some probability in what the Prince had said, not imagining, how any other way, this report of shipwrack should arise: But yet notwith|standing, I fell afresh to perswade him from his Passion: to fly from that Court which was so full of danger to him; and to give intelligence of his being alive, unto the King his Father and Queen his Mother; But as to the first of these, I might as well have bid him do a thing absolutely impossible: As to the second; as no danger could dismay his soul, so he told me, that my reasons were not good, but that I gave them because I had no better: And as to the last, Know, said he, Chrisantes, that Cyrus shall never be known unto the King of Persia, until Artamenes has rendred himself famous throughout all Asia; yes Chrisantes, Astiages shall esteem of Artamenes, Ciaxares shall favour him, the King of Pont shall fear him, and Mandana shall Love him; otherwise he shall sleep in the Tombe with Cyrus: and he had rather die in earnest, then not fully satisfie his desires of Glory, and also his Affection which he owes unto the Princess of Cappadocia. Sir, said I to him, for my part I cannot yeeld unto Passion, or consent unto the opinion of a man whose Reason is prepossessed and partial, un|les I should render my own suspected: Thus we parted, and he went unto Feraulas, who being younger then I, was not so cross unto him in his design, and therefore better pleasing. I began to contemplate and weigh what course to take was best, in a business of such intricacy and danger: As for Artamenes, it were a needless question to ask how he entertain'd himself with Feraulas, for you may be sure Mandana was all their discourse. Artamenes asked him, if she were not the most perfect Beauty in the world? and as he answered that all Persia had not one comparable to her; that's not enough (replied the Prince:) but tell me, that all Greece, where the fairest women in the world are, has not one who by a thousand degrees comes neer her;) and say, that the famous Image of Venus, which we saw at Cyprus, who char|med all that came near, was illfavoured in comparison of the Princess of Cappadocia, so much does she transcend all the Beauties of the world! Perhaps Sir, I have insisted longer then was sit upon the Passions of Artamenes, and their effects, but I was constrained to suffer that evil which I could not prevent, and to endure that which I could not help. Mean while, the day of Sacrifice, of which we spake before, approached, Artamenes must be there, and more hasty then any of the Sacrificers, for he was there before any doors were opened: But for all his earnestness, we found the young Stranger, which we met withall in the Temple, before us, who also waited for the opening of the gates: My Master, though he knew no reason for it, yet had some secret odd thoughts of him, finding him there, and more forward then himself; and though out of his civility he could not chuse but speak unto him, yet he did it in such a manner, as partly discovered his anger, and made me wonder, for there was never a sweeter and more complacential spirit in the world then his; yet I found by his words as well as by his tone, that this young Stranger did not please him: Certainly (said he to him, in meeting with him,) you are either very full of Devotion, or very full of Curiosity, that you come thus early, to see a Ceremony, wherein on my conscience you have no great Interest, and which cannot afford you any Novelty since you have already seen them: I may say the same to you (answered the young Stranger) since I finde you as forward as my self; but I will confess to you, that I saw such delectable sights in the Temple, the last time I met you here, that I could not chuse but come again. I would gladly know (replied Artamenes very sharply) which was the most delectable sight you found in the Ceremony; whether the Ornaments of the Temple? the abundance of Victims? the costliness of the sacred Vest|ments? or the function of Priests? the confluence of People? the Majesty of the Prince? the Magnificence of the Court? or the Beauty of the Princess? It might be all these (answered the sociable Stranger:) but if I be not deceived, you your self can guess, which among them was the fairest object. Since I believe we are of several Countreys (replied my Master) we may perhaps differ in our opinions, and therein also be several; and that which is fair to me, may chance not be so to you; The Persians delight most in their Temples; the Serthians in their Houses; the Graecians immortalize themselves by their Statues; the As|strians and Medes, in their magnificent Palaces: so every one has his Phansie for his reason, and thinks nothing fair but what com|plies with his own humour, and carries with it the Custom of his Nation: Yet, replied the Stranger, there be some universal general Beati|tudes, which please and hit the Phansie of all Nations; the Sun delights the whole world; Diamonds sparkle in all eyes; and also many Perfections there are which are beautifull to all men upon earth. This discourse, though it was very general, yet it did not please Artame|nes; and I am perswaded, that if one of the Sacrificers had not come to open the doors of the Temple, this discourse had not ended so civilly as it begun; for indeed Artame|nes had|boured Page 55 a great dislike of him, although he had but few his equal in point of handsome behav|our: The door of the Temple was no sooner open, but presently they parted, and Artame|nes shunned converse or meeting with him as much as he could, but mingled amongst the company which came into the Temple. Indeed this Sacrifice was much more magnificent then the last; for as the People are always more forward to pray unto the Gods for deliv|rance from future misfortunes, then to thank them for any benefit past; so now there were many more multitudes of men, then before, more Ceremonies used, the Victims bet|ter adorned; and every thing more delightfull to the eye: the Princess also was more beautifull in the eyes of Amorous Artame|nes then the first time he saw her: And as Love is always ingenious in conceit, so my Master thought Mandana prayd unto the Gods with more fervency and zeal then she did before: This joy'd him much, and made for his advantage, that she should be more earnest with the Gods, for his good success in War, then she was in thanking them for his death: But immediately his Joy turn'd it self into a contrary Passion; for, Who knows, said he, whether or no she prays for my Rival? and whether the inward delv|otion of heart do not contradict the outward expression of her lips? Perhaps she prays more for the King of Pont then for the King of Cappadocia: and that the happy success of her affection to that Prince, is the happy success of the War that she prays for? But what am I thinking, mad man that I am? said he to himself? I am offending against a Princess whose Vertue is without blemish, and whose Soul is so sweetly calm, that it cannot be pos|sessed with any Passion: I see it by her eyes, and judge it by her motions, and haply I may finde her heart not so stony insensible of Love? In short Sir, not to abuse your Patience; This second view did confirm what the first begun; and one Passage chanced which did much augment his Passion, which was this; The Sacrifice being ended, the Princess did not go out of the Temple so soon as the rest, but stayed at her private Prayers after the King: The People, knowing her custom, retired, and left her at her devotion: Artame|nes did not so, for he went not out as long as she stayed: The young stranger was no forwarder to go out then he, but stood alwayes before Mandana: The Sacrificer, with whom my Master had discoursed three days since, found him out among the presse; and being willing to do him any favour as a stranger who travelled out of Curiosity, and as a man whose deportment and converse had much pleased him; he came unto him, and told him in a low voice, that if he would have a little patience, he might hear the Princess speak as she went out of the Temple, for (said he) I have a Petition unto her. Artame|nes being much ravished with this happy accident, thanked him very civilly for his kinde offer, and prepared himself for this happinesse which he did not so soon expect. The young stranger over-hearing this, pressed after very boldly. The Princess being ready to depart, as she was at the gate of the Temple, the Sacrificer went unto her, my Master following him, and the young stranger fol|lowing both; The Priest did most humbly beseech her that she would be pleased to mediate unto the King her Father, that during these ensuing wars, he would have a care for the pres|ervation of the Temples: For Madam (said he) the gods are the gods of all Nations; Cap|ladocia hath Altars as well as the King of Pont; and as victory inclines unto one side, enemies must not be taught how to commit Sacrilege, nor by example of others draw upon themselves the anger of incensed gods. The Princess conceiving his desire just, did thank the Priest, and assured him, she would have a particular care that no disorder in the Temples should be used, as heretofore had been in the war between the Scythians in Medea and Assiria; And that she would move her father to it in the best manner she could. But Grave Thiamis (said she to him, for that was his Name) Be you sure to pray unto the gods for Peace, which is the best way to preserve your Temples; for my part I shall not be at rest as long as the war lasts; and I confess, that I prefer a peace before a victory: Therefore pray incessantly unto the gods that they would be pleased to change the heart of the King of Pont, and that they would direct the heart of the King my Father to preferre the safety of his Subjects in generall before his particular glory: After these words the Princess went away, and left Artame|nes in a wonder at her beauty and wisdom; For though she had spoken little, yet he found much purity of expression, much spirit, much complacence and goodnesse in the sense of her words. In short Sir, the state of Artame|nes was incurable: and though I had been able to have eased him, yet he would not hear me; But when we were returned to the Town, and I had considered the matter more seriously, I found no such great danger in it, as at the first I did apprehend: for who knows (thought I) whether it be not the pleasure of the gods by this innocent way, in spite of all the prudence of Astiages, and all his fears, to bring Artame|nes unto the Persian Crown, and to make him Lord of all Asia? Can it be i|magined Page 56 that the Divine Powers who never act against reason, have foreshewed all these prodigious portents unto the Magi concerning Cyrus in vain? Did they not expose him to the danger of being devoured by Lions and Tigers? yet did they not miraculously save him? Have they not most divinely accomplished him? Have they not infused great thoughts and inclinations into him? and Have they not conducted him through several Nations without a stop? Did they not preserve him from the danger of that cruel combat with the Pirate? Did they not bring him by Tempest amidst his enemies, and landed him at Sinope? Did they not bring him in the nick of time to be a Spectator when a sacrifice of thanks was offering for his death? Have not the gods cast him into love of her who offered it? Have they done all these wonderful things (I say) to destroy him? no no, It is impossible: Had not the gods destin'd him unto some greater Fortune, they would have suffered him to perish by Tygers and wilde beasts in the house of Mithridates, or have let him perish at Sea, or kil'd him in some civil combat, or else this Port on which we were blown might have been a Rock. Moreover, I conceived it impossible that Artame|nes should ever be taken for Cyrus, because the Cappadocians do seldome or never come into Persia: I remember that the last time Ciaxares sent thither, his Embassadour was a Medean; and I know when he returned he came not to this Court, but went unto Ec|batan; so that of all the places in the world which I can think of, this Court seems to be least dangerous for him: I cannot imagine which way Astiages can come to know that Artame|nes is Cyrus, or if he should, it may well be thought he would not treat that Prince ill, who is in Arms for the interest of Ciaxares his son; nei|ther can it be thought that Ciaxares will so much dishonour himself as to be so full of fears as his father. Whereas if he were in any other Court, or if he should be discovered in that other Court, then Astiages would suppose him to be cajolling and inciting his enemies against him, and would contrive all possible waies to destroy him. As long as Astiages lives, Cyrus cannot be more safe then in the Cappadocian Army; since the beginning of his Travels he is more changed then can be credited, so that it will be very difficult for those who saw him at Ec|batan to know him again: or for those who saw him since in Persia, for then he was very young and very little. 'Tis true, Feraulas and I, who lived in some considerable rank at Per|sopolis may chance come to be known; But we can easily put it off by saying that we chan|ged Masters after the shipwreck of Cyrus: Besides all this; may not Fortune be trusted with any thing? Moreover, who knows but that Love is the only necessary Passion whereby to attain unto glory? Ambition in so young a heart as his cannot retain its violent and harsh desires so long, as to adde victory unto victory: yet since the Genius of this age is so much devoted unto pleasures, there is not a more delectable humour in the world to make the most rugged and difficult things seem feasible and easie, then Love: Moreover, since Artame|nes is so amiable and extraordinary handsome, who knows but the Princess may love him as well as he loves her? And it may be certainly concluded that since he is hated unknown, he will never be loved if he were known to be Cyrus. These reasons Sir moved me to give some satisfaction unto my Dear Master: yet because I would not trust only unto my own reason in a business of this importance, I caused a Sacrifice the next day to be offered unto the gods, that they would be pleased to inspire me with knowledge how to transact in so nice a busi|ness. After the offering I found my self so strongly confirmed in my resolutions to comply with Artame|nes in his amorous design, as I thought it would be to oppose the order of heal|vens, if I should cross him in his affection any more. Thus Humane Prudence which is but a blinde directer in future things, moved me to consent unto a Design which hath cast my dear Master into that danger wherein now you finde him: I did not yeeld unto him upon a sud|den, but by degrees, and seem'd to resist him a little at the first: But as soon as I gave my consent that he should endeavour to make himself eminent in the war in which he had engalged himself, our business was only to appear in an Equipage befitting men of some quality: We had yet Jewels sufficient to carry it out, and many more then we stood in need of; so that the businesse being fully resolved upon, he writ a Civil Letter unto Periander, and commanded the Ship to make for Corinth, and to present that Ship and Letter unto that Fa|mous Greek in lieu of his own which was gravelled upon the Sands in the last Sea combat. Whilst the King and Princess staid at Sinope, Artame|nes saw them very often; and though he had several opportunities of being made known unto them, yet he refused them all, being resolved to do it in a more glorious way then so: Mean while, all preparations for the war goes on, and news is brought every day that the King of Pont and the King of Phrygia were forward on their march towards Galatia. Ciaxares to prevent them draws speedily to the general Rendezvous, endeavouring as much as he could to enter into Bithinia, and carry Page 57 the war nearer his enemies Countrey: And since the Princess his Daughter was the cause of the war, therefore fearing lest the enemy might attempt upon her person in his absence, he would have her follow unto a Town called Anigres, which was not far from that place where he resolved to enter the enemies Countrey: Mean while, Artame|nes furnisheth him|self with such necessaries as are fit, to wit, Arms, Horses, and Tents: He often met with the young Stranger which he had seen in the Temple of Mars: And the same man which sold Arms unto Artame|nes, sold also unto Philidaspes, for that was the Name which that Stran|ger owned; so that meeting together in this place they both of them knew that one and the same desire of glory and honour did enflame their souls to engage in this warre; and were both of them but a little satisfied with one another; But not to insist Sir upon any thing which is not absolutely pertinent unto the Story; we come to the Rendezvous: the King viewed his Troops, and we marched towards the enemy: Artame|nes with sorrow saw the Princess go to Anigres with two thousand men for her Convoy and Guard: But since it was his destiny to endure all that love could call rigorous, he resolved to comfort up himself in her absence with hopes of Victory and Return: My Master ranked himself in the Squadron of Voluntiers, as well to encamp and fight near the Kings person, as because in those Troops which had no particular Captain, nor obeyed any orders but the Generals, he might more easily conceal himself, and also because they who desired to make themselves eminent by any notable, might there finde the best opportunities. The Army of Ciaxares consisted of forty thousand men, that of the Enemy of fifty thousand. I will not trouble you with relating how many of them were Archers, How many were Darters, nor how many Horse, or how many Foot, since it is not pertinent to my Discourse; and since I have so many Combats and Bat|tels to relate, it is not requisite to insist upon that: For my intention is not to compose the History of Cappadocia, it is the History of Artame|nes only which I rehearse: Let me there|fore only tell you, that when these two Armies first faced one another, I never in my life saw Artame|nes so pleased: He was armed that day after a very remarkable manner. His Arms were Russet wrought with flames of gold; His Plume waving and reaching to the very crup|per of his Horse, was of a lively Flame colour: His Horse, according to the fashion of the Countrey was trapt with studs of steel, part Russet, part gilt: Artame|nes carried two Lan|ces in his left hand with a Buckler upon the same Arm; Another Lance in his right hand, and a broad short Sword by his side to use in the throng of his enemies: I never saw him so gallant and pleasant in my life; And though the Persians were never much commended for good horsemanship, yet he managed his with such a quick facility, and sate him in so brave a posture, and with so fine a grace, as he did attract the eyes of all men upon him. The Ar|mies being both ready to fall on, and charge sounded on both sides, Artame|nes who was pla|ced in the first rank, no sooner saw a squadron vapor, but he was gone in an instant like a Thunderbolt above a hundred paces before the rest, and fell upon the Enemy with such a fury as he disordered them, broke their Ranks, and struck terror and death into their Army. After the fatal Clouds of Arrows which darkened the Air and fell upon both Armies, were dispelled, and that they came to hand blows, Artame|nes then performed such Acts as sur|passed all imagination: His three Lances held three of the enemies bravest men; and when he drew his Sword, wo betide him that stood in his way, and death to him that durst encoun|ter: He looked every where for the King of Pont, and desired to have a bout with him, but could not finde him, for happ would have it so, that whilst he was on one side of the Army, the King of Pont was on the other: and though his valour broke all their ranks, squandred their squadrons, and nothing could resist his valour, yet he was not satisfied, and thought nothing eminent enough unless he either held or took the King of Pont Prisoner: His courage was much exasperated when he saw Philidaspes amidst the thick of the confused fight, and observed him as valiant a man as the world had: his valour won him the esteem, emulation, and admiration of Artamenes, when he saw none fight like him; so that observing each other with a brave emulous eye, they strive to surmount one another; and from this time became Rivalries in Ambition and valour: Artamenes was more happy one way than Philidaspes, and fortune gave him better opportunities of shewing himself: For the King of Pont who thought he could not end the war better then by taking the King of Cappadocia Prisoner, since for his ransom he might obtain his Daughter; he therefore kept a reserve of ten thousand men, the best of all his Troops, who had Orders not to fight until a certain sign was given, which should be when they were informed where Ciaxares did keep his Quarter, then they to fall upon him and take him Prisoner: These Orders were punctually obeyed. The King of Pont and the King of Phrygia seeing that the victory did poise in an Page 58 equal balance, and having discovered the place where Ciaxares was in person, they give the signal: The ten thousand men fell furiously upon us, and put our Army into great confusion: Artamenes had the good hap to be near the King when he was compassed about and ruffly assaulted by his enemies: Indeed, if he had not been there at that time, believe it CiJaxares had not been now in a condition to keep him his Prisoner, for all the world did see he had there else perished. Artamenes seeing this fresh storm fall upon the King, took the boldness to come to him, and said, Sir, though I am but an unfortunate stranger to you, yet if your own Subjects will but do like me, you should overcome (I warrant you) then, not staying for any answer from the King: Come, Come, Follow me my brave men (said he to them which were about him, trembling for fear,) If you will but take heart and follow me, I'll warrant you we will preserve the King, and yet honour enough besides. These words, and the confidence which they saw in the eyes of Artamenes, did so rouse up their dull spirits that they began to courage up: then he led them on, and charged the enemy with an unimaginable fury: Now since the Enemy had commands to spare CiJaxares his life, and to take him prisoner only, therefore they durst not fight so tumultuously lest then they should perhaps kill him unawares; yet Artamenes slew such a Number of them though they defended themselves as well as they could, that it was a wonder he was not tired with killing: But whilst he was in this gallant Fury he heard many cry confusedly The King is taken, and immediately after, The King is kill'd: At the sound of these sad words he turn'd about, and saw a body of Horse who guarded the King whom they had taken, whether alive or dead: he made straight towards them: Then animating those Cappadocians which followed him, and spying Feraulas and me, call'd us by our Names; Come away, said he to us, Let us go and relieve the King; and let us not be less valiant in delivering him then our enemies have been in taking him: Then we charged that body of Chivalry, in the midst of which we perceived some confusion, and as it were a fight. The Gallant Artamenes brake the ranks of the Enemy, and gave a death to all he met; Being come to the middle of the Squadron, he saw CiJaxares with some fifteen or twenty, who having got Arms in their hands, would not render themselves unto those who compassed them about: And when the Enemy saw that Artamenes was like to relieve CiJaxares, there was one desperate fellow amongst them, who thought it was more advantageous for the King of Pont, that CiJaxares were kill'd rather then escape: therefore he lifted up his arm which held a great Sword, to strike the King upon his head, which was then bare, for he had lost his Helmet in the Combat, the buckles being broken: This blow had inevitably kill'd him, if Artamenes had not step in with his Sword, and run this rash man through the heart, and made him fall at his feet, just as the blow was falling upon the Kings head: The King seeing this, called him his Preserver and Deliverer: And my Master, thinking the like chance might hap again, took his own helmet from his head, and put it upon the Kings: Then without speaking a word or losing a minute of time, he went immediately out again to fight, resolving his buckler should defend the blows from his head: This act which was observed both by friends and enemies, wrought different effects: The King was amazed at it, and would needs give him his head-peece again; But his enemies when they saw better then before the admirable beauty of Artamenes, and that martial disposition which did so easily become him in Combat, they thought some Divinity had descended to preserve CiJaxares from his enemies, and against whom it was no boot to resist; therefore their fears did encrease, and many thought their heels to be the best arms: Artamenes followed them, and drave them upon the left wing of their own Army which put them into disorder, so that he had absolutely defeated them if night had not been so near, which hindred his pursuit, and caused both parties to retire unto their colours. Philidaspes, though he was not present at all these passages, yet did he much contribute unto the happy success of this great Action? for it was he who kept our right wing from giving ground, and who sought with the left wing of the enemy whilst we had our hands full in delivering the King; so that if he had not been, we should have had the main bodies of both the Kings upon us, and then could never have been able to do as we did: And so that it may truly be said it was only Artamenes and Philidaspes which preserved Cappadocia at this time; yet since the art of Artamenes had the fortune to have the King for a witness, who thought it Artamenes only which saved his Crown and his life, therefore he had the greater honour and better fortune: Mean while, night invites all unto their Tents, the Victory not being absolutely declared: Artamenes bethought himself of two slight hurts in his left Arm, which though, it did not cause him to bed: The King also received a little hurt in the hand, but we understood by one of our Souldiers who had been taken Prisoner and escaped, that the King of Pont had a Page 59 considerable wound with an Arrow, and which was a cause neither side had any minde to fight again. CiJaxares was no sooner come into his Tent, but he sent to seek out his deliverer, and to bring him thither; yet since none knew the Name of Artamenes, it was next day in the morning, before CiJaxares could satisfie his extream desire to salute and thank him for saving his life: at last, my Master being found out, and being so commanded from the King, he comes unto him; but he addressed himself with such modesty and reverence, as if he had done him no service at all. After his first appearance before the King, every one accosted him, and desired acquaintance: Philidaspes also gave him a respective Complement for his good fortune the day before: all admired his handsome presence, and were inquisitive to know the place where he was born: The King no sooner saw him, but he went to meet him and embrace him: After these first welcomes, the King did commend him so much, as the modesty of Artamenes could not endure it: Sir, said he to him, I have done yet so little in your service, that if I did not hope to do you more another time, I should be very much ashamed of this: but if I may have the honour to continue a Souldier under your Colours, the zeal which I have unto your service, and the examples of these gallant men, which are in the Army, will create new desires of Glory in me, and enable me to accomplish it; and till I have done something worthy of them, I dare not without blushing receive such commendations from such a Prince as CiJaxares: Your modesty, answered the King, does as much astonish me as your valour, it being more extraordinary to finde that grave Vertue in one so young, then to fight, which is a tumultuous act, and more suitable with your years. Sir (replied Artamenes) your Majesty must pardon me, if I think you not Phrase it aright, and call that modesty in me, which is but a bare resentment of my consciousness, for since I have seen all these Gallant men which hear me, perform such brave Acts, and amongst the rest (said he in shewing him Philidaspes) this Noble stranger, it would be extream boldness and vanity in me, to think I can deserve any commendations for what I have done: rather I will receive them from your Majesty, as a spur to quicken me up hereafter unto Gallantry, then as a recompence for what is past. I see (answered CiJaxares,) it is a hard matter to overcome you in anything, and this makes me afraid to ask you of what Country you are, least you should have no willingness to impart it: Sir (replied Artamenes, following the resolution which we fixed upon when we came from Sinope, and which I forgot to tell you) I was born in that Country, where the People are from their Cradles both Wise and Valiant: and the reason why I desire to conceal it, until I have made my self worthy of it, is, least my Actions should become a shame unto it: If that be your reason (replied CiJaxares smiling) you may very well satisfie my Curiosity: for whether you be Greek or Persian, which in my opinion, are the two Nations which come neerest the description you gave of yours, or whether you be the Sonne of some great and wise King, it would be an honour unto him to have you for his Country man: Artamenes with a low reverent Conge, said unto him; Since you both commend and command me Sir, I will tell you that my birth is very Noble, and moreover that I am of that Country which is as considerable as any one upon earth: But to tell you Sir the Names of my Parents, and the particular Place where I was born, is a thing I neither can nor ought to do, having, for some reasons which would very little concern your Majesty, if you knew them, promised, and fully resolved not to make my self known until my return: therefore I most humbly beseech your Majesty, command me not to discover it: And be pleased to know, that when your Majesty hath any Service to command me, he who calls himself Artamenes shall obey you: It were most unjust (answered CiJaxares) to exact that from you, which you are not willing to impart, and I am too much indebted to you to compell you unto any thing: See Sir, all the disguise which Artamenes takes upon him; this Great and Noble Soul being exact in all Vertue, could not speak the least lie: After this, CiJaxares did treat him with all imaginable civility, and desired him to Command a thousand Horse, whose former Commander had been killed in the late battle: Artamenes at the first excused him|self, and refused it; but afterwards, least he should displease CiJaxares, he accepted of it; he thanked the King for the Honour, and assured him that he would employ it the best he could in his service. And because there was another place vacant, by the death of the former Com|mander also, CiJaxares conferred that Regiment upon Philidaspes, whom he had known longer then my Master; for Aribees, who as I formerly said was then a favourite, had presented him, before the coming from Sinope. The King had no sooner conferred this last Honour upon Philidaspes, but Artamenes did congratulate with him, who returned him a civil Complement, but yet harboured within his heart many sparks of jealousy at all the Honours Page 60 which CiJaxares had done unto Artamenes: Mean while, Artamenes is looked upon as the Kings deliverer, and it were a crime in any one not to bid him welcome. So that as well for that respect, as because he had a natural pleasant way of attracting the hearts of all which see him, therefore he is visited, extolled and welcomed by all the Court and all the Army: The Regiment especially which he commanded, were beyond all expressions pleas'd with him, and came to tender him their first offers of obedience with abundance of joy: Philidaspes and he did also visit one another; and you must know that Philidaspes reported his Country to be Bactrian. Now since the battle was bloody on both sides, and all things in great disorder, therefore, neither side thought yet of any fighting again; wherefore the King being desirous to advertise his daughter of all passages, and being pleased to honour my Master so far as to acquaint him with his desire, commanded him to go unto Anigres, and carry his Letter unto Mandana, and also to acquaint her how he was alive, and preserved by his valour; the King said unto him smiling that a man which bore his arm in a Scarf might very well leave the Army for four daies without dishonour or suspicion of being taken for a dissector of it, and at the desire of his friend not refuse such a Commission. I leave you to judge Sir how this joyed Artamenes, and how it wrought upon his thoughts: he changed colour at The first motion of it, and not daring to accept of it without first refusal, Sir, (said he) the hurts which makes me carry my Arm in a Scarf are so small, that they will not hinder me from fighting against your Enemies, if occasion should be offered, and because I am afraid some such opportunity may presently present it self, I dare not accept of this Commis|sion wherewith you would honour me; No No (said CiJaxares, and giving him the Letter unto the Princesse) do not think that we will fight without you: for you are sufficiently convinced me, that it is absolute necessary to have your help before we can conquer our Enemies: But yet it is fit that a Princess who must wear the Crown of Cappadocia, as soon as she comes at that age which is appointed by the Laws, should know what services you have done her, and that she should receive the intelligence from your own mouth, to the end you may receive from hers that acknowledgement and thanks which is your due; As Artamenes was ready to answer, Philidaspes who for some reasons which you shall hereafter know, was not pleased with my Master, should have this Commission, addressed himself unto the King with a very comely grace, and said smiling unto him, If it be your Majesties pleasure the Princess should be informed of all the brave acts of this gallant Stranger, I conceive that since he is so modest, it is not convenient to send him, because that Modesty will rob him of that honour which is his due; therefore if your Majesty would be pleased to give me leave, I shall present him Panegyrick unto the Princess; I, I say, who was an eye-witness of his valour, and a great admirer of it: Artamenes hearing and seeing Philidaspes so forward, was afraid the King should consent unto his desire, therefore without giving the King time to answer, he said, Sir, since the acts of this Gallant Stranger who speaks, are so illustrious, and much more then mine, it would be but just in me to present them unto the Princess my self: therefore without any further opposition unto your Majesties Commands, I will accept of the honour, since there is more reason I should speak his Elogie then he mine. Sir, Replied blushing Philidaspes, his going will lessen the honour of Artamenes; but (Replied my Master) it shall not lessen the honour of Philidaspes. The King being much pleased with this pleasant Controversie (of which you shall hereafter know the cause) would be Empire in the matter, and gave this judgement betwixt them. I will (said he to Artamenes) thus far hearken unto the advice of Philidaspes, as to use it as an Antidote against your too much modesty: I will therefore have Arbaces the Lieutenant of my Guard go along with you, to help out your modesty, and speak aloud those things which perhaps you will not; so the King took the Letter from him, and when he had altered it gave it unto him again; Artamenes took it with as much joy as Philidaspes saw it with anger: As I remember it was thus indited:

Ciaxares King of Cappadocia and Galatia unto the Princess Mandana his Daughter.

HE who shall give you this Letter having saved my life, I thought none more fit to acquaint you with the danger wherein I was, then he who delivered me from it: And I could not devise a more prevalent way to cause his stay amongst us then those prayers and desires which I know you will make unto him: And because I am acquainted with his modesty, therefore I have sent Arbaces with him, that he may tell you what perhaps the modesty of the other will not permit him; for I see he hath a better faculty in extolling the valour of another than his own. In short, he hath saved my life, and hath vanquished all my Enemies, if night had not hindered his pursuit. Pray unto the Gods that all my Captains may be like unto him: and though you cannot make him my Subject, endeavour at the least to make him my Friend:

Ciaxares.

Judge you Sir, what Joy was this unto Artamenes: Feraulas waited upon this little journey, and was a witness of all passages and my Masters Entertainment. Alas! said he to him|self in reading the latter end of the Letter, how unnecessary is this Prayer? how impossible a thing it is to be a Lover of Mandana and not a friend unto Ciaxares? yes, yes, think no more of it; I am, and will be a friend unto the King of Cappadocia, and to the King of Medes also, and so great a friend too that I will be an enemy unto Cyrus; Let him keep in his Tomb still, unhappy Cyrus, who is the object of all the fears and hates of these Princes as long as Artamenes is thus happy, keep still in the obscurity of thy Sepulchre, and never come out: Oh Artamenes, happy Artamenes, (added he) thou art going to see thy Princess, and to speak unto her; to be commended by her, to be known unto her, and happily may prove so fortunate as not to be hated: But alas, alas, that is not enough, for to be perfectly happy is to be beloved: Thus Sir, were the spirits of Artamenes inspired with all the delicate and tender passions which Love could contrive: Sometimes his soul was all joy, sometimes again quite quashed with fear, for who knows (said he) but that for all the Kings Letter to her, I shall incur her dislike? there are secret suggestions of soul which moves us to love or hate, for which no reason can be given, and against which there is no resistance: so that perhaps though I be not the most odious of men, and though I have done some considerable service to the King and her, yet, if I should be so unfortunate as to find such an antipathy in her soul, then all my actions, my services, and observances, though I owned all the virtues in the world, and though I had all the Crowns of the earth upon my head, yet I should never win her affection: I may perhaps by these obtain her liking and esteem, but that will not satisfy me: Love is such a capricious Passion as it will never be content with any thing but Love again: And I should conclude my self the most unhappy of men, if I should find in my Princess only a bare esteem without affection: The violent Raptures of his spirit, made him busy himself about a hundred petty things which heretofore he never thought upon. As soon as he came to Anigres, he would himself chuse what clothes to wear, and asked Feraulas a hundred times, which he should take, and which did best become him; To be short, when he was dressed and wearing a very magnificent rich Scarf of golden Tissue, to bear his Arm in, he was conducted by Arbaces unto the place where the Princess was. Artamenes Sir, did afterwards confess unto us that he had more timorous motions of spirit at that time, then when he fought with that valiant Pirate, or when he fought in the last battle: This great heart which never trembled in most horrid hangers, was now possessed with such fear, that had not his joy a little tempered it, he had quite shamed himself, and incurred the Princess dis-favour: but at last being come into her Presence-Chamber, magnificently furnished (Arbaces having acquainted her before, whilst he was dressing himself, in what manner she should receive him) where she was waited upon by a great number of Ladies which waited upon her in this voyage, and also many others of the Town and Province: She was that day dressed but negligently, yes so fair and charming did she appear in his eye, that (as he told me afterwards) he saw none of the other beauties and rich attired Ladies about her; so much was his eyes and mind possessed with this powerful object. The Princess no sooner saw my Master but she rose up, and having been already told of all the services which he had done her father, she prepared her self to receive him with joy and thanks: Artamenes made Page 62 two congies, and approaching with all reverence due to one of her quality, he kissed the Kings Letter and presented it unto her: When she had read it, he was beginning his complement, but the Princess in a most obliging manner prevented him and said; What Divinity (Noble Stranger) brought you amongst us to preserve all Cappadocia thus in preserving the King, and which enabled you to do him better service then all Subjects could? Madam (answered Artamenes) you have reason to think some Divinity brought me hither, and that some Benevolent Divinity too, since it hath brought me to the honour of being known unto you, and enabled me to render some small piece of service unto the King, which might have been performed by any other hand as well as mine: Modesty (said the Princess, turning to the Ladies about her) is so essentially belonging unto our sex, as I know not whether I should suffer this Gallant Stranger to usurp it or no: he cannot be content to enjoy his own eminent valour, unto which we cannot pretend, but he must take upon him our modesty also; when we commend his Gallantry, as women may very allowably do when their beauty is commended: For my part, (added she) and looking upon Artamenes: I find some injustice in your procedure, and ought not to suffer it, though I cannot chuse but infinitely commend you for it. Such Madam as you (replied Artamenes) ought to receive praises from all the world, and not to give them unto any but very slightly, lest you should repent, therefore I beseech you Madam do not run that hazard; stay Madam until I have the honour to be better known unto you: I know already by Arbaces, answered she, that you are thought to be of that Nation (though you will not confess it) who amongst all those great qualities you attribute unto them are suspected of craft and Subtlety; yet that which you have done doth well deserve to be excepted out of the general rule, nor can I suspect that your Prudence out of your excess of reason, should degenerate into craft: but on the contrary, I am fully persuaded you are the very same you seem to be. I am much obliged unto you Madam (answered Artamenes) that your Goodness is pleased to make such a favourable exception; I can assure you that in doing so you are not deceived, and the cunning Artifice of which the Greek Nation is suspected cannot be laid unto my charge; But Madam, whether I be Greek, as it seems you think I am, or of any other more ingenious Nation, I have ever reason to say, that since you have a good opinion of me, I have cause to fear lest time should make you alter your opinion: Time (replied she) can never make any such alteration, but what you have already done deserves commendation, and for it must ever retain a good opinion of you, as of him that hath saved the life of my Father. I wish Madam, answered he, you may never lose it, and that the most glorious Princess of the world may ever do me that honour as not to think me quite unworthy of her esteem. After this, the Princess did enquire of all circumstances concerning the fight, and Artamenes did exactly relate it excepting those passages which concerned himself, and them he slightly passed over in few words, which made Mandana (who had all the story of his acts from Arbaces) much to wonder: But Artamenes did not fail to speak very advantageously in the behalf of Philidaspes and his valour; whom the Princess remembered to have seen at Sinope a little before her departure. In short, his report was so happy in this first acquaintance, as he was highly cried up by all the Ladies: And though he had not the entire freedom of his soul, since he was so heart-bound, and tied by the eyes unto the beauty of Mandana, yet did he not now seem half so much bewitched as formerly he had been: His lovely presence, discreet Civility, sweet modesty, and his handsome Garb, joined to the Eloquence of his words and wisdom of his mind, did blind all the disorders of his soul, and made them not perceived, so that he departed from this entertainment with a general applause. Arbaces lodged him in a Chamber of the Castle which looked towards the Garden, and expressed all the care which was due unto one who had preserved the King his Master: Artamenes was no sooner in his stately Chamber, but desired to walk in that Garden which was a Prospect unto his Chamber; so little rest did his amorous inquietudes permit unto him; not but that he was infinitely joyed at the Princess, and the Civilities wherewith she treated him; but as an effect of Love which is of such a nature as it always causeth pleasing troubles, and never moves unto any joy or sorrow but tumultuously, and in odd agitations or disorders. Artamenes then, as happy as he was, yet was restless, and would fain have entertained more Discourse with the Princess, so more strongly have captivated himself in fresh chains and charms, which he found in her eyes and discourse. However, his Reason doth no more oppose his Love, but rather assist it in contriving waies conducible unto his satisfaction. Sometimes he feared he had not spoke all he had to say, or that he was not well enough prepared to speak what he did. However, the sweet Idea of Mandana was it which filled every cranny of his amorous soul: At every turn he thought Page 63 he saw her, and fancied every feature: telling himself a hundred times She was absolutely the fairest and wisest in the whole world. After he had thus fancied her, and thinking that she had something of Gallantry in her spirit, which (without prejudice to her natural modesty) did incomparably set her off; after I say he had pleasingly contemplated all these things over and over again; O ye Gods (said he) if since she is so lovely it should so fatally fall out, as that she cannot love me, what will then become of miserable Artamenes? but (presently recollecting himself) since she seems to be sensible of benefits and glory, let us go on as we have begun, and act so gloriously, that although her Genius should be against me, yet her esteem of them may win her affection at least esteem of me whether she will or no: For though I confess one may esteem a thing a little which they do not absolutely love; yet I conceive one cannot esteem any thing very much which they do not love a little. Let us hope then, and render our selves worthy of pity if not of Love. As he was thus descanting upon the state of his love, Feraulas told him that he saw the Princess at the end of a Walk; who according to her usual Custom came to take the Air in the Garden about the Sun-setting: Artamenes observing she came towards him, had doubtless out of reverence gone into another walk, if she had not beckned unto him to come neerer: But Sir, to avoid being tedious, I must in short tell you, that in this walk and new discourse, Artamenes discovered such fresh Beauty, and so much admirable wisdom in the soul of Mandana that as before he only Loved her, so now he adores her. The Princess also better discovering the spirit of my Master, conceived a very great esteem of him, and treated him more respectfully then at first. To fulfill the Kings commands, she endeavoured to persuade his Continuance amongst them: but alas how unnecessary was that Prayer? and what joy did he resent, to hear her ask that which he himself had so great a desire unto, and which was so suitable unto his Passion? After he had brought the Princess unto her Chamber, who was waited upon by many Ladies of Honour, she gave order he should be waited upon his with all possible magnificence, and was punctually obeyed. All this while he mentioned not a syllable at the Table concerning the Battle, but when all the waiters were retired, and he being alone with Feraulas, all his discourse was of Mandana; he asked his opinion concerning her; Whether all these felicities which had been conferred upon him did not please him? But before they ever thought of it, and contrary to their intention, the night was more then half spent in discourse with Feraulas, who doubtless did not cross his fancy, since he found Mandana fair above all natural excellencies: At last, they went to bed, but not to sleep; for when it came into his thoughts, that he was to return unto the Camp in the morning, and that Manners commanded him to take his leave before he went, then there was no room for sleeping; but he rose in the morning before he had shut his eyes, and as soon as the Princess was to be seen, he addressed himself unto her, and desired he might return to the place whither his duty called him, and where the King and state of things required him: But she would not permit him, for she told him, that she desired he should be a witness of a Sacrifice of thanks, which she would that day offer unto the gods, for preserving by his hand, the King her father: and that he might assure himself she was pleased with his company, she expressed her self thus, I pray you Artamenes stay, but I dare not command you: But you may Madam, answered he, and more then that, for I and all the earth ought to pay obedience unto such a Princess. Artamenes stayed then the other day in Anigres, and went unto the Temple with the Princess, whom he had the honour to accompany: All the People cried him up with ten thousand applauses as their Benefactor, for it was divulged in a moment, both by Arbaces and the Princess Domestiques; that it was he which preserved the King. The next morning being come sooner then he wished it, he must take leave, and be gone; which without doubt he did with as much grief as Love, although he durst not express either, more then by silence and profound reverence. She gave him a Letter to the King her Father, the effect whereof I can tell, for Ciaxares shewed it unto every one, in hopes to oblige my Master the more by it, and there was none in all the Army, which had not either seen it or heard the contents, which were these:

The Princess Mandana, to the King of Cappadocia and Galatia her Father.

SIR,

IT was not without some reason, your Majesty did mistrust the Modesty of Artamenes, since it was only by the Lieutenant of your Guard, that I came to know what he had done for your Preservation, and by consequence for the preservation of all Cappadocia, all Galatia, Medea, and of Mandana, whose death had been included in yours: He told me of the great danger to which your Majesty was exposed, but he intimated not a syllable of his own valour which releev'd you, so that I might for ever have been ignorant of it, had I not heard more from others than him. I have so perswaded him of your Vertue, and tyed him to your service, as more endeavours had been useless. But Sir I beseech you, let not my Prayers be fruitless, when they shall desire you, not to expose your precious Life unto any more hazards: Your Majesty may do well to consider, how the happiness of all the Kingdoms depend upon it; and perhaps Artamenes may not be always so fortunate as to relieve you: Commit the care of Conquering your Enemies unto this Gallant Stranger, and employ him no more in preserving the Life of that Prince, in which is inseparably concerned the Life of Mandana.

Artamenes, delivering this Letter to the King, was welcome received; Philidaspes, who heard it read, was the only man who seemed to be displeased at it: The envy which appeared in his looks, discovered the anger and trouble of his mind. Few days after, my Masters wounds were well recovered, and he was not idle in the exercise of that Regiment under his command: As the two Armies were entrenched near one another, so he was continually sending out Parties, which always returned with the advantage, for he quite beat up one quarter of the King of Phrygia's Brigade: Philidaspes was also very fortunate in the like encounter. Now though this War was begun by the King of Pont, because he was refused the Princess of Cappadocia; yet because this ground for it, was not plausible enough in the eyes of the People, since nothing ought to be more free than Marriages, nor nothing could be more just than the authority of Fathers over Children; nor nothing more unalterable than the fundamental Laws of a State, which here did forbid the banes; therefore the pretence and colour of this War was given out to be, a right he had unto two Towns, which bordered on either side of a great Plain, between Galatia and Bithinia; both these Princes conceiving, that both these Towns belonged unto them, though both of them were in Possession of that Town which bordered upon their own Provinces: So these two Towns were declared the cause of the War: the one called Cerasia, in possession of the King of Pont; the other Anisa, in possession of the King of Cappadocia: But since the King of Pont was much wounded, and his Chirurgeons told him, he would not quickly recover, therefore he protracted fight as much as he could: yet for all that, he could not chuse but be often skirmishing. The victory seem'd always to poise equally, unless when Artamenes and Philidaspes appeared: Mean while the King of Phrygia had received private intelligence, how the King of Lydia would declare war against him, and enter into his Dominions: he imparted it unto the King of Pont, who was much troubled at it; knowing that if the King of Phrygia fell off, he was not able to resist Ciaxares, who had under his command, not only Cappadocia and Galatia, but also all Media and Persia. Whilst the Princes were in Council what to do in such a crosse conjuncture, the King of Phrygia advised, That before this News was divulged or known unto Ciaxares, it were expedient to send unto him, and make an offer, to determine the controversie by Combat of two hundred men against two hundred men, that so the War may be sooner ended, and much blood spared: for, said the King of Phrygia to him, if the War with Lydia do not hold me long, Pretences enough may be found out to break the Peace with the King of Cappadocia: The King of Pont seeing no likelihood for him to come off with honour, if Phrygia should decline him, therefore he approved of this advice notwithstanding all his bravery, and his Passion for the Princess, or his ambitious desires of Glory. He sent therefore Propositions unto Ciaxares accordingly; who held a Council of War concerning it: Opinions were different, some for it, some against it; Aribees who found the continuance of the war was for his own advantage did openly oppose it; but yet Ciaxares considered Page 65 that Astiages his Father King of Medes was so old he could not live long, and therefore had no mind to be engaged in a long War, since when his Father died he was then to leave Cappadocia and go into Medea; and considering the state of things, how the Pontians were more numerous than the Cappadocians, and that success of war is dubious, therefore he accepted the offer: The Controversie was to be determined within eight days. The Articles of Conditions were these following.

1. That both Princes should draw off their Armies into those two Towns which were under their respective subjections, and which were the Causes of the War.
2. That the Combat should be fought in that great Plain between the two Towns, and where now the Armies were entrenched, and those two Towns to be the utmost limits of them.
3. That either Prince should as he pleased, chuse those which should fight for their interest, without consideration of Rank or Quality, but that valour only was sufficient to be admitted into Combat.
4. That the Combatants of both sides, coming out of these two Towns at one time, should meet in the middle of the Plain where they were to fight.
5. That they should fight on foot, and have no other Arms, then each man two Javelins and a Sword, but not to bring any Bows or Arrows.
6. That the two enemy-Kings should stay the event of this Combat, each of them in the head of their own Army, near the Town where they are to encamp, without any information but by the return of the Conqueror, it not being permitted unto the Conquered to return, or have any Quarter of Life from their enemies; nor either party to send any intelligence of disadvantage.
7. That the success of the Combat being known; the two Kings, guarded only with two thousand men a peece, shall meet in the place of fight, as well to salute one another, as to relieve the report of the victorious.
8. That Hostages shall be given on both sides.
9. That these Hostages which shall remain in the two Camps, shall visit, and search the two hundred men which must fight, to the end, they shall bring no other Arms then is permitted by Conditions.
10. That after the Combate, the Party vanquished shall abandon the Town, and draw off his Army into his own Country: that the Conqueror shall take Possession of that Town for which the Warre Commenced.
11. That the bodies of those two hundred men of the Parties vanquished, shall receive no ignominy, and that their Funerals shall be solemnized with honour together with those which are dead of the Party conquering, upon the place of Combate.
12. That after this, Peace shall be firmly established between the two Princes, and Commerce allowed between their Subjects, the King of Phrygia to be comprised within this Peace as an ally of the King of Pontes.

All these Articles being agreed upon, and signed by both Parties, they were published in both Camps, and both Armies began to move towards the Towns unto which by Articles they were to repair. The Princess hearing of it, desired to see her Father and came unto Anisa, the day before those who should be chosen Combatants were elected. I leave you to judge Sir, how all they who had a desire to purchase Fame and Honour, were solicitous to be accepted of in this service: and I leave you to judge also whither Artamenes and Philidaspes would not be with the foremost. The last of these two did presume upon the favour of Aribees; and my Master, though he was extremely thirsty of Honour, yet could not assure himself of that favour; for though he had done the King great service, and his valour was sufficiently known, yet because he was a stranger, his fears were above his hopes, and that objection would be a great obstacle: yet he thought that if he were not accepted to be one of them, then all his hopes of Mandana would be quashed: For, said he, what can I do to obtain her esteem in a calm Court, where I shall find no occasions of serving her? but if I could be an assistant to get this victory, I should then have some ground to build my hopes upon: But alas, I fear that I am not fortunate enough for that happiness, and I fear Philidaspes will be preferred before me, though he be a stranger as well as I: For, Sir, it is not to be imagined how these two young Gallants did in all their actions extremely envy, at least emulate one another. The Princess was no sooner come, but Artamenes went immediately to her without my knowledge, and as soon as he found an opportunity, Madam, said he, I come to beg a favour, though I confess, I am unworthy of it: You are worthy Page 66 of all (answered the Princess sweetly) and be assured, if the thing you desire be neither unjust nor impossible, you shall certainly obtain it: and since I know you are too noble and wise to desire any such, you cannot doubt but your desire is granted: I know, Madam (said he, doing humble reverence) that the thing I desire is in your power, since it is in the Kings, who I am sure can deny you nothing; but I confess I dare not assure my self there is as much justice in my Petition, as there is possibility; and though I do but what I ought in endeavouring to obtain it, yet I know not whether you shall do as you ought in granting it: Nevertheless Madam, I will ask it, and that with as much zeal as my soul is capable of: and if it be so that the good fortune which I had in doing the King a little service, has any thing obliged you, I beseech you let me obtain this desire, as the greatest and most glorious recompence that ever I can obtain. Prevail I beseech you most adored Princess, with the King your Father, that he will do me that great honour, to admit me to be one of the two hundred Combatants which must fight. That which you ask (replied the Princess with much wonder at his generosity) is not impossible, but most advantageous unto the King my Father: but I must confess, I do not think it just, since, when you have saved his life as you have done, you should receive so bad a recompence, as to expose your own in a fight, which according to the Articles must needs be bloody, and full of danger: You are too good Madam (answered Artamenes) to fear my destruction: But trouble not your self Madam; for the care you have of me will preserve me in the midst of dangers; and it cannot be thought the Gods will destroy what you would save: Therefore Madam, (continued he smiling) since I shall fight without danger, do me the honour to assist me in my suite: For Madam (added he, assuming a more serious look) if I do not obtain it I must needs fly from the place I live in, since I cannot live in it without dishonour, and where they do not think me worthy to do that which two hundred others can do. If there were but one to fight, perhaps then I should not dare to think my self, being a stranger, worthy to defend your interest; but since the number is two hundred which must have the honour, I think Madam, I may without any great presumption beg this noble Office: I would very willingly (answered the Princess most candidly) Petition you another might be chosen in your room, but since you do so earnestly desire it, I will promise you to ask the King my Father. As Artamenes was ready to answer and gratefully cast himself at her feet, Ciaxares comes into the chamber: the Princess no sooner saw him but she went towards him, saying, Sir, This Noble stranger is so insatiable of honour and glory, as not being content with the service he hath done you already, would yet have you receive another victory from his hand, and desires you to admit him into the number of the Combatants. Ciaxares, ravished with this Proposition, embraced him and thanked him for his zeal to his service, but it was a long while before he would consent, and since the Princess did not speak all this while, Artamenes turned towards her and said, Madam, do you remember your promise? No, answered she, I do confess I cannot keep my word, and that fighting is so contrary to my disposition, that nothing can be obtained from me, but prayers that all Warres and Fightings may cease: Ah Madam (replied he) your goodness obliges me, and undoes me both. Then did he so earnestly importune Ciaxares, that after many denials, he consented: not but that he was very glad a man so valiant as Artamenes would fight, but his denial proceeded from him as an effect of his love to him, and because he feared to lose him in this encounter. To tell you what was the Joy of Artamenes, how many thanks he gave the King, what gracefull addresses he made unto the Princess, and what excuses he had, that he had so flenderly served her, would be to lose precious time, since I have so many notable things to tell you; however I must needs tell you how Philidaspes, who put on to be one of this fatal number, did miss of his desire; for though Aribees could have told him that Ciaxares would not admit him, yet he excused it handsomely, and told him that Artamenes having spoken first, and Ciaxares having already consented unto one stranger, would not by any intreaties admit of any more, least the Cappadocians should murmur, who would think it a wrong done unto themselves. This accident caused much sorrow in Philidaspes, so that had he not otherwise been more considerably interested in the King, he would have quitted the Court and Camp upon it; that which most stuck in his stomach, was that Artamenes should be preferred before him, being a stranger as well as he: And though Ciaxares told him afterwards, that if he had spoken first he should not have been denied, yet this did not satisfy him: On the contrary, the joys of Artamenes were doubled by the sorrows of Philidaspes; and this great soul, as generous as he was, could not chuse but rejoice at his grief, such was the violent emulation between these two Page 67 high spirits. Am I not very happy, said he to me, when he met me, that I must either overcome in the Quarrel of my Princess, or I must die for her? If I escape the danger, I shall be the Messenger of Victory and Triumph; or if I die, I am certain she will lament me: Ah Chrisantes, what honour is this? Ha, Sir, answered I, what have you done? That which I ought, my dear friend, answered he, and that which you would have done if you had been in my case: But, Sir (said I to him) have you forgot that Artamenes is more then such a common Knight as he seems to be, but that he is Son to the King of Persia? No, no, my Governour (answered he) and because I know my birth is not common, therefore I must strive to do things above common capacities: But Sir (said I) why have you not obtained as much for Feraulas and me, as you have for your self? Is it because you suspect our courages? Ah Crisantes (said he, embracing me) I will rather suspect my own; but it was not possible to be done; and if I had put in for so many, I might perhaps have been denied my self: But notwithstanding all his reasons, and though I was not possessed with such violent Passions as he was, yet I was very sorry he should be engaged in such a desperate Design; but there was no remedy: he had got himself Listed before I got knowledge of his intention. The choice of Combatants being made, the day of Combate comes on; Hostages were given on both sides; they search and view the Combatants, and Arms, according to the conditions of the Articles: Notice is sent unto the King of Pont of their readiness, who sent the same message back of his men. This selected Troop pass before the King, who at break of day offered a Sacrifice unto the Gods for their Prosperity. Artamenes was in hopes the Princess would have been with the King her Father when they parted, yet she not having a heart for it, staid still in the Temple praying for them, so that he was deprived of that hope for consolation. As for my self Sir, I could not chuse but drop some farwel tears at parting, since it was not now permitted to go with him as at other times, but now we were not suffered to assist him or be a witness of his Valour: He perceived our sorrows, and saw us all drooping: He looked upon us with as Gallant and Pleasant an aspect as ours was sad: Cheer up, said he to us, I will Conquer, I'll warrant you; and so laughed at us, I see you are but bad Fortune-tellers; as he spoke these words, they came to the Gate of the Town where the King staid. Sir (said my Gallant Master to him, marching in the head of the Troop) I am going to make my self worthy of those honours which your Majesty hath done me, and to imitate the example of these brave men, which go with me: And I am going (answered the King) to prepare a Lawrel for you and them, not doubting of good success, since Artamenes, and such men are to fight. Thy Glory is great, cried the hopeless Philidaspes, and thou shouldst not be alone, if I had as much of thy good fortune as I have of thy Valour: We should be very strong if we had you with us, answered Artamenes, but we will endeavour to vanquish without you: After these, two hundred Heroes which were devoted unto the Grandure and tranquillity of Cappadocia were gone out of the Town, and the Gates were shut, we had no full information of that fierce encounter, wherefore I shall rehearse as much as we knew, and reserve the rest unto the end of my Story. When these two Troops came upon the Plain, they halted a little, and sent out a Party of four to discover whether their numbers were equal, and Arms according to Articles: All being found right, and an equal ground chosen, they advance without any noise or vapour, but in a silent terror: When they joyned they used their Javelins, which did great execution, but much more upon the Cappadocians then the other side; at last falling to their Swords, and shielding themselves with their Bucklers, they begin to mix: Artamenes (as we had the knowledge of it afterwards) stept a little before his fellows, and at one blow with his Sword did offer the first Victim of this Sanguine Sacrifice: His valour was not so happily seconded, for to speak in general the Pontians had got much advantage of the Cappadocians; not but that they did behave themselves as gallantly as men could do, but that the other side proved more fortunate, and their wounds less mortal: Artamenes looking about, and perceiving that maugre his fury, the number of the Cappadocians did diminish, he fell into a strange rage, and acted such things as indeed can neither be imagined nor credited; and it might justly be said, that the event of Combate did absolutely depend upon him: he was not satisfied with offending his Enemy, and defending himself, but he also defended every one of his Companions, and received the blows which were aimed at his next fellow. In short, he did such Heroique acts, and wrought so many wonders as he was an absolute miracle of valour. Inasmuch as one of his Enemies whose name was Artanus, began to think, that for all the advantage which his side had gotten, it would be hard to get the Victory, and therefore he began to think how he should save his own life, and skulk away; for Page 68 (said he in himself, as afterwards we had knowledge) if my side prove stronger I can mix amongst them in the end of the fight without discovery; and if they perish then I shall save one by the shift, although I quit my Country and live unknown in some other Quarter of the world: Being thus basely resolved and during the confusion of Combate, he stole backward by degrees until he was quite behinde all his own side, then he ran away some twenty paces off, and as if he had been kil'd fell down, then crept further and further off, insensibly by little and little, until he came unto a little Hill where he might be an invisible Spectator of the Combat: All the rest being busied in fight, minded him not; Mean while, the state of the Fight came to that pass, as Artamenes saw but fifteen of his side against forty enemies: I leave you to judge Sir, If the Pontian side did not hope to be Conquerors, and the Cappadocians fear defeat; yet since it was no boot to ask Quarter, but either to fight or die, which would make the most desperate become most valiant: Artamenes did so encourage them both by words and example, as he infused fresh life into his fellows: As for himself, every one thought him absolutely invulnerable, and said that a dismal fatality was tied to his Sword, which at every blow was dipt in the blood of his enemies. He had a blow for all: He followed those which fled or shrunk from him: he kil'd them which stood close to him: In short, he laid so about him, that from the forty which was against fifteen, he brought it to be ten to ten: This reasonable equality got him a new heart: Come on (said he to his fellows) let us finish the Victory which is almost already gotten; and indeed, considering how the case was altered, he might well say so, yet he knew not that three of his nine Companions were so wounded that they fell presently after; so that there remained but seven against ten: he himself was all the while so fortunate, as he had all this while received but one slight hurt on his side, by reason of his ill Curasse; yet it had only rased the skin, so that it did not trouble him at all. This heart of a Lion, still fought with the same fury and strength that he did at first: He killed two of his ten enemies presently, the third held him play a long while, yet fell at last: As he turned himself about thinking to rejoice with his Companions, he found but one left, and three enemies upon him; he ran in all haste to relieve him, but he came to late, for his fellow fell just as he came in. Now Sir, the illustrious Artamenes stood in need of all his courage, when after three hours Combat, and that more sharp then ever battel, he found himself single against three enemies. Yet losing neither heart nor judgement, he fought with them after a quick, moving, and nimble manner, lest he should have his enemies on all sides him at once: and shewed such sprightly agility that his three Enemies found they had enough on him, and felt his Sword at every Passe: When they pressed upon him, he in the turning of an eye was on the other side; and though all their blows did not misse, for blood ran down in many places, yet for all that his strength failed not. But he being resolved either to conquer or die, and his enemies being amazed to see one man resist them so long, they made at him all together at one. Artamenes shielding himself with his Buckler, charged violently through them all, and did separate one of them from the other two; He fell like a Fury upon this third man, and made him fall at his feet by running him through the body. This chance made the other two to droop, but gave new courage unto Artamenes; So that now afterling that manner of fighting which before he was compelled to take, when he had three against him: he begins to charge them with such precipitation as that one of them stumbling upon a Buckler which was under his feet, Artamenes not losing this opportunity fell upon the other, and kil'd him: presently: Now, cried out Artamenes (and flourishing his Sword as he was turning toward his last Antagonist;) Now must true Valour decide the Controversie, without mixture of Fortune, and where none can share in the glory of the Conquerour: In saying so, he fell like a Lion upon this last Adversary who received him with more Gallantry then useth to be in common spirits. Now has Artamenes but one to fight withal, but believe me a doughty one, whom Fortune it seems had reserved to make Artamenes pay dear for his Victory: These two Valiant Heroes, one of which was to carry away the Glory of the Day, took time to breathe and look about them: They saw themselves all blood, and amidst a field covered with dead men, so that Victory did not look with any charming countenance: and though both of them had hopes to be victorious, yet this dismal sight terrified them. Presently the Combat begins afresh, and with such fury as the like was never seen. He who fought with Artamenes was a man of good quality, as well as Artanus, who all this while lay lurking; and because he had seen my Master so thunder up his fellows, durst rise up to assist his Partner. Here Sir, may be admired the wayes which the gods use, when they are resolved to save one; and it must be acknowledged their secrets are inscrutable; For the case standing thus, could any man believe that Page 69 Artanus who was all this while hid, and fresh, and saw my Master wounded in many places, should not dare for all this to rise and help his fellow to conquer one man whose blood gusht out in so many places: but he thought it safer to stay there, and keep in a whole skinned: Thus you see Artanus was not very valiant, but as I have heard since, undertook this Engagement with very ill will: This man, seeing Artamenes when he was single against three, could not be conquered, but brought it one to one; and who remembered that this last man who fought with my Master was his Corral; and seeing how the case stood now, never thinking of his Country but of his revenge, his jealousy, and his love, he resolves to get the Victory, and never fight for it; for (said he to himself, as afterwards he confessed) this combat cannot end but one of these two at the least must die, since they fight with such resolution; and he which dies, will before his death give many wounds unto his enemy; If he which is enemy to my Country fall, I shall finde my Rival in a condition easie to be vanquished; and if my Rival die, I shall as easily overcome the enemy of my Country, since he has lost so much blood as he can hardly stand, and who has shed so much of his enemies as he has left himself none; so that which side soever Fortune turns on, I will fight with the last man, and he shall die too, and I will live, and Triumph without danger. These were the thoughts of Artanus, who prayed equally for the death of both his two enemies: And truly it so fell out, as his unjust prayers wanted but a little of being heard; Artamenes and Pharmaces (for we knew afterwards that to be his Name) breathing a while as we said before, began a Combat, and such a one, as all ambitious desires of glory could not make more fierce: And Artamenes fearing least his losse of so much blood should betray his corage; therefore he charged his enemy with all his force: so that Pharmaces, who saw there was but two ways to chuse, either death or victory; had yet this consolation left him, that he thought Artanus his Rival and enemy was dead, since he saw him not fighting: and this hope not to be any more crost in his Love, begot a fresh desire of vanquishing; and moved him to fight so fiercely, that I heard my Master say, before he knew any thing of it, that he did imagin it to be Love which sustained his courage, and enflamed him with that Heroick heat. They fought yet a long time: Pharmaces wounded Artamenes in four places: Artamenes him in six: Their strength began to fail, and their bodies to reel, so that to finish the Combat sooner, they step nearer one another: Thrusting is all their play, not using their Bucklers, which they were hardly able to lift; They passed at one another both together, but hit differently; for Artamenes ran Pharmaces through the heart; and Pharmaces ran Artamenes through his thigh; and left his Sword in it. So that my Master, yet holding his Sword in his hand, and courageously drawing his enemies out of his thigh, holding both Swords in his hands, he cried out, I have got the victory: and presently after, being very weak, he fell: But here's the wonder Sir, for if Artamenes had not fallen as he did, he had died, because Artanus would have presently dispatched him: who (as we knew by his confession, and as you shall know in the sequel of the Story) as soon he perceived his Rival dead, did rise up, and prepared himself to fall upon my Master, whom he perceived to reel; but as soon as he saw him fall, he moved no further towards him, he cared not for going to see him take his last gasp, but went as fast as he could to tell the King of Pont he was the Conqueror: This man (if he be worthy of that name) was fuller of joy then the true Conqueror was; for he was full of glorious fancie; he had seen his Rival die, and hoped that this victory would certainly obtain him his Mistress, who was Sister unto the King of Pont: He could not imagin any thing could be a dor unto his felicity, unless his remorse of Conscience, and his unparallel'd Cowardize. I know very well Sir, that I have not half particularis'd this great encounter; since it came unto light only by Artanus, when he was vanquished, and kept a Prisoner of War amongst us; and by my Master, whose Modesty would not suffer him to relate any thing wherein his own valour would be mentioned: Mean time, Artamenes is very weak, and continued so a long while: His sounding caus'd his blood to stop, so that when he recovered out of those fits, he got a little strength, and crawl'd up upon his knees with his Sword in his hand, as if he would look about, to see whether any would dispute with him about the victory: yet he saw nothing but broken Javelins, half Swords, bloody Bucklers and Men, who though dead, yet did retain grim faces of fury: on the one side he saw a Cappadocian, on the other a Pontian; on all sides, horror and blood in abundance: He tried often if he could walk, but found it impossible, by reason of his last wound, which had so weakned him, as he was not able to sustain himself: Mean time, He knew it was the duty of the Conqueror to carry news of the victory, since their Combat had no other witnesses; and since the fate of Arms had thus ordered him, he was not able, for it had left him only so much Life, as he was sensible of unimaginable pain: Page 70 Alas, said he, What good will my victory do me; since when I am dead, they will not know I am victorious? Cixares will repent of the Honour which he did me: and Mandana, illustrious Mandana will perhaps think I died in the beginning of the Combat, before I had done her any considerable service: and that I have so poorly behav'd my self, as Philidaspes would have carried it better; Yet oh ye Gods, ye Just Gods, ye know what I have done for my Princess, and how dear the victory does cost me: After this he looked round, but saw none; so that not knowing what to do, and verily beleieving he should die before any could know of his conquest; he began gently to draw unto him as many Javelins, Swords, Helmetts and Bucklers as he could reach, and piled all these Arms one upon another, as if he would build a Trophie; then he took a great silver

Buckler, which once call'd the valiant Pharnaces Master, and dipping his finger in his own blood, which by reason of his motion began to run again, he writ upon it these vermilion Letters, To Jupiter, the Guardian of Trophies.

And plac'd it upon the top of this Glorious Pile of Arms, which he had erected neer him. After which, weak and weary as he was with this Triumphant Labour, he did lie down a little, his left arm leaning upon his own Buckler, and holding his Sword in his right, as if he would defend the monument of victory which he had compiled: But notwithstanding this uneasie condition, all his thoughts (as he told me since) were bestowed upon his Princess: and the hopes he still had that she might come to know of his Conquest, made death appear very pleasant and welcome unto him; yet if he could but have that happiness to see her only once more, it was all that ever his heart could desire. Mean time, Artanus who was gone to publish his false Triumphs, had fill'd all the hearts of his party with Joy, especially the King of Pont, who though he did not much love Artanus, yet was very glad to receive this welcome news from him. The Hostages, which according to the Articles, remained with the King of Pont, were as much dejected; and certified the •ad tydings unto their Master, to the end that Hostages on both sides might be returned, and both Princes meet in the place of Combat, with two thousand men apeece, according to agreement: Cixares and the Princess Mandana were in a sad perplexity; for seeing none of their party return, there was great likelihood things went not well on their side; but at last, being put out of doubt by return of the Hostages, that which at first was only a perplexity, becomes now an absolute sorrow: yet notwithstanding, because he would keep within the limits of Conditions, he goes unto the place of Combat, with that number of men as was agreed upon. The King of Pont did like; but as for the Princess, she mourned extremely, and staid in the Town. When the sad News was first brought unto the King, the first word she spoke was with tears in her eyes: Alas Sir (said she) poor Artamenes will never serve you more; the good service which he did us in saving your Life was but ill requited: As for Feraulas and my self Sir, I leave you to imagin how great our sorrows and our despairs were; and though we knew the News too too true, yet we would accompany the King on to the field, and pay our last service unto the body of our dearest Master: So we went with Cixares, who came upon the ground just at the same time with the King of Pont: But both parties were extremely amazed, when in coming near the place, they saw Artamenes, who having recovered a little strength, at the sight of the King for whom he had fought, was got up upon his knee, with his Sword in his hand, near the Trophie which he had erected, and seeming to put himself into a posture of defence, if any should oppose him: But amongst all them which were astonished, Artanus, who was waited upon as Triumpher was the most; especially when he heard Artamenes in a loud voice, say to Cixares, Sir the victory is yours, the gods by my hand have given it un|to you: when the King of Pont heard this, he said, that it was himself to whom the victory belonged, since here was present one of his Combatants, who was not so much as once wounded, ready to justify it: Then said Artamenes, without doubt, he who told you that Lye, did run away from fight and death, and Triumphed before he had fought: for if he had been Conqueror, why did he not make an end of me? and hinder me from piling up this Trophie? I left thee for dead (answered the impudent Artanus,) for thou hadst done fighting long before I came away: Thou base Imposture (said Artamenes to him) if I had not had more terrible enemies to fight with then thou, the victory which I have obtained, should not have cost me so dear; this valiant man whom thou seest dead at my feet (said he in shewing him Pharnaces) was the last man of thy side which was in the field, and who only was in any hopes to overcome me: but as for thee, it seems, thou hast not got so much as a scratch Page 71 finger in that field thus covered with dead men, and darest thou brag of victory? The Condition which thou art in (answered the malepert Artanus,) is nothing like that of a Conqueror. At these words, Artamenes being transported with anger, gathered up all his strength and strove to rise; then looking about for Artanus, with a face full of lovely fury, Come (said he to him, and holding his Sword in his hand) come on, thou which vauntest of victory without a wound; weak as I am, and cut in pieces, thus steept in my own and enemie's blood, I will yet maintain thou art a base lying imposture; and that it is impossible thou durst ever fight: At these words he put himself into a fighting condition; when the King of Phrygia who came with the King of Pont, being much taken with the magnanimity of Artamenes, cried out, that there was no Justice, a man who seem'd so valiant, should in such a weak condition, undertake a new fight: My Master interrupting him, Sir said he, Perhaps I have not strength enough to live an hour, yet I have enough to fight with such a feeble fellow as he. Artanus was so confounded at all this, that inspite of his impudence, it was easie to perceive there was no truth in his words: However Cixares lighted from his Horse, and both Kings were on foot: Cixares embraced Artamenes, and commanded to sustain him, so that Feraulas and I stept in to hold him up, against his will. Then said Cixares, although Artamenes were in a condition to fight, yet I know no reason why I should suffer him, there being no justice a Conqueror should hazard the victory a second time: Inso|much as this contest had like to have been put unto the worst extremity; and doubtlesse if the King of Pont had not worn his Arm in a Scarf, by reason of a wound received in the last fight, this disorder had not ended so well. The King of Phrygia, as one least interested, did something qualifie the anger of these two Princes, and told them that the business did require some time to examin the truth more exactly, but in any case not to do things over|rashly and inconsiderately: The two Kings, consenting unto this Proposition, retired: And Artamenes did earnestly desire that his Trophie might stand, and that Cixares would be pleased to leave a guard with it, which was consented unto. During these contests, there was a necessity of carrying away Artamenes: I sent unto the Town to get a Litter; the Princess, hearing of it, sent hers; for which my Master (as you may imagin Sir) thought himself not a little obliged: After the Princes had given orders for the Funerall of the Combatants upon the place of fight with all solemn Pomp, as well one side as the other, Feraulas and I did carry Artamenes into a house in the Town where we had lodged some days before; yet Cixares would not suffer it, but caused him to be carried into the Castle: All the Kings Physicians and Chirurgions were brought into the Chamber: After they had viewed his wounds, put in their first tents, and dressed them, they told the King that they hoped none of them were absolutely mortall, although two were very dangerous, so that by their care and his own strength of nature, a happy cure was hoped for: The Princess also that first night, sent many times to know in what state he was; and he understanding of it, though the messenger spoke very low, the Physicians having forbidden all noise, he called to the messenger, and would himself receive the Princess Complement; after he had received it, feebly turning himself on one side, and opening the curtain of the bed, which was cloth of gold; Tell the Princess (said he) that I ask her pardon for fighting her enemies so poorly, and bringing home a Victory which was yet disputable. If I die I hope her goodness will pardon me; and if I scape, I shall hope to repair the fault by some better service: Give her most hearty thanks for this honour of remembering me, and assure her that her goodness does not oblige an ungratefull soul. Mean while a Fever so violently seizes on him, as every one despaired of his life: I cannot tell how to express the sorrows and cares which Cixares and the Princess had of him, unless I shall tell you, that Cixares was as dear over him, as if Mandana had been sick; and Mandana also as if Cixares had been so wounded: But in a little time, the danger was over, and I could not chuse but wonder at the humorous conceit of Fate, which made this Prince and Princess, who the other day offered Sacrifices of thanks for his death, now as forward to make Prayers for the preservation of his life. At length every one is well pleased to see that all their cares were not in vain; for after the twentieth day, his Physicians question not his perfect recovery, but promise a present cure: As soon as he was in a condition to be seen, both all the Court and Camp did visit him. Arisees, as great a Favourite as he was, came oft to tender his complement: Philidaspes, in spite of his ambitious jealousies which the Valour of Artamenes procured him, fail'd not to pay civilities; and the King, who saw him every day, brought the Princess to congratulate his recovery: This wrought a wonderfull effect in Artamenes: So that in few daies after his wounds healed extraordinarily; such power, it seems, has the soul over the temper of the body. I will Page 72 not trouble you Sir, in telling what were the entertainments at these two visits; it being easie to imagine, that the deserts and valour of Artamenes was the whole subject of their converse: But Sir, to return unto matters of War where we left: Be pleased to know, that whilst Artamenes was thus in cure, Embassadors passed continually between the two Kings, to finde out some expedient how to determine this difference, and bring it to Arbitrement. The King of Pont protracted it as long as he could: hoping that during this vacancy the King of Phrygia might perhaps be free from the designs of his enemies, and according to that he could conclude either Peace or Warre: but the matter continued so dubious, that it seemed the Gods did purposely ordain it so, to give Artamenes time of recovering his strength, to vindicate his Honour, and acquire more Glory. He left his chamber some two moneths after his first wounding, and went to present his thanks unto the King and Princess: afterwards he returned civil complements unto all the Court and Camp, especially unto Philidaspes. By this time Sir, the two enemy Kings, having agreed upon Judges to hear and determine upon the reasons and arguments of both Parties impartially, They erected a very Magnificent Tent upon the Plain where the Combate was, and close by the Trophy which Artamenes had compiled: Four of the Cappadocian and Galatian Grandees, and as many of Pont and Bithinia, were constituted Judges of this famous Controverisie, after they had all taken such oaths as were necessary to remove all suspicions of prejudice and partiality; also three stately Thrones equally erected, and under them a long seat covered with Purple, for the Judges of the Field, and all this handsomly prepared, the King of Pont and the King of Phrygia conducted Artanus to justifie his pretended Victory: But though he had more spirit then valour, he went unto this Combate much against his will, though it was not to be a bloody one. Artamenes was also conducted by Cixares: Four thousand men of both sides ranged themselves, half upon the right hand, and half upon the left. These Kings taking their Places according to their Rank, and Judges sitting at their feet, Artamenes and Artanus stood at the Barre: silence was proclaimed: But Sir, I will not trouble my self to repeat verbatim the Speeches of these two Orators, I shall only tell you the issue of them; he which spoke first was Artanus, who though he was eloquent, and delivered it with a good grace, yet it made no impression upon the hearers: But on the contrary, the Speech of Artamenes having the Rhetorick of truth in it, and pronounced by a man of such an excellent Presence, gained the hearts of all his Auditors: His courage did so set off his Eloquence, and wrought so upon the King of Pont, that he could not chuse but admire the Spirit as well as Valour of Artamenes. At these words the King of Hircania begun to speak and say, Wise Crisantes, I beseech you, do not deprive us of the happiness to know the sense of what was spoke in this glorious Court, in which the Cause depending was so uncommon, and where the Judges were subjects unto them whom they were to Judge, so by consequence must needs beget a curiosity in them who are ignorant of it. Since it is your pleasure Sir, replied Crisantes, I shall relate as much as my memory is capable of. The first which spoke, as I told you already, was Artanus, who after he had made low reverence unto the Kings and Judges, began his Speech to this effect:

The Oration of Artanus.

Since it doth not reflect upon my Honour in particular, I will not stand to relate unto my Judges all that I did in the Combate wherein I was; It will suffice if I only shew that it is my party which hath conquered, and who ought to enjoy the fruits of their Victory. I think there can no question be made, but if it be granted I was there, and fought, that then I did overcome: therefore it imports the justice of my Cause, to make it appear by strong and pregnant conjectures, since all the witnesses of my actions are dead, that though I was without wounds at the end of the Combat, yet it was the particular goodness of the gods unto me, and not my cowardise which preserved me. Imagine O ye, my Judges, what probability or likelihood there is, that I could fly or hide my self in such an open Plain, or that where the Combat was, where the danger was not less in flying, then in fighting, since if it had been discovered by any of my enemies, I had infallibly been pursued; and if by my Friends, then I had exposed my self unto their Revenge, and all the Punishments which were due unto one who had basely deserted and betrayed his King and his Country: so should I have incensed against me, either my Friends, or my Enemies, or both; and so by consequence should have incurred greater danger then if I had remained fighting: Moreover Sirs, you know that none were compelled to undertake this Combat, so that had I not found in my self heart Page 73 good enough for it, I should never have engaged in the business: All Pont, nor all Bithinia; were not to fight; all the gallant men of either Nation were not employ'd in the encounter, so that if I had feared fighting, I could have declined my Engagement without any more dishonour, then a hundred thousand others, who did not engage themselves. I could have testified desires to have been one as others did, yet not have accepted of it more then they; and since fear is alwaies witty, I could have invented excuses enough to have put it off if I should have been accepted: These Circumstances I conceive are sufficient to convince any reasonable and unbiassed man that I did fight, and if it be granted that I fought, it must consequently follow that I got the Victory, since it belongs un|to that man who remains last in a condition to take away the life of his Enemy; Now, every one knows how Artamenes was more unfortunate then I was: The Kings which hear me, did see how he was steept in blood, all wounded, and so weak, that his Sword was more supported by his courage then strength, and therefore they would not permit him to sight it out in that condition: I confess, the great inequality between us, was extraordinary; and it might very well cause wonder, that of four hundred men which fought, there should remain but two living, the one whereof to be wound|ed in so many places, and the other so fresh and whole as if he had never fought; But the gods work miracles when they please: yet can it be that wounds should be taken for marks of Victory? If so, why hath our Tutors so carefully taught us to defend our selves from blows? Why do we wear any Bucklers? but let us go to wars without defensive Arms: Wounds Sirs, are ra|ther signs of weakness in the party who receives them, then of his great Courage; if men may brag of Victory because they are wounded, the weakest, the ill-favouredst, and most unfortunate have the advantage over the strong, handsome, and most happy men: In Duels, a little scratch is counted a great disadvantage: 'Tis true, his wounds are certain marks that he was in danger but it is as certain that his valour was not able to avoid them; Me thinks I hear some say that his wounds do argue for him; but if I understand their Language right, they pleade his defeat and my Tri|umph, As for this Trophy which he raised in my absence; I conceive it was no difficult matter for him to do since he was alone; And it was a cunning devise of him, which shame of being over|come, and desire of honour made him invent; But after all this, Sirs, suppose that I did not fight, but that I fled in the beginning of the Combat, yet where is the great advantage which he pretends unto? It is true, that then I deserved punishment, but it is not true that he deserves to have the Victory, since he had the advantage of one man more on his side then his enemy had; and since the state of the Combat was brought unto that wherein you found him, it had been easie for that one man which was wanting to have kil'd him and got the Victory. Can he say himself that he saw me fly? if he can, I may chance doubt of the Victory, and hereafter trust more unto his eyes then my own valour; but since my Enemy can say nothing against me, only that he did not see me fight, and that I had received no wounds: I shall desire that his weak reasons may not be accepted of, but rather mine which have truth and weight in them: For it must be a consequent, that if I fought I conquered; and it is apparent that I fought, since I was accepted for a Combatant, and that of my voluntary disposition and desire. And that though I did not fight, yet cannot he be declared Conqueror because then he fought upon inequalities, and therefore his Conquest is not Lawful; Therefore Sirs defer no longer, but pronounce judgement; for I do not oppose against the glory of Artamenes: Let it be granted he did gallantly, and that his wounds are marks of courage and not weakness: I will only insist upon this, that there was not an enemy to oppose me, nor any who can speak a word in contradiction of what I say, unless that he did not see me fight; he (I say) who per|haps was so wounded at the beginning of the fight, that he could not see any thing, there|fore I deserve judgement to be pronounced on my side; for if he did not see me, his eyes were full of blood, and therefore could not: But as for me who by the goodness of the Gods and my own valour did keep my sight, my bloud and my strength; I saw him fight, and saw him wounded, and fall dead, close by this imaginary Trophy. So Sirs, having no more to say, but desire that the honour of my Countrey and my Triumph may be no longer deferred.

As soon as Artanus had ended his Speech, there was heard a strange odd grumbling and muttering noise, without any acclamations amongst the Assembly: by which it might easily be guessed that the people disliked his Discourse. Artamenes told me since that never any thing in his life did so much trouble him as to endure this ignominy; yet he resolved to an|swer without any disturbing passion; and the weakness of this feeble fellow made him turn his anger into pity, and caus'd him to omit every thing that concerned his private injury, only so far as concerned the advantage of his cause and justification of his valour: After the mur|mure of the people ceas'd, and Artamenes had in a gracefull demeanure done reverence to the Kings and Judges, the people pressing in silence to hear him, he began his answer thus

The Oration of Artamenes.

Victory is so high a good, and Cowardise so base an evil, that I wonder not to finde a man who would gladly enjoy the first without winning it, and shun the second though he do deserve it. Desire of glory and honour is born with us, and fear of infamy is found in the basest of men, most deserving it: Neither do I at all wonder that Artanus would triumph without fighting: But in|deed I wonder that considering he is a man of more wit then valour, he hath not shaped his lie more resemblant unto truth; and that he hath made no particular relation of his acts, which had been very requisite, before he can convince us of his coming off so without wounds: at least he should have told us who was the God which so preserved him: I am most certain the valour of one man could not preserve him so miraculously, but it must needs be some other Divinity which kept him invisible from my eyes, whenas after I only was left against three, I saw none about me but they; they (I say) who by their own fate rather then my force did fall before me: I am most cer|tain that Artanus was none of those three; yet I know that the valiant Pharnaces was the last of them which remained, and sought with me stoutly, disputing the Victory; and who if he had been seconded by such a fresh unwounded man as Artanus, would easily have carried away the Victory from me, who was then so weak since he had almost done it without him; I know well enough that wounds are no infallible marks of Victory, but I know also that to boast of not being wounded is no proof of his fighting: Methinks he should have at the least shewed some of his Enemies blood upon him though none of his own; but it seems Artanus went out as if to a Combat of simple Gallantry, where bloody Victory is forbidden: I confess I cannot say any thing particularly against him; I neither know when he fled, nor how he hid himself, or how he vanished: I only know that I did not see him fight, and this is sufficient to convince, that he did not overcome, since he left me alive. There are crimes of another nature, whereof those who are accused cannot be convinced without fight, as that such a one was seen kill a man in the corner of such a Wood, and pull him by the arms, and run his Sword through him; some such circumstance must be seen, or else those who do accuse do rather justifie then condemn. But here in this case it is quite contrary, for in saying negatively that I did not see Artanus fight, is all that I can say against him: But I do affirmatively accuse him of a Crime of which he cannot justifie himself, only in saying that he saw me, that he fought with me, and that he overcame me, which in my opinion will not be easie for him to do or prove. Then furthermore, though he dares not trust too much to the exploits which he hath performed; yet he dares say that because he fled, and I fought upon inequalities, therefore I must not have the Vi|ctory: But Sirs, where found he any Law to authorize this Discourse? At the begin|ning of a Combat, doubtless the number of Combatants ought to be equal, and their Arms also: but when once the Combat is begun, every one may lawfully take those advantages which Fortune presents, or which his Enemy suffers him; What though a Souldier go out of Combat either by death or otherwise? or if he fly, he is as well vanquished as if he had been killed or taken Prisoner? and he who doth oppose the Victory of his Enemy no way but by flying, or saves his life only by not exposing it, is most unworthy to have any share of Honour or Glory in the Victory: But if he do, then I confess, that Artanus having managed his life so thriftily, has some reason to say he deserves the Triumph better then I do, who indeed have not been so sparing of my blood as he: But this Victory did depend upon the death of all enemies; if so, then he cannot say the victory was his, since all these Kings and Judges who hear me, did finde me alive with Arms in my hand, ready to defend my right, against him or any who opposed. Now Sirs, to make it appear that I neither fear his force nor his fortune, although he seems invulnerable, in a Combat where so many gallant men lost their lives; I most humbly desire you to permit me Combat with him in Lists, and in the presence of those Kings who hear me: for if you will be pleased to grant me this Peti|tion, which he never so much as mentioned, and which in justice you cannot deny me, I will promise you he shall vanish no more out of my sight, but I will render you a better account of him. I know well that in some respects it is an injury unto the Justice of my Cause, and to the Title of that most illustrious King whose interest I maintain to put it unto a second hazard: But since upon the whole matter, there is only his Negative, and my Affirmative, without other testimonies which does ap|pear before you Judges, who can never be convinced of the truth, either by the words of Artanus or mine, but only by our Actions; therefore I conceive there is no other way to cleer the matter in question: and to tell you truth, I care not for preserving that by my eloquence, which (without canity be it spoken) I have got by my valour: The Glory of this Victory is too great to cost the valiant Artanus not one little drop of blood; He must Sirs, he must either confess the truth before Page 75 all you who hear us, or else must have the Life of Artamenes: and since two hundred men were not able to give him one scratch, he needs not fear one single man, and one who is so much weakened by his wounds as he is, yet one whom I assure you he shall not vanquish without Honour: Therefore certainly, if he did fight before, he will not fear to fight now. I ask no more advantage for my Cause, O ye Judges; and you cannot pronounce any other judgement but with a trembling accent; and do what you can any other way, one side will complain: whereas, if I shall make you understand the truth from Artanus his own mouth, then you may boldly give Sentence, without any fear of injustice, or that either side will complain of you: Deny me not therefore, I conjure you, since I de|sire nothing but what is most just and reasonable: Moreover, that Artanus may oppose this my desire, by hopes of avoiding Combat, though if Justice be granted unto me, he cannot avoid it: ther|fore I advise him to hope for Pardon, by confessing his fault, and ingeniously tell us, that he thought it better to steal a victory, then to run a hazard for it. But if he will dispute the business, and stand upon termes of Justification, then this gallant Man must resolve upon this course which I desire, and which I beseech you to ordain. I freely give him his choice of Arms: and promise this fur|ther, that though he fall into my power I will not kill him, provided he will confess the truth, and be more ingenuous under my feet, then he is before this majesticall Tribunal: It is in your Power to pronounce this just Sentence, which I expect from you, it being the only way to make that truth ap|pear which I affirm.

Artamenes had no sooner ended his Speech, but all the people made a great shout, much different from that which they made at the end of Artanus his Oration, for then there was nothing heard but a hollow murmuring: but this was lively acclamations and appla|uds which seemed to tell the Kings and the Judges, that Artamenes must have the Victory: His very enemies could not chuse but commend him, so charming is vertue, and so powerfull is truth. Artanus would have answered in opposition of Combate, but none would hear him. None of the Kings did like of this Proposition which Artamenes made, for Ciaxares was unwilling to hazzard again the life of so excellent a man: and the King of Pont, not well satisfied, that his cause should depend upon the hands of Artanus, whom he had no great good opinion of. Mean while, the Judges rise, and consult in private: During which in|terval, Philidaspes, who was present at all the passages, and was driven into absolute despair by seeing new honours every day heaped upon Artamenes, addressed himself unto Ci|laxares, and moved him to take into his consideration the smal time since Artamenes left keeping his bed, and his chamber, therefore he humbly desired him to let him have the honour of fighting with Artanus, in case the Judges permitted a second Combate, which favour would eternally oblige him. Philidaspes spoke not so low, but Artamenes jealously observed him, and suspected such a thing, and fearing lest he should obtain his desire, he addressed himself and said, Sir, do not hearken unto Philidaspes, since what he desires is equally injurious both unto his Honour and mine: How know you that, replied the young stranger? I know (replied Artamenes) that such a man as Philidaspes ought not to fight with a coward, u|less he were forced to it as I am; and it is a wrong done unto my self, to think that I have need of all my strength to vanquish such an enemy as he is. Although Artanus were Artamenes, replied Philidaspes roughly, I would desire as much. And though Artanus were Philidaspes (replied my Master) I would not yield my place unto another: Ciaxares seeing them so high in contest, and fearing it might proceed further, did embrace them both; and commending their courages and zeal, caused them to embrace each other: He told Philidaspes that he was not to be judge in his own cause, therefore could not satisfie him; and he told Artamenes, that he had no reason to have an ill opinion of Philidaspes for his offer: He commanded them both to expect the sentence of the Judges patiently. The Judges were in long Consultations before they could resolve what sentence to pronounce: For though every one did verily think that Artanus had plaid the villain, yet notwithstanding he so peremptorily denying it, and there being no witness to prove it, they were much intangled in their judgements. Those of Ciaxares his side could not give sentence against their Prince, for all they which knew Artamenes could not doubt but he had Vanquished; and those of the King of Pont's side, although they did believe the same, yet durst not give sentence against their Prince, because their belief was grounded only upon conjectures. So that after a full Consideration of the whole matter, they resolved upon Combate; and gave Sentence, That he who could cause his enemy to confess he was Van|quished, should be esteemed victorious: And if it should so hap that his enemy should die without confession, the matter should be interpreted advantageously for him who killed Page 76 him: That the Duel should be in close Lists, as Artamenes desired it, and in the presence of both enemy Kings. No sooner was this sentence pronounced, but Artamenes was all Joy, and thanked the Judges after such a manner as did presage Victory, but so did not Artanus, who went along grumbling against the Judges and the King his Master; so that (as we came to know afterwards) this Prince being of a gallant disposition, did treat him but scurvily, and told him sharply, that if he had really overcome before, he might over|come again; but if he had plaid the part of a base coward, as he began to suspect him, then he should be very glad to see him punished by the hand of Artamenes: adding further, that he should not grieve so much for the loss of Cerasia, as he should rejoyce at his ruine, and that the one would be a Cordial against the other. After all, this Prince caused him to be diligently watched, least this coward should play him a second prank, and avoid Combate by slight, as doubtless he had done, if he could have found a handsome opportunity. As for Cixares, he was sorry for nothing, but that he was to hazard the life of such an illustrious man, and engage him in fresh danger, since the veriest coward might by a misfortunate hit, chance to wound the bravest man in the world. Mean while, the time of Combate being limited to be within four daies, every one retreats unto the Towns in which the Kings had encamped their several Armies. Cixares was no sooner in the Town of Anisa, but he went unto the Princess chamber, waited upon by Aribees, Artamenes, Philidaspes and many others. He no sooner acquainted her with what was resolved upon, but she presently said, What Sir, is it just that he should be put to overcome an enemy twice? Is not one drop of Artamenes blood more worth then the conquest of Cerasia? For my part (added she, and held her hand before her face to hide her blushing) I confess my weakness, and cannot hear you talk of Combats and fights, without fear and trembling, especially when they reflect upon the Life of him who has preserved yours Sir. Madam (interrupted Artamenes) you infinitely honour me, in taking any care of my life, which could never be better exposed then in the Kings service: But Madam, never fear me in this Combate, rather be sorry that I have so weak and base an enemy to fight withall. The fault is not in Philidaspes Madam (said Aribees unto the Princess) that Artamenes is exposed unto this danger, since he hath endeavoured all he could to exempt him, and fight in his room; It is very true Madam (seconded Philidaspes) that I assumed the boldness to Petition the King for it, but he did not think me worthy of that honour. That's not the reason (answered Cixares) I did not deny you because I thought you were unworthy, but because I thought it unjust. Then added my Master, This is another reason, Sir, because Artamenes would not have suffered him, for he never uses to yield his place unto another: The King who was afraid least these two Gallant strangers should fall out upon it, broke off discourse and left the Princesses, carrying with him all them which followed him unto Mandana. For all these passages, Love was predominate in Artamenes, so that he never was with the Princess but he observed her with a most circumspect eye: When he was in his chamber with only Feraulas and me, he asked us what we thought of that blush which appeared in the face of Mandana, when she talked of him, and of her dislike that he should fight any more? Was it (said he to us) only an effect of her natural, sweet and calm disposition which is antipathious unto Warre? or was it, think you, the service which I have done her Father that has something engaged her soul in some disposition not to hate me? But alas, said he presently, (not giving us leave to answer) Was it not that she was ashamed, and repented of those obliging words which she spoke in my behalf? Is it not an infallible sign that her tongue did contradict her heart? I cannot absolutely tell what to think of that lovely blush which lookt so like Divinity, and charm'd my soul anew? Flatter me not dear Feraulas (said he) but tell me truly, What do you think of it? and how should I interpret it? Sir, (said he to him) I cannot conceive any thing by it, but what makes for your advantage; for admit it to be but an effect of pity, yet it will be a good ground for you to build your hopes upon, and you may more easily work upon her soul, when she shall be acquainted with those Passions which you endure for her sake: Ah Feraulas (cried he out) When will that be? How long before I must make it known unto her? Cyrus dares not peep out of his Tomb to tell her; and Artamenes who appears to be no more then a bare simple Knight, dare he entertain so rash a thought, without extravagant folly? To tell you truth Sir, Artamenes his minde ran more upon the Princess then upon Artanus; not but that he thought upon the Combate with as much care and memory as was fitting but that when he thought upon any thing whatsoever, still there was a mixture of Mandana in it: And Love which works such wonders, bestowed this priviledge upon him, that he was Page 77 able to discourse of Warre, of business, of news, of complements, and every thing, without ever omitting the dear thoughts of his Princess. Mean while, the day of Combate comes on, and he must go to take his leave of her, with such jolly looks, as gave assurance of Triumph. Madam (said he) I come to beg some Arms of you, wherewith to fight Artanus: I had rather (answered she most sweetly, but more sad then usual) finde out a way to make you invincible: You may do it easily Madam (said he) if you do me but the honour to accept favourably of those services which I shall do for the King and you; and doing me only the favour, of wishing me Victory. For if I be so happy, though Artanus were the Valour of the world (as heaven knows he is not) I should most undoubtedly vanquish him. If there want nothing but acknowledgement of your services (replied the Princess) and my prayers to make you triumph, go Artamenes, go, and fear not being vanquished. After this, the Princess, as if she were weary of this kinde of discourse, bad him farewell in a most sweet and obliging manner; and Artamenes went towards the King, who was ready to go unto this Combate: Cixares was followed only with two thousand men as before: The Kings of Pont and Phrygia met also with the like number in the same Plain and Place where the Judges pronounced Sentence, that was close by the Trophy of Artamenes. There they rail'd out a piece of ground which was longer then wide, and of sufficient bigness for a Combate. Artanus who thought his Sword too much, would fight with no other offensive Arms; alwaies imagining that the fewer Arms his enemy had, the less should he be exposed unto them: Either of them one Sword and one Buckler was all their Arms. At the two ends of the Lists there was two Scaffolds erected for the enemy Kings: and at either side another for the Judges. The four thousand Souldiers were rankled some behinde the Scaffolds, some on the sides of the Lists, all remaining under their own Colours, not mixing, but so placed that all might see. At both ends of the Lists there was two entrances for the two Combatants, into which Artamenes and Artanus entered at one time, and presaged the event of the Combate at the first, by their different Aspects: Artanus would fight on horse back, having more confidence in his strength and nimbleness, then in the courage and valour of him which rid him. But he knew not that the more vigorous and fierce his Horse was, the less was he serviceable unto that Rider who was afraid to ride him, or could not guide him: Artanus then appeared in most magnificent Arms, and upon a milk white Horse, so fine, so well made, and so sprightly, that at first he invited all to look upon him: he had a lively and a proud look, pawing with his foot, shaking his main, foming at his mouth, and violently neighing, he began his career: he seemed impatient to carry his Master unto his enemy. But Sir, although the Horse of Artanus did winne the admiration of all men, yet the ill-favoured posture of him who rid him desired the pity of all spectators: the least motion of the Horse shook him almost out of the saddle: and one might plainly perceive, all his endeavours were to keep him from his enemy, as if he were afraid to be too soon assaulted. As for Artamenes, he appeared otherwise: for though he rid upon a very handsome black Horse, yet this day he took but very common Armes, as being ashamed to fight with so base an enemy. He carried his body boldly, and his countenance confidently; he sate his Horse gracefully, and was so dexterous a Master of him, that it was easie to perceive he knew how to command him: All such Ceremonies as are commonly used upon the like occasions being ended, and the signal by Trumpets no sooner given, but putting on his Horse to gallop, he made towards Artanus with mighty fury: he did so little fear his feeble enemy, that he almost neglected the use of his Buckler. As for Artanus he knew not at all what he did: for giving his Horse too much bridle, then pulling him in too suddenly, one great bound bounst him all on one side; then this Horse shaking his head fiercely, and half rearing upright, he suddenly runs away with his rider to the other end of the lists, before Artamenes could salute him with one blow; but Artamenes turning his Horse, he followed him, and fell upon him before he was well got into the Saddle again: then he paid the debt he owed him, and gave him such a blow with his sword upon the right shoulder, that blood ran down his gallant suit of Arms; Artamenes gave him another: Artanus all this while kept himself upon his posture of Defence, but durst not strike so terrible an enemy, lest he should further provoke him, alwaies hoping that Artamenes his Horse would tire before his, or that some accident or other would chance to take pity and relieve him: Mean while Artamenes was much angred, for he could kill him when he pleas'd; but that Victory would not please him: for he desired to satisfie the world out of Artanus his mouth concerning the truth of the whole matter, he fought and spared him also: Notwithstanding this advantage which Artamenes gave him, yet this Page 78 wretch durst never turn one blow back! he was hurt in four several places, not once daring to lift up his Sword against my Master: His Horse being ashamed to bear so base a burthen, would have thrown him; at last, my Master extremely disdainning such a coward, gave him a lusty blow with the back of his Sword, which made him tumble upon the neck of his Horse, who thereupon took that opportunity to throw him half dead upon the ground; his Helmet falling off his head, his Sword out of his hand; and he held fast unto nothing but his Buckler, of which he alwaies made more use then any other Arms. Artamenes lighted presently from his Horse, and running at him with his Sword lifted up, Confess thou base enemy (said he to him) all the truth of my first Victory? I'll confess all answered this wretched coward, (covering himself with his Buckler) so you will spare my life; There is so little honour in talking it from thee (answered my Master, holding his foot upon his neck) that I will grant it: But be sure thou tellest no more lies before the Judges: If thou dost not tell all the whole truth, there's nothing shall save thee from the fury of immediate Revenge. The Judges descending from the Scaffold went into the Lists towards Artamenes, who seeing them coming, Come, said he to them, Come and hear the truth from the mouth of an Enemy. Speak it then, said he to him, if thou wilt live, and defer no longer the vindication of my honour: Then the wretched Artanus being moved with remorse, but much more with fear of death; told in few words the whole truth of the Story: saying only by way of excuse, that when he perceived the manner of the fight, and that the victory was in great dispute, that in all probability all on their side would be lost, therefore he thought to have that by cunning which he could not by valour: In conclusion, he confessed that Artamenes was left but fifteen against forty, that he brought it to be ten to ten; afterwards seven to ten; after that himself to against three; presently himself against two; and at last himself against Pharnaces only: In short, he confessed all he knew, and feared death, much more then infamy. And truly, since he was so pitifully baffled, he needed not to fear the losse of any more honour, having lost so much already, that it was impossible for him to lose more: The Judges, hearing the confession of Artanus, did entreat my Master to content himself with this acknowledgement, and to let him rise and live: I will let him rise and live, answered Artamenes, upon condition he will live in honour, and use to play such base tricks no more. The Judges then were in no more controversie, but all agreed that my Master was victorious: Declaring Cerasia to belong unto the King of Cappadocia, and ordained that the Trophie which Artamenes had pilled up should be hereafter built in earnest unto the honour of Artamenes: The King of Pont did receive this news like a Prince both of courage and wisdom, and he witnessed more resentment of sorrow for the vile action of Artanus, then for the loss of Cerasia: As for Cixares he received Artamenes with extraordinary joy, which doubtless was no welcome news unto Aribees and Philidaspes who were both present: As for Artanus, since he was of great quality, some of his kindred took him off, and had care of him, notwithstanding the Kings anger: But the King told them, that though they did cure him of his wounds, yet he would never look upon him again. When the Judges of both sides had acquainted their Masters the Kings with their judgements, the two enemy Kings, and the King of Phrygia did meet, and saluted one another the second time: The King of Pont told Cixares, that he would return unto his Army, and the next day withdraw it off from before Cerasia, to the end he might take possession of it; He told the King of Cappadocia, in conclusion, that he had more reason to esteem himself happy in having the friendship of such a man as Artamenes, then in recovery of the Town; and for his part, he would with all his heart give half his Kingdom, to have but one Souldier so valiant as he: Artamenes was close by Cixares when this complement passed, who returned an answer full of modest civility, though all which come from a Lover of Mandana was nothing pleasant to him: After this, the Kings departed, Cixares to Anisa: All the people came out of the Town to meet him: the whole Army was drawn up into Batalia: The Princess her self being advertised of all passages by a man whom the King had speedily dispatched with intelligence, met the King just at the gate of the Castle, where Cixares presented Artamenes unto her, whom she received with abundance of joy; But as she did express her joy that he was come off so safe from so dangerous an encounter, Call it not so Madam, I beseech you (said he to her, and blushing) do not wrong me so much as to believe I could think my self exposed unto any danger in this Combat. The honour which you were pleas'd to do me, in promising your prayers for victory, had such an operation, as I became victorious without any danger. I know not (answered the Princess) whether you vanquished without danger; but I am certain you did not vanquish without honour: Many other Complements passed which would be too long to relate; and Page 79 Cixares to recompence in some manner the services of Artamenes, bestowed upon him, not only the Government of Cerasia which he had conquered, and of which he thought to take possession the day after; But the government of Anisa also, with all the Countrey about it, it being vacant by the death of a former Governour. It is but just, said the King, that Artamenes should enjoy that which he hath got, and that which I had lost but for him. Aribees durst not directly oppose this great benefit which the King had conferred upon Artamenes, because his services did well deserve as much; for he had performed absolute miracles in the Battle: He had saved the Kings life, he had brought the enemy unto many disadvantages: He did prodigiously vanquish in Combat of two hundred, and had concluded a General Peace by one particular Victory. But although Aribees did not absolutely oppose this great recompence; yet he thought Artamenes did eclipse him and Philidaspes: he told the King in a low voice, that he apprehended much danger by trusting those two places in the hands of a Stranger; and that it were better to recompence Artamenes by some other places in the midst of the Countrey, then by those Frontier Towns: yet say or do what he could, the King would not alter his resolution: It was his pleasure also to observe the sentence of the Judges, and to erect an everlasting Monument unto the glory of Artamenes in the place where he himself had compiled the Trophies: And commanded the Architectures to place all those Trophies upon a magnificent Pillar of Marble, which should rise a great height with a glorious Inscription upon it: this was in a little time after finished, notwithstanding the continuance of the war: for Sir, you must know that the King of Pont did very punctually keep promise, and retired from Cerasia: But you must know also, that the Inhabitants of this Town did so extremely love this Prince, under whose Government they had lived so long: and had been so ill used by the last Kings of Cappadocia under whom they once lived, that the King of Pont do what he could, was not able to persuade them to open their Gates unto his Enemy: yet he thought that when he was gone from them they would then change their Resolution, so that he would not send any thing of it unto Ciaxares, lest it should incense him against them, but retreated himself as he was obliged, leaving only one Captain with five hundred men with Orders to remain there, and deliver up the place unto those whom the King of Cappadocia should send to receive it. On the other side, Ciaxares being pleased to favour Artamenes in all things, told him very graciously, that he would have him go take possession of his own Conquest in the head of six thousand men: But when Artamenes came there, he much wondered to finde the Gates shut, and all the walls man'd with Souldiers to defend it and themselves, if any would assault it; he thought it strange that he should be forced to storm it; yet he would know what the people would say before he would fall on: He therefore commanded his Troops to keep out of Arrow-shot, and sent to summon the Town, commanding the Inhabitants to open their Gates, according to the conditions with the King of Pont: But they being fully resolved not to change Masters, took up Arms, and disarmed those five hundred Souldiers which the King of Pont had left: then they prepared a Declaration, and threw it over the walls unto the Herald which spoke unto them, telling him, that Ciaxares might there see in writing their reasons why they defended the Town against him; and perhaps might approve of them; also bidding him be gone presently, else they would make him; for they were resolved to defend themselves though the King of Pont had forsaken them: Artamenes having read the Manifesto, stood astonished, not only at the handsome composure of it, but because he saw that never were Subjects so faithful unto their Prince as these: I do not well remember the whole contents of it, but I have not forgot that it ended in these words.

If we were perswaded that we were your lawful Subjects, we would do the same unto the King of Pont, which now we do unto you; But as on the contrary we take our selves to be his, we will die a thousand deaths rather then receive any other Master: We know, that he hath abandoned us, but we know withall that he did not abandon us without sorrow; so that we are resolved to keep it for him whether he will or no, and as the case stands be rather Rebels unto him then change Masters: If we can resist you, we shall rejoyce and be happy: If we perish in resisting you, death will free us from all servitude: Whatsoever befalls us we will not change our King and government: If you be generous, and well advised (as we hope you will be) you will rather recompence then punish us for our fidelity: and you may be glad that we have given so good an example of fidelity unto your Subjects, which may teach them to be as faithful unto your self when there is occasion for it.

Artamenes finding the people to be of Heroique dispositions, would not storm the Town without further order, he sent me unto Ciaxares, to carry this Manifesto, and receive his Page 80 Commands, staying himself in the head of his Regiments, and facing Cerasia. The King doubtless was much moved at this event; and Aribees who had a cunning wit did believe that the people had some other ground for their action, then their pure affections unto their Prince, and imagined that their Prince did prompt them to it: So that since the continuance did redound unto his private advantage, he did exasperate the King as much as possible he could: Nevertheless (as we came to the knowledge of it afterwards) the only cause which moved the Cerastians unto this generous resolution, was only their affection unto their King, and dislike of the Cappadocians. Ciaxares sent to the King of Pont to complain of the inhabitants, to tax him with breach of Covenant; and without any more loss of time, he caused his Army to advance against the Town, and to enter it any manner of way whatsoever. The King ordained Artamenes his Lieutenant General; this struck sorrow and anger to the very heart of Philidaspes, when he considered that now he was subordinate unto the only man of all the world, which was an obstacle unto his Glory, and consequently unto his main design. The Princess was much troubled at the accident: Philidaspes more then she: Ciaxares is restless: The King of Pont is both glad and sad: The King of Phrygia is angry: Aribees is well pleased; and Artamenes is neither moved with one Passion or other, but keeps a medium between both, since he saw his love was not concerned in it, and that was the only thing which could move him either to joy or sorrow. The King of Pont answered those whom Ciaxares sent unto him, that he was very sorry and much offended that the Cerasians did not obey him: and that for his part, he had done all he could: for all he could do was to command them to set open their Gates. But (said he to the Embassadors) I do not think my self obliged to go and besiege them or to fight against those who out of their extreme affection to me, do cast off obedience. It is sufficient that I will not aid them: Besides, they are now none of my subjects, they are the subjects of Ciaxares, and it belongs to him to order them: Yet I do, indeed, think my self bound to intreat them, but not rigorously to compell them. This Prince, thus dismissing the Embassadors of Ciaxares, sent one of his own Heralds with them, whom the King of Cappadocia caused to be conducted unto the Walls of Cerasia, for to summon them to surrender the Town: But they would not obey, and bid him tell his Master, that though he had cruelly forsaken them, yet they preferred death before subjection unto the King of Galatia. Ciaxares seeing their constant resolution, did commend them for it in his heart, yet he plotted how to assault them; to that end he held a Councel of Warre, the result of which was, To carry this Town by force. In order to which, he sate down before it: Quarters are chosen: Lines are drawn: Trenches are cast up: Ladders and other Engines are prepared. Mean while, Philidaspes, whom we did not believe to be of such an ambitious spirit, was full of restless envy: It did appear so visible in his eyes, that all the world took notice of it. He thought, that if he did not come off very eminently at this siege, he should come infinitely short of Artamenes, who had carried it so highly; and so by consequence his great design would be ruined: He also thought what gallant things soever he did in this expedition where Artamenes was appointed Governour, they would all redound unto his advantage. Neither was the King of Pont without his share of vexation in minde; for his Mandana stuck in it; and this affection of the people towards him, moved much tenderness in him towards them again. So that questionless had not the Lydian Warre which the King of Phrygia feared, diverted him, he would have been willing to begin that Warre which he had but newly ended. But Sir, it was not long before he had what he wisht for; because the King of Phrygia newly received some intelligence, that the King of Lydia was not in condition for Warre, a great part of his own subjects being lately revolted. This news begot new resentments in the minde of the King of Pont: But whilst he was deliberating what was best to be done; Ciaxares caused Cerasia to be stormed: Artamenes did things above admiration, and Philidaspes did no less. I will not Sir stand to describe exactly all the particularities of this siege; having many things of greater importance to relate: Let me tell you only in few words, that the inhabitants of Cerasia did desperately defend themselves, and sound enough for the valour of Artamenes and Philidaspes to work <◇> en; and I have since heard my Master say, that he never found such stout resistance as from them: nor did he ever fight more against the hair of his disposition: for considering the courage <◇> minde of the men, and their incomparable fidelity, it could not chuse but <◇> him that his valour should be employed against such men: They maintained the Town against four Assaults, with Gallantry above example: They saw all their Gates broken down, and a great part of their Walls demolished with martial Engines, before they would Page 77 render themselves: And being intrenched towards the highest part of the Town, they still found us work enough. Philidaspes helped not a little in this siege, and both Artamenes and he did so highly esteem of one another, that it may well be said, valour did never beget so much admiration, and so little love. But in conclusion, after these unfortunate inhabitants had a long time very stoutly resisted, they were compelled to yield: Yet before they were the last time assaulted, Artamenes did beseech the King that he might send a summons unto them once more, with assurance of a general pardon, if they would render themselves, and resist no more, which Ciaxares consented unto. At that very instant, there arrived an Embassador from the King of Pont, to intreat the King he would be pleased to pardon the inhabitants of this Town, when he had vanquished them, and not to die his victory too deep in blood: He presently returned this answer, that he would pardon any but Rebels. But this last summons which was sent into the Town returned in vain, and the desperate men made answer, that Let things go as they would, they had rather dye gloriously, then abandon their King, as he had them, nor would they ever have any other Master, and by consequence could desire nothing but death, since there was no other way to get their Liberty. Ciaxares finding their obstinacy, did not only give orders to Assault them, and so take them, but do what Artamenes could, he gave orders also to put them all to the Sword: The loss of six thousand men at this siege was it which most incensed him. As for Philidaspes, never man fought better then at this last Assault: For seeing it was ordered that this miserable Town should be destroyed, he helped forward with it as he could; for it was some satisfaction unto his ambitious jealousy, to see that Town ruined whereof Artamenes was to be Governour: But my Master saved it as much as possible, and at the end of the Combate, did force the King to grant life unto a few which remained, who were constrained to receive it against their wils. This sad Victory was very happily gotten, both for Artamenes and Philidaspes, neither of them having received but one slight hurt. Mean while, both love and anger disturbed the King of Pont's minde: Now he only wants a handsome pretence to begin a Warre: He sends to Ciaxares, and much complains of his cruelty towards the Cerasians: Ciaxares answers, that those whom he had punished were his subjects, and such subjects as rebelled against him more then once; of whom he was not bound to render an account unto any. The King of Pont was pretty well satisfied with this tart answer, because it furnished him with a slight occasion of quarrel: He sends back to Ciaxares, and tels him, that he would hold Alliance no longer with a Prince, who used his own subjects so scurvily, and therefore would from hence forward declare himself an enemy. Ciaxares, for all this, knew that he had an infallible expedient to make peace when he pleased, such an one as would make him throw his Arms down presently, and therefore he never complained against his procedure: You know Sir, that this expedient, which the King of Cappadocia did mean, was the marriage of the Princess Mandana unto him. But yet notwithstanding Ciaxares received this message very sowlly, and answered him with as much tartness as the Embassie was full of Injustice. Now see how things are more embroyled then before: Ciaxares, whose Army was much weakened, retreated towards Anisa, after he had burnt the Town of Cerasia, as well to prevent the King of Pont from ever repairing it, as because he would not be put to the necessity of leaving a Garrison in it, as also to make it a terrible example of his revenge. Artamenes, least the King of Pont should think that this retreat proceeded from any fear, he did intreat Ciaxares that he might stay about Cerasia with ten thousand Foot, and four thousand Horse, to observe the motions of the enemy; and to let him see, that there was no fear of him. Mean while, the King might Recrute his Army out of those Garrisons and Places which were near him, he might quickly make new Levies: and with those Troops which he carried away with him, he might appease that Tumult which was lately risen, which was not of any deep consideration. The King approving of Artamenes his Proposition, consented unto it, and appointed those Troops which were to remain under conduct of my Master Observe here Sir, the strange and fantastical effects which violent Passions doe produce in that soul which is possessed with them: Philidaspes who was absolutely desperate to be put upon such a necessity, that he must obey Artamenes as his Lieutenant General, and who for many reasons was to follow the King unto Anisa, whither he was now upon return: yet notwithstanding all those occasions which required him to be about Ciaxares, and notwithstanding those secret grudges to be under command of Artamenes, he did for all that solicit Ciaxares to be one of those which should be with Artamenes; and was so very earnest that he obtained his desire; The Reason of his desire was, because it was an intollerable vexation of soul unto him, to Page 78 see Artamenes every day purchase new glories and honours, and he no partaker with him; and because he was absolutely resolved to be his inveterate Rival in point of Ambition. The King of Pont understanding that his enemies Army was divided, advanced immediatly with all his Forces towards Artamenes; His Army consisted of five and twenty thousand men: with them he resolved to swallow up Artamenes, or at least make him retreat to his Master at Anisa: But this inequality of number could not make Artamenes budge a bit: I took the boldness to tell him that there was too much hazard in the Adventure; but he answered me that there was more hazard if he declined Combat: since by that he should lose himself in the esteem of his Princess; No No Chrisantes, said he, the designs of my soul are all extraordinary and above common reach: To gain a battel upon equal terms, is the common glory and fortune of every day, which any paltry valour may chance to stumble upon: But to get a battel when in all likelihoods it is quite lost, this is that which Artamenes must do if he will hope to preserve himself in Mandana's favour; and Artamenes must suffer as Artamenes, or else oblige her so that she will not hate Cyrus: In conclusion Sir, He cal'd a Councel of war; But though Philidaspes was of Artamenes his opinion and would fight it, because he would not seem less bold then Artamenes, yet all the rest of the Captains declined it: But however at this time prudence must give place unto valour. Notwithstanding Artamenes was as wary as he could, He possessed himself of all the advantages which the place would afford, and bestir'd himself with as much vigilance and prudence as the greatest Captain in the world could do. The King of Phrygia and the King of Pont did often fall into the Quarrels of Artamenes, but were always beaten off with loss: and in what Quarter soever they lighted, they always found my Master in the head, they always were repulsed, and found himself in the way. These two Kings did set a high value upon him (as we afterwards came to know) for they feared Ciaxares more by reason of him than by reason of all his power besides, whether considering him as the Son of the King of Medes, or as King of Cappadocia and Calatia: But Sir, to make a short Relation; It may truly be said that Artamenes gave and got three little Battles in a short time: In the first he undertook a single Combat with the King of Pont, and gave him a little hurt, and had the better of that Bout. In the second the matter was more dubious, Philidaspes did miraculously, and attempted to take the King of Phrygia Prisoner: But in the third there happened a chance unto Artamenes, which saved his life afterwards, as I shall tell you in the sequel of my Discourse, and indeed it doth deserve your knowledge. Then Sir, I shall tell you, that it was always the custom of Artamenes in all fights that ever he was in, to seek out as much as possible the principal Commanders of the Enemy: He laboured with all diligence to find out and fight with the King of Pont, as he was the King-Enemy and King-Lover of Mandana. As he was searching all about, he saw upon his right hand one Knight who defended himself against fifteen or twenty of Cappadocian Soldiers; He went to them, and he knew him to be the King of Pont who by that number had inevitably been utterly ruined; He went straight to them, and making himself known by his voice; Hold, my Companions (said he to them) Kings must not be overcome thus, they must fight more nobly, and not be oppressed by multitudes: Upon his words, the Cavaliers held their hands, and he addressing himself unto the King of Pont; Valiant Prince (said he, and stooped a little) It shall be none of my fault but yours, if you do not revenge the blood which I spilt, and finish that which was the other day begun: Generous Enemy (Replied the King of Pont, going back and holding up his Sword) It would not be just in me to fight against my Deliverer; neither will I put you to take that from me which you came to give me, nor will I ever put my self unto so much dishonour, as to kill him who saved my life. But when he saw that Artamenes was not pleased with his Answer, and perhaps would force him to fight, he left him, and mingled suddenly amongst the multitude, whither Artamenes followed but could not meet with him that day: This passage moved both wonder and sorrow in my Master: For considering the brave acts which he had seen the King of Pont perform, he knew it could be nothing else but generosity of soul which moved him to do thus: Alas (said he to me, when he returned at night unto his tent) what a dangerous Rival have I met with? and how unhappy should I be if Mandana knew him as well as I do? But O ye gods (said he) that this Prince did but know who he was that would have fought with him, and what the Reason was which moved me to save his Life! He knows not that I saved it only to take it away; for he did not look upon me as a Generous Enemy, nor suspect me to be his Rival. But Chrisantes (said he to me) how is it possible that he should know him and hate him? Have not I more cause to fear who am but bare Artamenes, and who am more hated as the Son of the King of Persia than as a meer stranger? Page 79 Afterwards as a spark of jealousy he commended me to enquire with all care and wit concerning the original of the King of Ponts love, which I did, and which <◇> found out, there being none in all Cappadocia which was ignorant of it: I found, that the late Kings of Pont having a war with the King of Cappadocia, and in conclusion being drawn to terms of Peace, they were to give Hostages on both sides; and that the King of Pont sent one of his children with this, who then was not the eldest: That within six Months after he had been in the Court of Ciaxares, his love took first beginning, but durst not openly profess it, because it was not he who was to succeed his Father in the Kingdom: That in conclusion his Father and elder brother being dead, and he succeeding in the Crown, he sent Ambassadors to court the Princess by way of marriage, but she was refused him upon several reasons already mentioned. Artamenes understanding this was strangely disquieted, for all the virtue, modesty and severity of Mandana had much ado to persuade him, but that this Prince who was so generous, so handsome, so lovely, so amorous, and so compleat a man, must needs in six months time obtain one corner in heart and affection; yet when he remembered how the Princess did cordially rejoice at any victory obtain'd from this Prince, his fears of it begun to vanish and dispell his inquietudes: But his soul was not yet at rest; for (said he) since this Prince who is very handsome, of a good deportment, extraordinary valiant, and full of wit (as they tell me) cannot gain her heart; How can I ever hope to pretend unto it? I who am a Prince indeed but dare not tell it, who pass only for an unfortunate stranger, without estate or Country: So it was Sir, that after this third Combat wherein Artamenes had the better, and Philidaspes became very eminent, he thought good to refresh his Troops a little while, especially since the King of Pont did the like: During which interval, those Forces for which order was given to be drawn out of several Garisons, were come up, his new Levies also compleated, and then his Army amounted unto above fifty thousand men effectual; the King of Pont recruited also: So that these two enemy-Kings were both strong and able to dispute the Victory upon equal terms: Artamenes was received both by the King and Princess with wonderful applause: Philidaspes also was well welcomed, though much below Artamenes, which drave him into a most melancholy mood. During the time, they continued at Anisa, they often waited upon the Princess, and commonly both together, which did nothing at all please Artamenes; How cruel is Philidaspes (would he express him self unto me) to steal from me the one half of Mandanaes adorable looks, and all the sweetness of her Discourse? For he is so continually in her presence, that though every one did not think him capable of such a high ambition, yet they thought he was in love; Why doth he not hang upon Ciaxares, and seek his Fortune that way? Can he not let me alone with the Princess? Let him not think that I will ever be his Rival in that Ambition, to become great in the Kings favour: If thou thinkest I do, alas thou dost abuse thy self: No No Philidaspes, enjoy and enjoy freely all the wealth of Cappadocia: Be more in the Kings favour then ever any, I allow it, but leave Mandana only to me; take some other course to come unto that which thy Ambition aims at, and trouble not me thus in my freedom of Discourse with her; which to me is a very heaven of joy: I know very well (said he to us) that I dare not yet tell her of my passion; for her virtue commands my silence; her modesty and severity forbids me: I have not yet done things great enough to expose my self unto so great a danger: yet notwithstanding I cannot chuse but desire most earnestly to entertain discourse with her without any witnesses: For my Friends, if ever that happy time once come unto me, none shall ever share with me in her favour and lovely looks: I only will enjoy her eyes and thoughts: I should prize this as an infinite happiness though I spoke not a word to her of my passion. How do I know but that this Divine Princess who is so full of wit and apprehension will when I am alone with her perhaps guess at that which I would have her know? and common courtesy causeth her to divide her mind between Philidaspes and me: But what is this I say? (said he reprehending himself) No, No, it is not yet time to discover thy Love Artamenes; but keep it close and let none know it: Artamenes is not yet arrived at that Point where he would be: nor hath he share enough in the Heart of Mandana to arm himself withall against her Anger; He must first oblige her more by his great Services; and gain more esteem by his Heroique Acts: force her inclinations by perpetual complacency: divert her displeasure always if possible, and merit her love by as many amorous respects as ever soul was capable of: And then perhaps it will be time to speak unto her upon terms of Love: But alas (added he) if Philidaspes do continually enjoy her company, how can I have opportunities to do it? In conclusion, he was so full of fears, least Philidaspes should be inspired with Love, as well as Ambition, that Page 80 those different thoughts troubled him infinitely. Mean while, all the fresh Recruits were come up; and the King, before he advanced against his enemy, who was in the field ready to present him battle, would take a General view of his whole Army: And in order to that, caused it pass under the Walls of Anisa, upon which the Princess stood to behold that Martial Ceremony. Artamenes was that day in very common Arms, although he had very rich ones trimmed up, which none ever yet did see, but he said they were not made to be seen, and therefore he would not wear them until he had seen his enemies in them: telling Feraulas and me merrily, that Arms were never handsome until they were sanguin'd with the blood of his enemies. But although he did not that day rely upon his gallant and handsome deportment, yet notwithstanding he did excell all the rest of the Army, even Philidaspes himself, though Philidaspes was very handsomely proportioned, and that day very proudly trim'd up in Arms. The Princess being then upon the Walls, waited upon by all the Ladies of the Court and of Anisa, she viewed the Troops, who after they were passed by the King and her, were by the orders of Artamenes drawn up into Battalia, who stood in the Head of them, and carried himself with so gallant a grace, that he did with delight attract the eyes of all upon him: It might be said, that all this great body was linked unto him by an invisible chain, since by the least motion of his hand, or accent of his voice, it moved as he commanded; sometimes to the Right hand, sometimes to the Left; sometimes to the Rear, sometimes doubling their Ranks, and sometimes their Files; in short, there was Let <◇> very Sergeant in all the Army which understood his office better then Artamenes did. As they were busied at this brave exercise, the Princess discovered afar off upon the Plain, one of the King of Pont's Heralds, who was easily known by his distinguished halbit. When he was come near the first Ranks, he was conducted unto the King, of whom he desired permission to speak unto Artamenes concerning something from the King of Pont; Ciaxares calling him, the Herald addressing his speech unto him, Sir (said he) the King of Pont my Master, who esteems you, and thinks himself obliged unto you, and who would not have the Victory, if it be his fortune to get it, imputed unto any baseness of his men, hath sent me to advertise you, that there are forty Knights in his Camp (whom he does not know, for if he did, they should all be punished) who have took a solemn Oath, and conspired against your life, to be at the first Battel, and not to separate nor seek for any but Artamenes, nor fight with any but him, but either to kill him or perish themselves. This is the Conspiracy Sir which the King my Master hath enquired out, and which was found in a Paper scattered in the camp, but he cannot discover who are the parties or who that writ it: Therefore Sir, the King of Pont and the King of Phrygia who sent me to you, to advertise you of it, not daring to desire you that both for their honour and your safety you would forbear right that day, knowing well that your great Spirit cannot forbear: but they advise you at least to wear some simple unknown arms that day, to the end these base men may not easily distinguish you, nor effect their unworthy design. The Herald having delivered his Message, and made low reverence, also Artamenes another, unto the King he desired leave to answer the Herald, which he did most civilly, although it did much vex him he should receive such Obligations from his Rival. I am much obliged unto the King, your Master (said he unto the Herald) for the care which he takes in preserving my life; But to testify unto you that I am not altogether unworthy of that honour which he hath done me, I must desire leave of the King (said he in turning towards Ciaxares) that I stay you a little before I give you my Answer. Then he whispered Feraulas, who was close by him, in the ear, and commanded him something which none understood: but it was presently known, for Feraulas making haste, and my Masters Tent not being far off, we saw him return presently and followed by a Souldier which carried as a Troopie that magnificent Sute of Arms, which Artamenes had caused to be made for himself: This sight surprised Spectators, and begot a curiosity in the Princess: for Feraulas observed that she eyed the Arms, and was much astonished at them; Certainly Sir Artamenes could not make choice of any thing more magnificent nor more observable. They were engraved with gold, and enamelled with such lively <◇> as the bow of heaven had none more glittering: All the nails were headed with Rubies, intermingled with Emeralds: In the middle of his Buckler was a great Sun, represented by Diamonds which dazzled all those who beheld it: Upon his Head-piece was an Eagle of Massie gold, most rich, which her wings displayed, who bending down her head, and holding the beak <◇> set upon Beak and Talons, did seem to gaze upon the Diamond Sun which shined in the midst of his Buckler: as who should say, that this Sun, which according to Artamenes his devise did embleme the Princess, did deserve more regard then that Sun which shined in Page 81 the Heavens. From the Train of this proud Bird did issue a Plume of Feathers, admirably well mixt with twenty several colours: The Hilt of his Sword, the Scabbard, the Belt, the Gauntlet, the Sute of Arms and all the appurtenances were suitable unto this magnificence, which for the richness of the substance, the excellency of the work, and the admirable variety of colours, nothing could more invite the eye to gaze then it: As soon as they appeared, every one began to ask and desire to know what Artamenes would do with them. The King lookt upon my Master, and stepped nearer to hear what he would say, when Artamenes after a low Congy, and asking leave to answer the Herald, Tell thy Master (said he to him) that since my Arms are good enough to resist his which are so dreadful, I shall think them therefore good enough, not to fear those gallant Cavaliers who have such a high opinion of their valour as that they must needs be forty to fight with one: I Prethee publish throughout all the King of Ponts Camp; that these Arms which here thou seest shall be those which I will wear upon the day of Battle. And assure thy Master from me (if the King will please to permit me) that to acknowledge his generosity in some manner, there shall none ever assault in my presence but one to one: nor shall his valour sink under an oppressing multitude if I be there: The Herald though astonished at the greatness of Artamenes soul, would have answered something, but he hindered him: No No my Friend (said he) do not oppose thy self against my design, and be confident that if the King thy Master did but thoroughly know me, he would not disallow of what I do; Ciaxares hearing what he said would have opposed him, instancing, that it was not wisdom or justice so slightly to hazard a life which was so considerable: My Honour Sir (Replied he) ought to be more precious unto you, therefore I most humbly beseech your Majesty, force me not unto any disobedience: But this (Replied Ciaxares) is to no purpose, yet he dismissed the Herald without any other answer. When he was gone, and the Arms carried back unto the Tent, Artamenes was not moved at it one jot, though the advice did so nearly concern his life. But Ciaxares had other resentments of it, and was much perplexed, almost resolving not to advance towards the Enemy, fearing to hazard that life which was so dear unto him: The Princess who saw the Herald come unto the King, and who knew Feraulas which carried those magnificent Arms, had a great desire to know the meaning of it; so that she sent one of her servants to enquire, who met us as we were conducting the Herald out of the Camp, after we had according to the orders of Artamenes carried him through the body of the whole Army, my Master being desirous that the Herald should inform the King of Pont in what a gallant it was, then we gave him at the parting according to my Masters appointment a Diamond of a very considerable value. This Servant of the Princess enquired of us all which he desired to know, and we told him in few words relating the generosity of Artamenes. He was so generally loved, that this man seem'd to be much troubled at the great danger which my Master did expose himself unto, though he was much joyed to see that he turned all the designs of his enemies unto his honour. He acquainted Mandana with the business of the King of Ponts Herald, and with Artamenes his Answer: We knew afterwards by a Lady whom the Princess loved very well, and unto whom Feraulas did afterwards bear a very good will, that the Princess did presently change colour at the news: that it did trouble her extremely, and that she commended Artamenes highly. Philidaspes who was also close by the King as well as my Master, did also extoll him; but it was out of different resentments, anger and jealousy: Now withstanding I found out this anger and this ambitious jealousy, which is inseparable from all those who aspire unto high reputation, Artamenes had some light suspicions that Philidaspes was in love with the Princess; And I think Philidaspes had no lesse jealousy of Artamenes: However both of them transact as if they both knew it; And they were possessed with the self-same passions. The Princess for her part thought that they were both of them in love with honour and glory only, and dreamt not of any share which she had either in their hatred or love: Ciaxares questionless did love them both, because they did both of them highly deserve it, but with this difference; that his inclination did forcibly compell him to prefer Artamenes before Philidaspes, although he had as many obliging engagements to the one as the other. It is very true that Philidaspes was much held up by Aribees, who being desirous to oppose this new favourite Artamenes, did think no way so expedient as to make this other young stranger his stalking-horse, who as well as my Master had the advantage of novelty, which is a great charm throughout the world: So that these two being in opposition one to another, he betwixt them both might better preserve his own power and credit. Mean time, my Master who let no occasions of his restless love escape his thoughts, resented them very deeply when he understood how the Princess commended the King of Ponts generosity. Page 82 How unhappy am I (said he to us at night when he was retired) and how ought I to suspect my fortune since she useth all her art to torment me? O thou too generous Enemy (said he) canst thou not conspire against my life, without advising me to preserve it in such a cruel manner? Why dost thou not contrive some other way to get the reputation of the world without making me the Subject of thy deserving it? But (said he) I am too blame that I do not make my true case known unto the King of Pont: It is to abuse his generosity, to hide from him that I am his Rival, against whom perhaps he would conspire if once he knew as much; But alas, dare I discover my love unto my Rival, who dare not tell as much unto my Princess? and can I endure that the King of Pont should thus load me with obligations, and force me against my will to return generosity for generosity, and also to preserve that life which I would take from him, which I shall infallibly do whenever any honorable occasion offers it self, unless he exchange his passions? Alas, unhappy Prince (said he) that I should lament thee! thee who questionless dost esteem of Artamenes, thou dost wish him engaged in thy service; that he had been born thy subject, and that he would become thy Creature: But O ye gods: although he were thy Creature, thy Subject, and thy Brother, yet he would be always thy Rival, and therefore thou shouldest not wish his life so much as it seems thou dost. But in the mean time thou preserv'st it do what I can, if what the Herald doth inform me be true; and certainly I shall owe thee my life if I escape; since if I had not been prepared for it, it would have been impossible for me not to fall upon those disadvantages. Ah Mandana (said he pitifully) incomparable Mandana, do not bestow all your esteem upon my Rival: Stay until the end of the battle, then compare his Actions and mine together, and then dispense it with equity: yet notwithstanding there is a vast difference between him and me; for Mandana knows the King of Pont is in Love with her, but she is absolutely ignorant of my passions. May be Sir (said I to him) that the knowledge she hath of his Passion is more prejudicial then advantageous unto him: No No Chrisesantes (said he to me) as severe as my Princess is, and what rigorous virtue soever be in her, it is impossible she should deprive love of that privilege, but that all glorious actions beget a new esteem in those who know them: yes Chrisesantes, Love is a cause of Love; And it is without all doubt that when she is perswaded, all the Glorious and Heroique acts which are done are done for her; if she do not then return Love; yet she will at least esteem and sometimes pity; so that Chrisesantes, at this very time it may be Mandana doth esteem and pity my Rival, and perhaps I may have some share in her esteem, but I shall have none of that pity; and I am well assured that in all her recompences which she hath conferred upon me, there was not any ingredient of her heart or affection in them; may be she infused into them such a mercenary respect as belongs unto one who hacks out his Fortunes by his valour, and who looks more after recompence then glory, But as for the King of Pont he cannot be thought one of these: All his actions are sutes for Love: the war he makes with her father speaks the violence of his affection; His generosity perswades her he is worthy of hers, and all things argue for him and against me: I should never make an end Sir, if I should repeat all his words: Nevertheless as he was the next morning to march towards the Enemy, and after he had given order for all things necessary for his voyage, often charging that his Sute of Arms should be sure not to be forgotten, he waited upon the King unto the Princess to take his leave. Ciaxares did there highly extoll him; but after he had done his Commendations he began to chide him as much for his opinionative resolution to carry those remarkable Arms: Therefore (said the King unto him most affectionately) I am resolved to preserve your life as you preserved mine; you shall stay with me upon the day of battle. Sir (answered Artamenes, throwing himself at his feet) I am infinitely engaged unto your Majesty for your goodness towards me, but I most humbly beseech you to pardon me, if I do not in this obey you; But I am resolved to reserve my self as much as possible, since it is neither wisdom nor justice to expose my self unto the fury of forty at a time, who perhaps may wound me more dangerously in consideration of that service I should do your Majesty, then they could in consideration of my self; Then fight in plainer Arms, Replied the King: for though you have sent word otherwise, yet you sent without my consent, and it is I that must be Master in my own affairs, and in my own Army. It is most true Sir, Replied Artamenes, But Generosity ought to be Master of both our actions, and by consequence I must not do that which redounds unto my own dishonour. When the King saw that Artamenes would not be perswaded, I will leave you to my Daughter said he, and turned to the Princess, Perswade him if you can, and I will thank you: At these words the King embraced the Princess, and went out, She waiting upon him to the door: Artamenes was then obliged to stay after him, and as the Page 83 Princess returned from waiting upon her Father, whom she did not part from without tears, Artamenes unto whom she had given her fair hand, would needs take his leave of her; but she staying him in an inviting manner, Artamenes (said she to him) do you so much fear my prayers, that you will needs be gone so hastily? You are dreadful in all your Actions Madam (answered my Master) and it is my duty to depart from my own generosity rather then from you: I have no design (Replied she) to perswade you out of your Generosity: but my desire is if I could possible to oblige you not to expose without necessity, unto danger, a life so glorious as yours, and which hath been so serviceable unto my Father: You know (said she) that reason should be the limits of all our actions: Valour hath its bounds, beyond which is rashness rather then right valour. Madam (said he interrupting her) it better becomes a man of my age, rather to go beyond those strict limits which your exact wisdom prescribes, then to stay short of them: The excess is always better then the defect: Your Argument is good (Replied the Princess) but I would have Artamenes be neither too timorous nor too bold. Madam (said he, interrupting her again) it is not impossible* but I may regulate my self according to this precise mediocrity which you desire me. But in the choice of these two extremes, I most humbly beseech you, Give me leave to incline more unto that way in which I may meet with honor, then the other where honor never comes: Oftentimes (said the Princess interrupting him) we must surmount and overcome our selves; Yes Madam (answered Artamenes,) We must, so the Victory do not make us unworthy to conquer others; Mandana then said, I do not desire of you that you will not fight, but only that you would not wear those remarkable Arms at the first battle. Madam (replied my Master) you may command from Artamenes that which is most hard for him to part from, without any thought of disobedience; but for this he cannot consent unto your desire; a Disguise (said he and blusht) is allowable in Love but not in War: In short Madam (continued he and smild) it is far from my disposition to hide my self from my enemies, or to render my self less remarkable. If I were so absolutely qualified as to merit a Favour from the most excellent Princess upon earth, I should then take the boldness to beg of illustrious Mandana that glorious and magnificent Scarf which now she wears: and if I had the glory to obtain it, it would be an infallible Preservative against all dangers, and an absolute certainty of Victory: It would render me invincible in rendering me more remarkable. Artamenes (Replied the Princess, and blusht her turn) hath all the excellent qualities to deserve the care of the greatest Princess of the world for his preservation: And if I were perswaded that this Scarf whereof you speak could preserve you invulnerable, you shall without all doubt easily obtain it: But I am so far from thinking it will preserve you, that if I should give it unto you, I should fear my self accessory unto your ruine, and that it would invite the arrows of your enemies unto your heart, for which end I have not kept it: You are (most ingenious Madam, answered Artamenes) and can oblige me in denial of it: But Madam (continued he with a more serious countenance) I have nothing to ask you, for indeed to desire that were to desire my enemies should not see me, as perhaps some of them shall not; if my Fortune do not fail me, nor my courage betray me: I am glad (replied the Princess) that you have put me in a condition to refuse you nothing: But Artamenes (continued she) what will you do? I will vanquish your enemies Madam (answered he) and do that which shall make you know I have vanquished them; which I could never do, if I should hide my self as you desire me. As they were in this discourse, in comes Philidaspes, who came to take his leave of the Princess: All three changed colour at once: Philidaspes for anger to finde my Master there: Artamenes for spite, to be so interrupted by him: and the Princess for shame whereof she her self could not tell the cause. Because it was a good while, since the King went out of Mandanaes Chamber, therefore he thought fit to leave Philidaspes with her, whilst he went to seek the King, but it was absolutely impossible for him to stir; and therefore, he stayed there as long as Philidaspes. As soon then as Philidaspes entred, the discourse did alter, as though there had never been any expressions of Love between Artamenes and Mandana, and as though she never knew that my Master was in Love with her? for that pure and noble fire, which afterwards did enflame his heart, his soul and all his faculties, was yet but a little weak spark; yet Feraulas and I did think (for we were both present at this discourse) that this arrivall of Philidaspes, did a little crosse and anger the Princess. He no sooner came near her, but she sweetly spoke, with abundance of civility to him; but how much sweetness soever the incomparable Mandana retain'd in her soul, yet she always appear'd majesticall, modest, and high in her looks; so that my Master has often told me, when he was with her, he durst not so much as think upon his Passion, much lesse express it; inasmuch as she made Page 84 him fear as well as Love her: Philidaspes and Artamenes staid a good while with her, but durst not openly express the least shadow of that secret aversion which they had one of another: And as they were both strangers to her, she treated them both alike with equall civilities. Yet notwithstanding, because Artamenes had the Command over Philidaspes in this Martiall occasion, and perhaps the Inclination of the Princess prompted her, therefore she did more honour unto Artamenes then to Philidaspes. As they were ready to depart, Go, Generous stranger (said she to them,) go and be happy; and manage your Lives so, in the day of battle, that I may receive all the particulars of the victory from your two mouths; but above all things, have a care of the King. It is to me Madam (replied Philidaspes) whom that Honour belongs, for as for Artamenes, he will have enough to do with his forty Cavaliers, without looking unto any else: We shall see, Madam, at the end of the Battle (answered Artamenes) who it is which best acquits himself of his Duty: for if I be not mistaken, it is best judging upon the event. I question not, replied the Princess, but you will both of you do such things as will well become men of great Souls and high Honour: and I will go to present my Prayers unto the Gods, that they will be pleas'd to make you Conquer and Triumph. Upon these words she left them both, and went immediately unto the Temple. Presently after, the Lieutenant of the Guard, came to tell Artamenes and Philidaspes, that the King commanded them to hasten unto their Commands; and certainly it was well this Order came so happily: for if their converse had continued but a little longer in the absence of the Princess, I believe they would have made a quarrell of it; so averse were their dispositions when they were together. The reason why they were so hastily commanded away, was because the Souldiery was a little in disorder, and talked very high, in a time when it was fit for them to think of Action. They both then went after the King: and the whole Army which was already upon their March, advanced toward the enemy; who was not above two days march from thence. I know Sir you wonder to hear me tell of so many Battles as Artamenes fought and got in this War: But Sir, to lessen your wonder, you must know, that there are not many Garrisons or places of strength, neither in Bithinia, Gallatia or Cappadocia; so that the victory doth alwaies fall unto him who can make himself Master of the field, which cannot be but by fighting and gaining of battles. The first day of this March Artamenes was all in a dump: And because I knew it could not be the apprehension of this danger whereof he was forewarned, which could cause this reservedness, but I knew that his phantastical passions of Love would oftentimes forge Mountains out of molehills, and make every trivial accident to be a matter of great importance, therefore I resolv'd to ask him what it was which so much troubled his minde; whether it was because the Princess denied him the Scarf which he asked, or the deniall of any thing else which was less advantageous to him? Can the reason of it Chrisantes (said he) be, because she hath a care of my life? and thinks this Scarf which is so rich and maguificent will make me more remar|ked by the eye of my Enemies? Or is it not rather because she thinks me unworthy of it, and because she will not give me any cause of complaint: therefore her dexterous with hath contrived this obliging pretence to colour her denial? In short, whether do you think it was for Artamenes or against Artamenes that she refused it? and whether must I commend or complain of her for it? Should I be sad or be glad at it? Would I could rightly know the thoughts of my Princess, that I might regulate mine own accordingly? But alas (said he) whatsoever her thoughts are, they are all reason, and I have no cause to complain: If she refused it because she feared some fatality in it prejudicial to my life, it were an unconceivable favour; and if she refused it because she thought my quality unworthy of such an honour, then she hath done only a wrong to Cyrus, but not to Artamenes. But O ye gods (ad|ded he) if after the services which Artamenes hath done her she refused the Scarf unto him because he was but Artamenes, how can he ever hope she will ever permit him to tell her that he loves her? or how can he ever hope to be beloved? No No, said he, Let us not conceive so cruell a thought; Let us resent the Princess refusal in a more advantageous sense; and let us think that what she said, and said so sweetly, was for us, when she did it against us; Let us not interpret her meaning, and dive too deep into the secrets of her Divine Soul; Let us rather suffer our selves to be pleasingly deceived, then endeavour to finde out so irksome a truth; After this, Artamenes did ponder upon the Princess her behaviour unto Philidaspes, even to the least circumstance; and though he perceived that himself was much more re|garded then he, yet he could have been contented if he had not come in at all; and almost wisht that his Princess had no cause of quarrel with him; therefore he chid himself for all those fantastical thoughts which his Passion caus'd to conceive of her; Her, who as violent as she Page 85 seem'd to be, did yet permit him to follow the rules of reason. But to be short Sir, we <...> d that day: The morrow after we came within sight of the enemies Van-guard; and within the compass of two daies time we were in readiness to give battle unto the Enemy; which both sides much desired with equall longings. The King did all he could to hinder Artamenes from wearing those remarkable Arms, but could not prevent him: I never saw my Masters countenance so pleasant as that morning. As for my part I trembled to think of the danger unto which he exposed himself, for all his valour which I knew to be in him: Feraulus and I resolv'd to follow him close as near as the disorder and confusion of the fight would permit us, and either preserve his life or lose our own: Claxares did all he could to keep him near him; and when he perceived that there was no perswasions would prevail, he cocommitted the command of the right wing of the Army unto his Command; and unto Aribies the left wing, under whose command he alwaies ordered Philidaspes. In short Sir, without any further particularizing the order of the battle; It will suffice I tell you that Artamenes did prodigious acts; insomuch as I, who was an eye-witness of them, could not conceive them within any compass of possibility to be done. He performed his Promise unto the King of Ponts Herauld, and wore those magnificent Arms which I told you of: So that it was easie enough for those fourty Conspirators to know him and fall upon him when they found their opportunity. Their Resolutions were (as since we learnt) not to assault him when he was alone by himself, but when he was busily engaged against some others of their party; But since Artamenes was prepared for them, they could not act their design. When both parties were within the shot of Arrows, which had obscured the Air with clouds of them, Feraulas and I who had no eyes but upon Artamenes, did see that he was more oppressed with them then any which were about him: that his Buckler though it was covered with a plate of gold was very much battered: and that there was some likelihood a great number had compacted together, who aimed all at him: But Artamenes without the least astonishment or any fear of that danger wherein he was, lifting his Buckler up with his left arm, to preserve himself from the Arrows which lite like hail upon him; and turning unto those about him; Come my Companions (said he to them) let us go and vanquish those which fight so well at a distance, and who perhaps will not be so valiant with Swords as they are with Bows. In saying so, he led them on; they follow and fell on with so much courage and precipitation, that the Enemies left wing was disordered and thought to call for Quarter: But presently after they took heart, and the Combat was stily disputed: Mean while the fourty Conspirators which were to fall upon Artamenes did not forget the promise which they made unto him who employed them, and it was easie to distinguish him from other enemies who had no particular design upon his life. For these did alwaies shun our men when they assaulted them, and would not engage with any who fell upon them unless my Master: so that it is impossible he should ever have any rest which those who fight in the bloudest Battles sometimes have; for which way soever he stirred he was ready to be compassed about; If he charged one, then he was presently beset with four or five; if he killed one, he brought two more upon him for it: the more he defended himself the harder he was beset; the more he made them fall the faster they came in, and did treble their number to execute their plot. Feraulas and I contributed all our force to fight these cruel enemies, who fell fo fiercely upon him; yet if his own valour had no better befriended him then ours, all our assistance had been in vain: But he Sir laid about him with wonderful fury, and did things so much above imagination, that because they are so incredible I dare hardly relate them: The chief of the Conspirators was so subtle and so basely wicked that he commanded his Cavaliers to endeavour all they could to kill his Horse, that so he being that way overturned, some of their companions might more easily kill him: This Plot took effect twice; The first time I had the good fortune to be near him, and give him mine whether he would or no; and I verily be|lieve he would not have accepted of him, if I had not at that same time accidentally light upon another, one of her side who was next me being killed. But for the second time, I saw the Horse which I gave him fall dead, and my Master recover himself from under him, fighting with those that fell upon him before I could get in to his assistance, for the Conspirators had so compassed me about, that they hindred me. A thousand to one but he had been kil'd at this bout; yet it was the will of heaven to preserve him, and make him so fortunate to kill one of those Conspirators whose Horse was an excellent good one; So that Artamenes without the loss of a minute of time, and in spite of all their resistance which op|posed him, he got upon him, cutting off the hand of one who had hold of the Bridle, and putting to rout all that durst resist him: In conclusion, Sir, Artamenes to my knowledge Page 86 kil'd and wounded above thirty, and took many Prisoners besides, both Conspirators and o|thers: Mean while, the enemies right wing stood out better then their left; and for all the valour of Aribees and Philidaspes, the Victory did cost them dearer then it did Artamenes, al|though they had no particular enemies to fight against, yet in the end they obtain'd it. Claxares for his part he was in the main body of the battle, fell upon the Enemy, and quite disordered them; so that the Victory went clearly on his side: All was in a mighty confusion, The Conquerors pursued the conquered very eagerly: some rendred themselves, and threw away their Arms; Others preferred death before captivity; In short, the Victory is got, and all by the valour of Artamenes, who without all question was the principall cause: for I had forgot to tell you, that at the beginning of the battle Aribees and Philidaspes were forced to give ground a little, by reason of the violent charge of the Enemy, whereof Artamenes being advertised, and supposing himself able to deal with the Enemy wih he had in hand, without them, sent to two thousand men, to the relief of Aribees and Philidaspes; which Auxiliary preserved them from being vanquished, and by consequence was the very getting of the Victory: In all this great confusion Artamenes who had received but two flight hurts, charged and pursued the Enemy in all places where he saw them rally or make any head: As for those who were not in a condition to make resistance, never was a Con|queror so full of sweet, and full of clemency as he. As he was thus engaged in this pursuit, he discovered the King of Pont, whom Philidaspes did heavily presse upon with twelve or fifteen men, and had inevitably killed him, if my Master, who was followed by Feraulas and me with two others, had not come in to rescue: As soon as he came near, speaking as loud as he could, and dispersing those assisted Philidaspes: Generous Prince (said he to the King of Pont) since you are not so fortunate as I am though you are more valiant; you would not perhaps so happily escape from those who set upon you, as I have them who set upon me: If I do not keep promise with you, it is because you will obstinately fight against those men who are not absolutely under my Command; the King whom I serve being personally in the Army: But either render your self a Prisoner, or else fight with me single, I give you the choice of these two: Unto these words which did infinitely ravish the King of Pont, and surprise Philidaspes,) the King of Pont began to reply just when a hundred of his Horse rallied together, and sought about for him, began to charge them who had compassed him about. But the King seeing that he could not fight with Philidaspes who would have taken away his life, unless also he fought with Artamenes who preserved it, went away with as much haste as he could: This little lookt for accident did so surprise Philidaspes as you cannot imagine: yet presently after when he had recovered his amazement, never thinking to follow the King of Pont, he turned angrily towards Artamenes, and sharply said unto him, What, will you have none to triumph but your self? and are you not content with your own Victories, but you must also rob other men of theirs? Artamenes looking upon him with a fiery aspect, It is such a one (answered he) who makes use of the valour of others to vanquish a distressed Prince, abandon'd of his men, who ought to be reproached with stealing a victory, and not Artamenes, who never employs any arm but his own to obtain it; and who leaving all the Plunder of a Field unto the Souldiers, doth seldome make them partakers of his dangers: Those whom Fortune favours (Replied Philidaspes) need not to call any others to their help: Those who dare trust unto their own courage (answered Artamenes) never beg the help of Fortune: I am certain she hath been your friend and helped you at this bout (Replied Philidaspes,) And certainly she hath forsaken you (replied Artamenes) that you should thus need the assistance of twelve or fifteen to deal with one single Prince. It is an easie matter for you to vanquish (answered Philidaspes) who never hath any to fight with but base, saint-hearted, and simple Antagonists. It is an easie matter for you to vanquish an abandoned King with a great number, but you would perhaps finde it a harder matter (added he, and raised his voice) to vanquish Artamenes single, whensoever you shall give him an occasion to fight with you; for he desires it, and it shall be to morrow morning if you please: Let us not stay so long (Replied Philidaspes) then he stood upon his Guard ready to receive Artamenes, who came most fiercely upon him, and gave a furious blow, which doubtlesse had deeply wounded him if his hand had not turned, and the Sword glided upon his Arms. To be short, they both of them felt the weight of each others blows, and the strength of their Arms, do what we could who endeavoured to part them: But here Sir, I beseech you, admire what virtue and true valour can do; we were but only four which followed Artamenes; and they were twelve or fifteen which followed Philidaspes; who when they saw the dispute that was between them, though they took his part Page 87 against the King of Pont, yet they would not do so against my Master, but turned on his side. At this very time Claxares, followed by a great number of men did draw neer us, and caused these two surious Combatants to give over, and suspend their choler. What Demon enemy unto my Glory (said Claxares) would ruin these who have made me victorious? And why would ye do that your selves which Fifty thousand men could not do? After these words he asked what was the ground of their Quarrell; and when he understood it, he chid Philidaspes very much for drawing his Sword against one who had the Command over him; and he did a little blame my Master, for so saving the King of Pont. Sir (said Artamenes to him) I will engage my self, to repair this fault by some way that is more Honourable: and I will promise to bring you this illustrious Prisoner before the War be ended, or else perish in the attempt: Did I not promise in your Majesties presence, that I would not suffer him to be vanquish't by any numerous multitude? and I did but keep my word with him. If the King had not come—(replied the desperate Philidaspes) you might perhaps have been punished, (then added my Master interrupting him) for your boldness and rashness. The King imposed silence upon them both, and by virtue of his Sovereign Authority, agreed them upon the place, and caus'd them to embrace one another before him. In conclusion, a Retreat being sounded, they encamped upon the field of Battle, and every one returned into his Tent, and Artamenes thought upon his; Feraulas who had been wounded did the same: As for me, who had escaped more happily then they, I found my self in a condition to do them both service. The King came to visit Artamenes at night, who not being able to contain his joy that my Master had escaped so dangerous an adventure, he expressed all the signs that possibly could be of a most dear and tender affection towards him. He sent immediatly unto the Princess his fair Daughter, to acquaint her with the Victory, and Preservation of Artamenes: and my Master (as you may very well beleeve) did receive this Honour from the King with much joy and reverence. All this while, though Artamenes and Philidaspes were good friends from the face outward, yet they were not so at the heart; and it may easily be conjectured, that this last adventure did sharpen their spirits: it begot phantastical resentments in both their souls. For Sir, to disguise the matter no longer Philidaspes, whom my Master thought to be only an ambitious man, did love the Princess as well as he; and this is the reason why he was so hot against the King of Pont: looking more upon him as a Lover of Mandana, then as an enemy unto Ciaxares. Nevertheless he drew some rest unto himself out of this accident: for considering how generously Artamenes had preserved the King of Ponts Life, he could not so much as suspect my Master to be his Rivall; thinking it a thing impossible in such a case to be a Rivall, and so Generous both. As for Artamenes, his thoughts ran quite contrary concerning Philidaspes, for his suspicion of his Love to the Princess, was by this days accident more augmented then ever. How is possible (said he to us at night, after Ciaxares was gone out of the Tent) that Philidaspes who cannot harbour any particular hatred of the King of Pont, unless because he is his Rivall, should offer to kill him, as he was about to do? That Prince, I say, who seems to be of a brave and Generous Soul, and is inspired with a Gallant desire of Glory? Ah: No, no Chrisantes (said he to me) Philidaspes Loves Mandana, if I be not the most deceived man in the world. Thus Sir, you see, that one and the same action produces different effects: for Philidaspes did think, that Artamenes did not Love Mandana, because he saved the Life of the King of Pont: and on the contrary, Artamenes thought that Philidaspes did Love her, because he did endeavour to kill him in a manner so dishonourably. Yet notwithstanding this, all these diversities of opinions were so dubious, so uncertain, and grounded only upon weak conjectures, that they could not assure themselves of any truth: but they entertained an inveterate aversion one against the other. However, some two or three days after the Battle, Ciaxares held a Council of War, to consult, Whether or no, they should Pursue their Enemies, who were retreated, and who waited for a Puissant Recruit: And to amaze them the more, it was resolved to divide the Army, and send one part of it to besiege a strong Fort in Bythnia, which was seated upon a great Lake: by this means to divert, and impede these Forces which the Enemy expected: Mean while, the most considerable part of the Army, to stay and wait upon that part of the Enemy which had Rallied, and to act according as they should see cause. Things being thus Resolved upon, Ciaxares who did finde himself not well, returned to Anisa, and left Artamenes Lieutenant General of the Army which was to keep the field; Aribeas followed him, and sent Philidaspes with the rest of the Troops, to besiege that Town whereof I spoke before: The Capricious humour of these two Rivals, would not suffer either of them to be contented with their employment. Philidaspes saw that Artamenes being in a condition Page_ 88 wherein he might sight with the King of Pont, had therefore the advantage of him: And Artamenes thought that the gaining of such a considerable Town, was more advantage then gaining a Battle: for said he, after the taking of the Town, be is got into a place of great importance, whereas, after the winning of a Battel, the Conqueror gets nothing but a bare empty field, without any other benefit of the vanquished: But at last, they must be content; Philidaspes departs with Sixteen thousand men, and Artamenes stays with Thirty thousand; the King reserved no more with him, then what was necessary for his Guard: My Master had received such slight hurts, that he kept his bed but one day: These two Rivals, taking their leaves of one another in the presence of the King, did in appearance wish all good fortunes one to another, but inwardly with a counterfet hate. The next morning, the King removed, and left the command of the Army unto Artamenes in spite of all the solicitations of Arabees to the contrary. There were two Prisoners which were taken in the fight, one of them was much wounded and desired to speak with Artamenes concerning some business of importance: My Master being told of it, went presently unto their Tent, supposing it might perhaps be something which might be serviceable to the King: when he was entred, the wounded man spoke first; Sir, said he unto him, since you have bestowed upon me such demonstrative marks of valour, by those wounds which I have received from your hand, I will give you a full subject for your Justice or for your Clemency: Those are two Virtues, replied my Master, in the choice of which there is no danger of being deceived; yet my nature being evermore inclinable unto Indulgence more then Rigour, you may almost be certain which of them I shall choose and fellow: Sir (said he which was not wounded) that which my brother would say, and which because he is very weak I will say for him, will shew you sufficiently which you will follow, and justifie all the rigour which you can devise against us; for indeed Sir (continued he and cast himself at his feet) we are vile, wicked men, whom our knowledge of your Vertue, hath made vertuous and in love with your Glory, and who by < . . . > ce do hate our Lives, untill we have by some poor service, made a little satisfaction for that evil we would have done you. Artamenes hearing these men say so, knew not what to think; at last, he which was wounded began to speak, and with much pain, tell him thus: Sir, not to hold you any longer in suspense; and to testifie, we are really penitent for our Crime, since we discover it our selves; know Sir, that my brother and I were two of those fourty Cavaliers, who conspired against your Life, and who did set upon you with so much baseness in the last Battle: Alas, my friends (said Artamenes interrupting him which spoke, and looking upon them both without any anger) What moved you to do so? and what moves you to do thus? Why would you then destroy me? and why would you now save me? how dare you expose your selves unto the will of a justly incensed Conqueror? Sir, (< > that Conspirator) we would have destroyed you, because we were unfortunate men, with whom, hopes of Repentence was more prevalent, then true love of Honour: But now Sir, your illustrious example has better taught us, and we do prefer one act of Vertue, before all the Grandure of the earth; and therefore it is, that we had either hazard our Lives in discovering our fault, then conceal from you, how the chief Author of that Conspiracy is now unknown in your power; and if he should chance be exchanged or delivered amongst other Prisoners, perhaps he would act worse then before, and attempt against the most Noble Life living upon earth: How, said Artamenes, the chief Author of the Conspiracy in my hands? Who may this man be whom certainly I never offended so much as to hate me; and who hates me so much as he prefers the death of his enemy before his own Honour? It is Artanus Sir (replied they both together:) Is it Artanus (replied my Master?) Yes Sir, said one of them, (< > was indeed Artanus, who contrived that Note which was found in the King of Ponts Camp, and engaged us amongst the fourty Conspirators, who were to fight against none but Artamenes, and kill none but him: And that man who spake unto us from him, and should have given that Note back unto him, did lose it amongst the Tents; so that it being carried unto the King, he caused this information to be given of it: But since neither Artalmes nor any of the Conspirators were named in the Writing, nor known unto any, nor could he discover the Author or any of his Complices, therefore he sent to advertise you of it, but was not able to remedy it by the punishment of them, because he knew not who they were: Beleeve it S*, it was Artanus who suborned us; it is he who is in despair, and ashamed of what he would have done, and that he should be overcome by you in a manner so shamefull unto himself, and so prejudiciall unto the Love which he bears unto the Princess of Pont, in affliction to whom he is deeply engaged: To get himself into this Princess favour, he came disguised into the Army: where not doubting, but by that Party which he had prepared, he Page_ 89 should kill you, he intended to shew himself after the Battle with your Arms, and if I durst speak it, with your Head in his hand, to the end the King of Pont might take him unto favour, because he had got the Victory over the most valiant of his Enemies: But Sir, the Justice of the Gods and your valour has prevented him: and now Sir you may dispose of our Fortunes and our Lives as you please: If your wounds be not dangerous (answered Artamenes, looking upon him which was in bed) you may have time to repair your fault by some generous Act: for I cannot punish those who repent, nor revenge my self upon those who are not in a condition to defend themselves: Ah Sir, said these two men (the one holding up his hands and the other kneeling) against what man, or rather against what good have we been suborned? Against a man who fears the gods (Replied my Master) taking the one of them up with one hand, and holding out the other unto his brother; and one who does preferre death before the least injustice or the least baseness; And therefore (continued he) I will forget that crime which the unhappiness of your condition caused you to commit; and because I will recompense you for your Repentance, and for the good service you have done in telling me the Authour of your crime is in my power, I will give give you your lives, and promise you liberty, which otherwise should not have been without ransom: Oh Sir, said they, command any thing and be obeyed, for what doth not those men owe who have life given them when they deserved death? I command then, Replied Artamenes, that before you be set at liberty, you solemnly swear that for no consideration whatsoever you will ever employ your valour against any as you did against me: and that you will not dishonour your lives nor your Noble professions by any ignoble actions; Fight against me like valiant Souldiers as an Enemy unto your King, and do what you can to overcome me; for I promise not to refuse the measuring of my Sword with either of you; or fall on me both together, if you have so good an esteem of me that you dare not do it single; but do not sell the blood and the life of any one; nor endeavour to gain by infamy. O Sir, said they, interrupting him, we will rather run our swords through our own hearts, then ever draw them against you, nor ever employ them in any unworthy action: After this, Artamenes did make very much of them; and having learnt who it was which kept Artanus Prisoner, who concealed himself as much as he could, he commanded him to be brought into the Tent where these two Cavaliers were: as soon as he was come thither, and saw him there, then he thought he was discovered, and therefore not staying till Artamenes spoke to him or mentioned his crime, I know (said he) that those Traitors whom I see, who though they had not power to resist my promises, have yet the perfidie to accuse me, therefore I will not go about to deny that whereof they may easily convince me. But Sir (said he to him in a most suppliant manner, and in whom fear of death did plainly appear) what would you have a man do who in losing his honour hath lost his reason, but to cover one crime with another; and finde his own life in your death? I know this is but an ill argument; but since I have no other, I must address my self unto clemency, and ask pardon, since I cannot ask justice but I must ask punishment with it. This this is a strange kinde of fearing ignominy (answered Artamenes) that you should dishonour your self for fear of being dishonoured: No No Artanus, your Passion hath made you extravagant: and this course which you take is not the way unto honour: I think that I know a little better then you how to finde out the paths which leads unto it, therefore set me be your Guide, and tell you without any anger or reproach, that the way to make you forget your former faults is not to commit new ones: If you have any intention to blot out of the memory of men any act which perhaps is ignominious: you must repair it by a hundred acts of vertue and honour; not fall from worse to worse: therefore Artanus I intend to send you unto the King your Master; At those words Artanus changed colour, and it plainly appeared that he had rather stay in the hands of him whose life he had attempted against, then return unto the King of Pont: so that Artamenes observing it, Fear not Artanus (said he) but that if I send you I will send security of your life with you: If I had a minde to ruine you, I should not need to send you any whither to be punished: If I may guess at what will be hereafter by what hath already been, I finde very few hopes of your goodness; and if I may judge you by your present looks, it is easie to see in your eyes and in your way of proceeding, that your heart harbours much anger and fear, but yet for all that Artanus is no more terrible unto me living, then if he were dead: Therefore I will forget what's past; I will commit the future unto the gods, and behave my self for the present like a man of courage; Do you so to Artanus if you be wise; In conclusion Sir, after much discourse together, Artamenes sent Artanus unto the King of Pont, and would never have discovered the crime of the man, if it had not been alwaies dangerous for Kings Page_ 90 to keep such wicked wretches about them without the knowledge of it: but he entreated him to be contented with knowledge of Artanus without punishing him, ordering the Herald whom he commanded to conduct him, that he should not leave the King of Pont until he had engaged his promise not to punish him: Artanus who in spite of all his malice could not chuse but see the moderation of Artamenes, yet could not chuse but complain of his hard fortune which made him finde so much rigour in the clemency of his Enemy, since in giving him life and liberty he gave him shame and confusion also in sending him unto the King of Pont and spoiling his reputation in the esteem of his Princess whom he loved: As for these two Cavaliers Prisoners, after Artamenes had given them their liberty, they beseech him not to send them unto the King of Pont their Master, but to let them hide their infamy in some far off Country: Artamenes who judged that perhaps these men might fear the revenge of Artanus, who was a man of some quality in his own Countrey, did consent unto their desires as soon as he which was wounded was recovered: gratifying them with great rewards at departure: When this Act was made known unto the Princess, she did extremely commend him for it, as well as the King of Pont when Artanus came home; so that my Master had the commendations both of his Rivall and his Mistress at one time. It is true, the Prince was ignorant that he whom he so much extolled was the greatest obstacle in the world unto his designs; and that Princess also was ignorant of his being her Adorer. We understood Sir, by the Heralds return, how the King of Pont had much ado to resolve whether or no he should suffer Artanus to live; but the Herald observing my Masters command not to leave him until he had obtained the Kings promise to let him live, the King did at last promise not to punish him upon condition he should never come in his presence, but for ever go out of his dominions. During all these passages, Artamenes never dispatched any Messenger to Ciaxares, but he presented his Complements unto the Princess; And the Princess never saw any come from the Camp unto Anisa, but she was very inquisitive how he did, and was much pleased to hear all the wonders of his life related. To sum < > up all in few words, it may justly be said of Artamenes, that whatsoever he did, was excellently done: And I remember at that time there was an old Cappadocian Captain who was quartered in Galatia, and had committed some disorder in his Lodging, whereof the Inhabitant came to complain; Artamenes knowing him a very serviceable Souldier, and had lived long in Arms, desired to give him such a check as should correct him but not incense him; thinking it fit to have some respect unto an old Officer, who had been so much longer in Arms then himself; Therefore he sent him this message in a peece of paper, that he conjured him, not to force a young Souldier to take so much holdness upon him as to chide and chastise an old Captain. I relate this passage Sir to the end you may know the judgement and moderation of my Ma|ster, and that you should not wonder to understand that though he was a stranger, yet he so demeaned himself as he was as much feared, loved, and obeyed as if he were a Cappadocian born, and one of the most illustrious Families amongst them. Mean while, the King of Pont having received great Auxiliaries from Phrygia, and so recruited his Army, that he was in a condition to undertake both Artamenes and Philidaspes at one time if he had pleased: But yet he thought it more expedient to offer fight with Artamenes before he divided his Forces, because then he would be more numerous than my Master, intending to relieve that Town which Philidaspes besieged, (and which was well provided with all things necessary to endure it) after he had gotten the better of the day as he hoped to do: But since he was so much in love with the valour of Artamenes, and owed him his life, He would in some way or other requite it: The King of Phrygia and he, did study how to finde out some extraordinary course to be disengaged from those obligations wherein he had fettered them, and not to be so perpetually overcome, as well by his virtue as his valour; They fixed upon a strange and new resolution: 'Tis very true the King of Pont who was really generous, was concerned in it: For although he knew that Artamenes did not so much as suspect his generosity in that business of the forty Conspirators; yet since Artanus was banished, some ill meaning mindes, or perhaps Artanus himself would forge a false report, that the Authour of that conspiracy is not yet known, and will tacitly give it out, as if the King of Pont, although he did ad|vertise Artamenes of it, yet was the Authour of it: and that his generosity in sending unto Artamenes was a meer subtlety: This Prince therefore did desire to justifie himself from any sycg scandalous reports: and in order to that the two Kings caused this command to be published throughout all the Army, exacting strict obedience, that none whosever should use any Bows, Arrows, Slings, Darts, Javelins, or any far off Engines against Artamenes, whose Arms were so remarkable, that none could mistake him: and to use no other wea|pon Page 91 but sword only against him, and not to fight against him but only one to one, as much as the confusion of the Battle would permit, lest so gallant a man as he should die by the hand of a Coward who might kill him at a distance with an Arrow, or lest he should be ru|ined by a multitude as Artanus attempted; They conceived this Act would redound unto the glory of their Nation, they thereby restifying unto the world that they cared not for victo|ry upon base disadvantages. The day after the publication of this Order Artamenes (who trusted unto none but himself in all matters of importance, and who was so able, so vigilant, and capable of every thing, (if I may say it) as he took upon himself the charge of the whole Army, and transacted successively) he caused a party to go out with him and face the Enemy. The King of Pont being advertised of it by his Spies, sent the like number to beat off those who approached so near them: But Artamenes wondred that he was not covered with Clouds of Arrows as he used to be, and far from being compassed about by multitudes, for he never had but one at one time upon him, he himself assaulted many, but he was never assaulted by more then one at once: This accident did a while astonish him, for things were not wont to go so; yet in the heat of action he reflected but slightly upon it, nor thought of any thing but getting the Victory: In conclusion, a great part of the Enemy was cut off, many took Prisoners, and the rest saved themselves by flight in the disorder of the battle. Artamenes being returned to the Camp, the Prisoners which were taken hoping to be used better for it, did publish the generosity of their King, and the prohibition which he ordain|ed concerning my Master. The Souldiers hearing so unusual a procedure, and Artamenes co|ming to the knowledge of it, he caused all the Prisoners to be presently set at liberty, desiring them to tell the King their Master, that he should presently see he was not altogether unworthy of that honour which he had done him; I was by him when this happened; and he was no sooner got by himself, but looking upon me with admiration, Chrisantes (said he to me) what odd fortune is this, to have a Rivall who overloads me with so many favours, and so much generosity, that I am almost forced to hate him? Such an one as by his good intentions unto me, drives me into a strange despair! Doubtless he thinks to purchase the Princess esteem by this way, and seeks more after publique acclamations then victory; Oh, if it be so, said he, how much more terrible is he to me when he preserves my life, then when he assaults me to take it away? No No too generous Rivall (said this amorous Prince) I will not suffer thee to surmount me in virtue; and I am resolved to dispute with thee more stiffly for the esteem of Mandane, then ever I contended with thee for victory in the head of an Army: yes Chrisantes (said he, and lookt upon me) my Princess shall never say that the King of Pont hath done any brave act, but she shall say that Artamenes hath done another as Heroique; at least, I will make such a Combat in the secret of Mandanaes heart, as he shall not with justice overcome me, unless the inclination of my Princess be byassed by lean|ing more unto his side, and surmount me that way more then by his own merit: After this Sir, I would have said something, but he would not hear me. The next morning he held a Councel of War, and according to the order thereof it was thought best he should impede the enemy from attempting to raise the Siege which Philidaspes attended upon, in case there were any intentions of the Enemy discovered to take that course: yet he could not resolve to contribute so much unto the glory of Philidaspes, nor leave the King of Pont so long in the advantage of his high generosity; Therefore he so wrought with all the Captains of his Army by that winning eloquence which nature and education had given him in the Greek Language, at they were all resolved to force the Enemy unto battle, as he himself intended: Judge Sir whether it were a hard matter to make two Enemies meet which sought one ano|ther, therefore it was not long before Artamenes had his desired satisfaction: But here you may wonder Sir at what the desire of glory can do in a soul that is truly generous: Artame|nes who upon the King of Ponts notice concerning the Conspiracy against his life, had cho|sen the most glorious Arms that the world could make, to the end he might better be known to them who ou|ght for him in the last battle, and who now thought that all who knew him by those Arms would not fight against him neither with Bow, Arrow, Javelin or dart, nor fall upon him single; he therefore left off those gallant Arms, to the end he might not be known: Thus did he endeavour to shew unto the world that none should conquer him in point of ge|nerosity: Sir, said I unto him (in the morning when he was putting on his Arms) will you hide all your gallant Acts in such obscure Arms as these? It is fit I should, Chrisantes (said he unto me) at this time, if I will shew my self worthy of that Honor that is done me: But Sir (said I,) is it not to be feared that it will take away the hearts of your Souldiers, when they cannot distinguish you from that great number who are Armed as you are? If they follow Page 92 me (answered he) they cannot chuse but know me; and I intend to behave my self so, as it may be, they shall easily finde me: At last, Sir, they fought, and Artamenes did such things as are not imaginable. Untill now he fought but like a valiant man: but at this time it might very well be said, he fought like an incensed God; one would have thought he knew himself incapable of Wounds, seeing how he adventured himself: He drove their Squadrons on heaps, he broke their Ranks, and charged through and through their best composed bodies: nothing could resist him: In conclusion, he carried the matter so prodigiously, as he made both his friends and his enemies know him, notwithstanding his simple Arms, which were all sanguin'd with the blood which he had lost, and which running upon his Curace made him most terrible to look upon: His Buckler was all mangled with Arrows which fell upon it. The King of Pont meeting him in this condition, and easily knowing him: It is not my fault, Generous Artamenes, (cried he aloud unto him,) since I have done what was fit to preserve your Life: Nor is it my fault (answered Artamenes,) that your valour does not re|ceive an advantage in my defeat, since I do all I can to make you Glorious; and do not spare a Life, which perhaps is more ways then one, an obstacle unto your victory and happi|ness. But valiant Prince, said he, we have contended long enough upon points of Generosity: Let us now try if we can fight as well as we can acknowledge a benefit, for I am much deceived, if we can otherwise overcome one another without dishonour: Upon these words the King of Pont would have replied something, but Artamenes making signs that he had ra|ther fight then talk, did advance towards him; and then these two Gallant Men began a Combate, which perhaps had been very fatal to them both, if night and darkness had not against both their wills parted them, and by consequence had not left both their generall and particular victories in doubt: yet notwithstanding the advantage did fall upon Artame|nes side; for he lost few men, killed many, and took many Prisoners: But since the Com|bate was not ended when night came on, and since both of them remained upon the field in their Arms, it was difficult to say absolutely which side was loser, or which a gainer: yet it was partly a cause of taking the Town which Philidaspes besieged; because that after this the King of Ponts Army was not strong enough to be divided, nor venture to succour that Town, and come between both our Armies. The next morning Artamenes having intelligence, that two thousand men were upon the way on the Mountains which bordered upon that Plain betwixt Anisa and Cerasia, conducting Money unto the King of Ponts Army for payment of his Souldiers; he went to give a stop unto this Convey: so that meeting with them, he forced them into a valley environed with inaccessible Rocks, to shelter themselves; who seeing themselves brought into that strait condition, consulted what they should do; since if they fought, they were lost; and if they staid there, it would be a losse unto their Ma|ster: so that to save themselves, and be rid of that ill condition, they beat a Parley, and sent twelve of their Company unto Artamenes, with their Bucklers full of gold and silver, en|treating him to accept of that for their ransome, and let them depart: Artamenes who was alwaies more heroique in all his actions then they could imagine, told them, that he would freely give them their lives and liberty, and also suffer them to passe with their Gold and Silver, so they would leave their Bucklers which held it, behinde them, as marks of his Vi|ctory: But these stout and couragious Souldiers, throwing down all that was in their Buck|lers upon the earth, and putting them upon their left Arms, taking their Swords in their right, You shall see (said they-turning away towards their Companions) that our Nation never use to leave their Bucklers but with their lives; and may be (what inequality soever there is between us) you shall never get them without danger of your own. Artamenes seeing the Souldiers carry it out so very bravely, was so charmed with a generous envy, as he could not resist them: And when he considered that he had got this advantage without honour, because he got it without danger; and that as the state of things were, an addition of two thousand men could not much alter the case: And seeing these twelve Souldiers go away in such a gallant resolution, Valiant men (cried he to them) come again, and take both your money, your Lives and your Liberties, which you so well deserve: you have over|come me, my Companions, said he to them, and if you had been in the last Battle, the King your Master had defeated us. These Souldiers were as much surpris'd with his Generosity, as he was with theirs, and knew not whether they should give any credit to his words: But at last they beleaved, and having acquainted their Captains with it, all shouted for joy and wonder, and made all the Rocks round about ring with the Name of Artamenes and his glo|ry. Thus were these Gallant men released out of the valley which enclosed them; who when they came unto their Camp, did publish the Generosity of my Masters Name, for which the Page 93 King of Pont sent a Trumpeter to thank him most heartily for his civility. But Sir, I never consider, how I abuse your Patience, nor how long those Passions which I resent for Artame|nes have kept me; therefore let me reflect if you please upon the most important things of my Masters story. Winter drawing on when this last Battle was fought, and the Town which Philidaspes besieged being presently after taken, where Philidaspes behaved himself like a man of great Gallantry and prudence, and Ciaxares having had such happy success within the compass of eight moneths, he called off Artamenes and Philidaspes, who after they had settled all their Troops in their winter-Quarters, and seen their Enemy do the like, did come unto the King, who now returned unto Sinope. I need not tell you Sir how Artamenes and Philidaspes were entertained by the King and the Princess: for you may be assured that it was with as much civility and joy as their great services could deserve. As they were dispos|ed when they took their leaves of the Princess, so they were the very same at their return; the first time that they saw Mandana at her chamber, there they met; It seemed by Feraulas who was there and well recovered of his wounds, that the Princess was displeased and an|gry, yet she shewed nothing but such charms as were able to captivate the hearts of most rebellious Lovers; She diverted her Discourse after such an ingenious manner by her sweet complacence, which had nothing of affectation in it, that she gave them no occasion to renew those differences which passed between them in the last battle, of which the Princess was not ignorant. When you took your leaves of me (said she to them) I remember that I entreated you to look unto your selves so well, as I might from your own mouths receive the particu|lars of the Victory; but now I will spare you that labour; for I have such an indisposition unto war that I do not love much to discourse of those glorious advantages which my father hath obtained by your valour: Never fear that I am ignorant of them, or that I will ever forget them. Fame doth court and love Artamenes so much, and doth not hate Philidaspes, that the least of your actions must needs be published: My soul is more ingenuous then to lose the memory of benefits: But truly I do much affect peace; the calm and quiet virtues do much better agree with my inclination then these lofty proud ones. That Prince then (Replied Artamenes) could be very unhappy, who hath a particular aim to please you, and could finde out no other way to pay you service but by Sword, and Fire, and Bloud. Que|stionless (added she) that a Prince who had nothing but valour, and good fortune in fighting hath not in my opinion all the qualities necessary to deserve the esteem of a reasonable Princess. For if he have those only and no more, I should beleieve that a common ordinary esteem might well enough content him, but he ou|ght not to pretend unto so high a degree as Love: What qualities then I beseech you Madam (replied Philidaspes) are requisite to pur|chase that favour of an illustrious and great Princess? It is requisite (answered she, if I be not deceived) that his valour be not too cruell: that he love victory better then bloud, that his fury last no longer then fight: That he be ever civil: That he affect glory without pride, That he look for it in such waies where he may finde it; That sweetness and clemency be his predominant qualities: That he be very liberal, but liberal with discreet choice; That he be alwaies grateful; That he do not envy the glory of another; That he be just unto his very enemies; That he be an absolute Master of his passions: That his conversation be not lofty or proud; That he be alwaies faithfull to his friends, and terrible to his enemies; and to speak all in one word, that he have all the virtues and none of the vices: You have reason Madam (replied Artamenes) to say that he ought to be exact in all, who deserves the affection of an illustrious Princess: But Madam, doubtless she must be such a one as resembles you, who without injustice can desire that perfection which is not to be found amongst men; and if she never confer her affection upon any but those who are worthy of it, then that treasure would never be enjoyed by any, though without question it be desired by all the Princes upon earth. I know not (said she) whether the affection of such a Princess as resembles me, be a thing so precious as to be called a Treasure; but I know very well that if she resemble me, her affection should not be easily obtained, since by a premeditated design I am resolved never to bestow any part of my Love lightly, but to fight against my own inclinations if they should offer to overcome me; I know not Madam, (said Philidaspes interrupting her) whether this hardness of heart be not as much to be condemned in your sex, as you conceive pride is in ours; I do not think it (said she,) if I did, I should perhaps change my minde: But whatsoever it be, to shew that I am not unjust, I pray know that I am as libellous of my esteem as I am wary of my love, since truly I shall never refuse it unto my greatest Enemy when they shall deserve it; Imagine then (said she to Artamenes) if I do not only much esteem you but admire you for all those gallant acts which you have performed: Page 94 And imagine Philidaspes (said she in turning towards him) if you have not much reason to pretend unto a great part of my Commendations for what you have done: Thus did this discreet and wise Princess entertain these two Gallants whom she perceived to be very ambitious and extremely jealous of their honours; and therefore she durst not aggravate the great actions of my Master, lest Philidaspes who seem'd to be the more violent and hasty should be offended. Then they parted being very well pleas'd with Mandana's civilities, but much troubled to have it from her own mouth, that her affection was so hard to be obtain'd. It appear'd that Philidaspes who was as amorous as Artamenes, and did entertain the same resentments, was a little more nettled then he, especially since throughout the Princess discourse he found many more obliging terms towards his Rivall then himself: All this while Ciaxares thinks upon nothing but Feasts and publique jollities. Astiages hearing of his Victories, sends to congratulate with him, and sent also a great Complement unto my Master, reflecting upon his valour: The Court was never so full nor so glorious as now: All the Officers of the Army made Sinope their Rendezvous, and almost all the Ladies of Quality throughout both Kingdoms repaired thither: The presence of the Princess was free and open: there was not a day but the King went unto her Chamber, and by consequence every one had permission to enter: For since the King was very well acquainted with Mandana's vertue: He did permit men of Quality to enter into her presence, though he himself was not there, since the Lady of Honour her Governess, and all her other women were continually there, and never left her: So that it might be said Artamenes did seem to be very happy though indeed he was not: For he had the good fortune, during the time of his passion to get infinite honour, to serve Ciaxares most highly; to oblige the Princess most sensibly in saving the life of her father, and overcoming all his enemies, so that he might be almost assured of her esteem: But on the other side when he considered the austere vertue of the Princess, of which she made profession; he could never hope she would ever suffer either Artamenes or Cyrus to presume so boldly as to speak of Love: Moreover, the King of Pont and his Passion stir'd up his jealousy; and the presence of Philidaspes was troublesome to him though he knew no reason for it: yet Artamenes and he lost not an inch of any opportunity to see the Princess; They followed her unto the Temple; They waited upon her into the Park and Walks; and visited her at all permitted hours; They neglected nothing that two men equally possessed with passion could do: But that which most amused my Master concerning Philidaspes, was, that besides his diligence about the Princess, one might see him alwaies busie about Ciaxares and Aribees, and seem'd to be so urgent in all his actions that my Master did suspect his ambition as well as his love, though he every moment thought him capable of both: In all matters of gallantry they were alwaies opposite one to another; In all their opinions they differed: 'Tis true Artamenes had this advantage that he opposed Philidaspes without any shew of humorousness in his minde, which his Rivall could not brag of: For though really he was a very compleat man, yet he was of a more violent, conceited and active temper: he was alwaies too full of contradiction in his Discourse, and therefore not so plausible. Truth is, it appear'd one night when they were with the Princess that he was not absolute Master of himself or thoughts, but suffered them sometimes to rove further then he would have them; There was then but few about her, and these two secret Lovers were there almost alone with her. After discourse upon many severall Subjects, The Princess had a great desire if it were possible to unite them, to the end they might become more serviceable unto her Father, and beginning to discourse upon what might be the ordinary cause of friendship; I have wondred a hundred tunes (said she to Artamenes and Philidaspes) that I could never discover any great matter of friendship betwixt you two; for though I know you do esteem of one another very much, yet me thinks you love not one another so much as you should do: I mean (said she) that confident friendship and tenderness of affection which dare trust and tell all things unto him that is loved, and partake of one anothers sorrows and joys. For you are both of you strangers, and both men of spirit, courage and generosity; You serve the same Prince, and you should love one another; for I beleieve your souls are too gallant to be capable of envy: If so, then how comes it to pass that you do not love as much as esteem one another? And why cannot I finde that Union of soul betwixt you, which makes Friends reveal their hearts and secrets one to another? Perhaps Madam (answered Philidaspes) it is because we esteem too much to love one another also; And perhaps also it may be Madam (replied Artamenes,) that our secrets are of two great a consequence to be revealed unto any; I would therefore gladly know (replied the Princess, and that very precisely) Page 95 what it is which doth disunite you; For I do confess I cannot finde it out; For my part (continued she) I know but of two passions which can hinder gallant men from loving one another, those are Ambition and Love: As for the first of these, I do beleieve my Father is able to satisfie you both. As for the second, I can neither suspect that two men so generous as you are can be so weak, nor indeed do I see any appearance of it: And it may be that there is not one of my Women (said she smiling and looking upon them all) that hath not secretly chid her Beauty, because she has not fettered you, since you came to Court; where it is observed, that the inclination is not at all that way: Tell me, then (said she to them) I conjure you, and do not hide the truth of the matter from me; I leave you to judge Sir, in what a Labyrinth Artamenes and Philidaspes were noe entangled: and what an odd chance this was, that the Princess should desire that thing which they could not tell her, and that which would have amazed her, if they should have assumed the boldness to have told what they knew, though neither of them in particular knew all they desired to know. For it is certain, that as yet she did not suspect any thing either of the Passion of Artamenes or Philidaspes: and that Artamenes and Philidaspes did hate one another rather by reason of certain secret jealousies which they had of their designs, then out of any certain knowledge of the truth. Yet the Princess, whose aym it was to act the most advantageously she could for the service of the King her Father, and to reconcile the mindes of these two Men who were of such eminency, did very much presse them, to tell her what was the obstacle which obstructed their friendship: Madam (answered Artamenes,) It will be a hard matter for me to tell you, since ordinarily I do not use to have any difference with those I esteem: As for me (replied Philidaspes,) I will go a little further then that, and say, I am never used to have any thing but difference with those I do not Love, whether I esteem or dispise them: my Heart (said he) cannot rest in such a just Medium, between Love and hatred: and though I could, yet I should byasse more to one side then the other: you make me much joyed (answered the Princess very hastily, least Artamenes should make such a reply as should sharpen the spirit of Philidaspes,) for I never could suspect that he could hate such a man as Artamenes, who never offended you; whom all the Court knows; whom the King my Father does extremely Love, and whom I esteem very much: so Philidaspes (continued she, not giving him leave to speak) since doubtless you cannot hate Artamenes, I conclude that of necessity you must Love him a little: and if so, I hope that I shall not have no hard task to make you Love him much: for, said she, in turning towards Artamenes, Doubtless you will never resist me, nor ever disagree with Philidaspes, who is owner of a hundred excellent Qualities, and whom the King my Father esteems infinitely; he who certainly Loves you a little, and who deserves the approbation of those who are more knowing then I am: And, added she, if there be any prevalency in my Prayers, you shall, for the Love of me, carry it so for the future, that the whole Court shall take notice of the good correspondence which is betwixt you, and no more wonder at the coldness which appears in all your actions, and in all your words, the cause whereof every one is most ignorant. Perhaps Madam, answered Philidaspes, we know it not our selves: But, said the Princess, whether you know it, or know it not; I hope you will do as I desire you: The Gods, Madam (said Artamenes,) for ought I see, are not so rigorous as you, since they allow us liberty to Love or hate those whom we judge worthy of either: Be pleased to be satisfied Madam with that Lawfull Authority which your rare Qualities have given you over the hearts of all them who have the honour to come neer you; and do not Tyrannically (if that which I owe you will permit me to phrase it so) impose upon Philidaspes, to Love Artamenes compulsively: nor upon Artamenes to Love Philidaspes, whether he will or no: If they will at any time Love, let them have the freedom of their own choice entire, and take not from them the Merit of their Affection: And if they will eternally hate one another, (replied Philidaspes,) let them have the liberty to do it, without any just offence to you. That cannot possibly be (replied she,) for I esteem both of you too much to suffer it. Why Madam, said Artamenes to her (and changing colour,) Cannot I hate Philidaspes, unless I do anger the Princess Mandana? No, said she, nor Philidaspes hate Artamenes, without offending me extremely, since I have so desired of him the contrary. We are both of us then, very happy, and very unhappy, replied Philidaspes: and you shall be both of you very reasonable, if you will Love one another, for the Love of me. This is not possible, replied Philidaspes. Indeed Madam, answered Artamenes, I think it would be much more easie for you, to hate one another for the Love of you, then to Love one another for the Love of you; for, said he, both of us ayming at Glory as we do, and seeking out all occasions to eminent Page 96 our selves by obtaining the esteem and friendship of the King, if you should byas more unto Philidaspes then unto Artamenes, I think that Artamenes though he durst not complain of you, yet he would hate Philidaspes a little: And I my self think (replied this violent Prince,) that though it should happen so to me, Philidaspes would content himself with esteeming Artamenes without any Loving him. The Princess was then very sorry she had undertook a business, which she found much more hard to compose then she believed; therefore she thought it better to end this discourse then continue it any longer. Then she begun to speak unto them with abundance of excellent sweetness; at least, said she, will you Promise me to live together as if you did Love one another; and that you will not contradict one another in any thing? Philidaspes (answered Artamenes) seems to be so zealous in the Kings service and yours, Madam, and I also the like, that it may be imagined, there will be always much concurrence in all our designs: I know (replied Philidaspes) that at the least we shall meet one another very often: And I think that ever since the first day Artamenes arrived in Cappadocia, I have every day seen him. It is true that I met you at the Temple of Mars (answered Artamenes) the same day I came to Sinope: What day was that (asked the Princess?) It was the same (answered Philidaspes,) whereon you offered a Sacrifice of Thanks unto the Gods, for the Death of that Prince who would have subverted all Asia, and usurped your Crown from you; I remember it very well (said the Princess, desiring to break off the former discourse,) and I never in all my life, had so little devotion to render thanks unto the Gods for a Benefit as I had that day; not but that according to the Predictions of all the Magi, the Ruin of young Cyrus was a happy fate for all Asia; but because that naturally, I ever had such a repugnance in me against rejoycing at the death of any one, as that I had need to have a great interest in the Publique Felicity if I consent unto it. Why Madam (answered my Master, blushing a little,) are you so good as not to hate Cyrus? How (said Philidaspes interrupting him, who always would be of a contrary opinion) Can she hate a Prince whom she never saw; and who is her Cosen, and who, as I am assured, was one of much merit? therefore it was neither reasonable nor possible to hate him: But (answered my Master) it seems you told me, that he would have subverted all Asia, and usurped the Crown from the Princess: But I said it (replied Philidaspes sharply) because the Magi said so, without seeing any appearances of it. Cyrus (answered my Master very coldly) would be much obliged to you if he were living: but not very much to you, replied Philidaspes, who would have him hated when he is dead. Since the King my Father (said the Princess to them) has both you about him, who are such gallant Defensors, in his Service, I beleieve it had not been easie for Cyrus to destroy us. This opinion, Madam, answered my Master, is a great Glory to us. I should have acknowledged as much, replied Philidaspes, if she had named none but me. I shall leave you to judge Sir, what effects this discourse did beget in my Masters spirit: but as he was about to reply, the King came in, and broke off further discourse. After he had staid a while with Mandana, he went out to walk by the Sea side, and every one followed him. As ill luck would have it, Aribees held the King in a long private discourse, so that Artamenes and Philidaspes turned to each other, and took a walk by themselves: and since they came out from the Princess with exasperated spirits, so they were a little while silent, both of them questionless recalling unto memory all that passed: Did ever any one see such cross Fortune as mine (said Artamenes to himself) Mandana would force me to Love Philidaspes, who Loves not me; who is opposite to all my designs; who contradicts all my discourse; whom I always finde about the Princess; who looks upon me with envy, and perhaps is my Rivall. This last reflexion imprinting it self very deep in his soul, did move anger to appear very high in his looks; and I, who was not far off, observed it; I think his enemy also, had very neer the same thoughts: at length I perceived Philidaspes and he change colours both together at an instant; and by their musing study which both stood in, I perceived them to be very angry and cholerick: After they had stood a while without speaking a word, and standing at distance once from the other; Artamenes on a sudden rousing himself out of his musing, saw that the King and the company was a good distance off, and remembering what Philidaspes had said in the Princess presence; You have reason, said he, to say that we meet very often, since without any design we are met here single together in the midst of so much people: I care not much (replied Philidaspes briskly) for meeting here in a walk; but I must confess to you, I do not love to meet you neer the King, or the Princess, or in a Battle when I am upon the point of taking Kings Prisoners. For my part, replied Artamenes, I have no such aversion from meeting you; and I should be glad to finde you in the head of an Enemies Army, Page 97 where we might dispute the Victory, and shew you how to take Kings prisoners in such a way as would be glorious. There needs not, answered Philidaspes, an Army of fifty thousand men to give you that satisfaction which you desire, and if you desire it, I shall easily satisfie your longing. It shall stick only upon you, replied Artamenes; and least the pretensions which you have at the Court should hinder you from giving me this satisfaction, or oblige you to repent of what you have said, Let us to morrow morning before Sun rise, see whether the Princess have reason to desire that Philidaspes should love Artamenes, and Artamenes love Philidaspes. I like it well, answered he, and take heed least the Hounours which you have from the King, and the respects you bear unto the Princess do make you alter your resolutions: Therefore, replied Artamenes, Let us meet behind the Temple of Mars, where I will stay for you with a Sword by day-break: Mean while I think it good to follow the King, least any suspicion should be of our design. After this they appeared before the King, and carried the matter so well, as none did dream of any thing which passed between them: I my self, who as I said before, had observed some disorders in their faces, was deceived like the rest: And I had been so often accustomed to see alterations in his countenance without any misfortunes to follow, that I by this could not foresee that which followed. At night, when Artamenes was retired, he shut himself in his closet with Feraulas, unto whom he imparted his design, because he had need of his help to get him out unseen. Feraulas, as he told me, did dissuade him, laying before him the inequality which was betwixt Philidaspes and him, whose condition was so much inferiour, as that there was no justice they should measure Swords together. But my Master answered him, that Artamenes did appear to be no more then Philidaspes; and that in Combats valour was to be more valued then quality: At last he told him, that he should fight better against a valiant Souldier, then a great cowardly King. Nevertheless Sir, although the business which Artamenes had in hand, might well have taken up all his thoughts, yet it did not hinder him from telling unto Feraulas all the discourse which passed betwixt the Princess, Philidaspes and himself: And his Passion did so much reflect upon his soul, as that he stood firm in the midst of greatest dangers. What should be Mandanaes design, said he to Feraulas, in so earnestly desiring that Philidaspes and I should love one another? Was it only a bare effect of her wisdom and goodness? or was it some secret good will that she bore unto Artamenes or Philidaspes? Has she seen into my heart, and there found all those jealousies which cause my aversion to love him? But alas, if she had done so, she would have seen that I adored her, and would not have been ignorant of those Passions which I endure for her, and would have been farre off from commanding me to love him: I conceive she would rather have commanded me not to come near him: Oh ye Gods, said he, How should I know whether it be only Ambition in him, or whether he be in Love? Whatsoever he be, I hope the Princess is ignorant of his Passion as well as of mine; that which she said unto us in the beginning of her discourse, tels me as much. I believe you too Generous, said she, to suspect any such weakness in you. Ha Mandana, illustrious Mandana, said he, this weakness is glorious, and it must be a great soul only which is capable of it: But is it possible, said he further, that my eyes, and all my actions have not yet given you the least suspicion of my Love? Do you not conceive that all my Martial adventures, and acts which I have done, were done for you? Has any seen me ask any recompence for what I have done? or had I any interest of my own in it? And cannot Mandana, the most divine Mandana imagine that some Passion more noble then Ambition, did move Artamenes to his Adventures? Nevertheless Feraulas, said he, this amiable and Princess, who is so far from halving the least knowledge of it, did add this unto her discourse, And it may be there is not one of my women that has not secretly chid her beauty, because it has not captivated you, since you came to this Court, where every one observed that your inclination was not that way. Ah, too unjust Princess, said he, Why did you not observe it? and why did you not rather say in your self, Since Artamenes does not love any in the Court, doubtless he lives me: But alas, said he, Mandana tels me by this discourse, that she would not have me to be her Conquest; and that she thinks she has done me honour enough in selling me, that the beauty of her women might have captivated me. Sir, said Feraulas unto him, this is only Artamenes who hath received this slight injury. It is true, replied he, but dare Artamenes be Cyrus? Can he cease to be Artamenes and not be hated? Ah cruel word (cried he again) what abundance of sorrow, and despair dost thou afford me? I wish Mandana knew I loved her, but I would not be the teller of it: and by what means can she ever know it, if she busie her self in seeking about the Court for one to captivate me, and if she never apprehend; that none Page 98 can look upon her, but needs must love her? and that though Artamenes be only Artamenes, having a heart so great as he has, he cannot abase himself to love elsewhere. That which gives me a little comfort is, she treats my pretended Rival no better then she does me; and that through all her discourse, her words were more favourable towards Artamenes then him. If I had been well assured he had been my Rival, my sorrows would have been my death, and my symptoms of jealousy would have discovered my Love unto my Princess; in short Sir, Artamenes talked with Feraulas as if he had nothing to do in the morning; but seeing he never thought of bed, he put him in minde of it, and my Master followed his advice, rising in the morning by break of day. I had forgot to tell you, that Philidaspes and my Master had agreed to fight on Horseback, without any other Arms but one Buckler, and one Sword, least their design should be discovered, and that either of them should have one Esquire with them, to be spectators of the Combat. Feraulas went out with Artamenes: as soon as they were ready they went out at a back door, and stole away quietly, not being seen by any: They came upon the place appointed half an hour before Philidaspes: Here Sir, Artamenes did begin very much to fear the Princess displeasure, who when she should hear of a quarrel so soon after her desires to love one another, had just cause of offence; yet this strong aversion which he had towards Philidaspes, was more prevalent then his fears, and concluded it better to expose himself once unto the displeasure of his Princess, then not to be revenged of a Rival: He looked for Philidaspes with much impatience: But he presently appeared, and perceiving my Master staid for him, I desire your pardon Artamenes, said he, for coming no sooner, but I will endeavour to make satisfaction for my sluggishness, by that diligence which I bring with me to vanquish you if I can. I hope, replied Artamenes, that mine will prevent you, and we shall presently know whether we should love or hate one another. After this, both drew their Swords, and after they had either of them made a pass with their Horses, as it were to put them into winde; they then staid a while opposite one to another to take their measures, and seat themselves in their saddles; after which they fell too't, and struck so furiously as both of them had like to have fallen: Philidaspes his Sword did glide upon the Buckler of Artamenes; and the Sword of Artamenes did grase a little upon the right side of Philidaspes: Their Horses which were ready guided, did not startle at a charge so violent, and these two terrible Rivals turning short both together, did endeavour to croupper each other if they could, but they were both so quick, and fought with so much judgement, as it was not possible for either to do it: Then giving the rein to their Horses, and making a second Pass, the Sword of Artamenes the second time light upon the head of Philidaspes, and gliding down to his shoulder, gave him two wounds at one blow; the Sword of Philidaspes also was staid with the blood of Artamenes, and run him into the thigh through and through: My Master perceiving himself wounded, became more furious; and Philidaspes seeing his blood run in divers places, did double his choller. Behold here Sir, these two fierce enemies as much animated, as if both of them had known each others qualities and loves: All that skill, strength and valour could do, was done at this time: Artamenes pressed upon his enemy; his enemy upon Artamenes again: Sometimes they would shift and husband their strength warily, then upon a sudden they would vanquish or die; and both did dispute the victory so stoutly, that they began to esteem, though not Love one another much more then before: But without troubling you with relation of every particular passage of this fierce Combate, I will only tell you, that my Master wounded Philidaspes in six places, and received but three wounds himself: Being in this condition, Artamenes began to be desperate to see himself so long resisted: and casting his Buckler behinde him, putting on his Horse with spur and voice, and lifting up his Sword as high as his arm could reach, he let it drive at the head of Philidaspes so terribly that it bore him down half in a sound, between the feet of their Horses, catching his Sword into his hand as he fell. My Master lighted immediatly from his Horse, and holding both Swords in his hands, did run unto him, and cried, Philidaspes, if thou canst rise I will permit thee, and render thee thy Sword; but if thou canst not, then acknowledge that Artamenes is worthy to be thy friend. Philidaspes as these words recovering out of his sound, did offer to rise, but he could not possible: so that looking upon my Master with his eyes like fire, Thou hast overcome me, answered he, kneeling, but thou shalt not overcome me alwaies, if thou beest so humane as to let me live: In this condition they were, when Aribees accidentally returned from hunting, and followed by many people, who seeing my Master with a Sword in his hand, came up to them, not well knowing whom it should be: As soon as he was come neer, and saw my Master, he was Page 99 astonished, especially when he saw Philidaspes whom he had overcome. What Artamenes, said he to him, you fight then with the Kings friends as well as his enemies: I will fight, answered he, with the Kings enemies wheresoever I meet them, and I will also fight with the enemies of Artamenes in what place soever I meet them. My Master then turning towards Philidaspes; who was at deaths door for very spite and grief to be seen in this posture, wherein he could not stir; Philidaspes (said he to him, throwing him his Sword) thou hast used it too well to be deprived of it; and if thou beest as full of Reason as Valour, thou wilt never put me to that condition as to do thee the like favour again. Artamenes not staying for his answer, would have got up upon his Horse, but he stood in need of Feraulas his help, for his loss of blood had extremely weakned him, yet being a very little held up, he kept him self very firm in his saddle. But it was not so well with Philidaspes, for he was very much wounded, and carried by five or six men unto the next house, there to have his wounds dressed. Aribees leaving some of his men with him, and having given order for some of the Kings Surgions to have a care of him, he went to acquaint Cixares with the accident: as for Artamenes, he would not go publicly into the Town, but went unto the Sacrificer, with whom he had discourse the first time he came unto the Temple of Mars, having since that time confirmed a great league of friendship between them. As soon as he was there, and had taken order concerning his wounds, he sent Feraulas unto the King and the Princess to desire their pardon, and to beseech them not to condemn him before they understood the matter.

As Chrisantes was about to go on with his Relation, the King of Phrygia came in, who coming from Cixares, interrupted this Relation, and told all this illustrious company that the Prince did continue still inflexible, and that he was every day more and more incensed against Artamenes: Alas (said the King of Hircania, and all the rest of the Princes who had heard Chrisantes tell the story) if you did but know who this Artamenes is, whom you speak of, you would much more lament him then you do: It would be very hard for me (replied the King of Phrygia) to be more sorry for him then I am, for I have so great esteem of him already, that I cannot interest my self in the preservation of so brave a man, more then I have: But you will change your thoughts (answered the King of Hircania) when you shall rightly know who Artamenes is: And you will confess (added Persodes) that never was Prince more illustrious then he: A Prince (replied the King of Phrygia hastily) yes Sir (replied Hidaspes) and one of the most considerable Princes of the world. After these words, the King of Phrygia was very urgent with them to inform him further: Then all of them would needs tell him something of it: One would tell him of his birth; another would extoll his valour; a third would relate some particulars of his love; and all of them, according as passages did most move them, would needs set out the illustious life of Artamenes. Chrisantes seeing this forwardness amongst so many famous persons, although thus confusion was very glorious unto his dear Master, since it was but an effect of their passions towards him, did intreat them to defer the business until another time; he himself undertaking to relate the beginning of this History unto the King of Phrygia particularly, to the end that afterwards they might altogether meet, and hear the marvellous sequel of it, from the relation of Feraulas, who was better known in it then himself; he being younger and more employed in all the Passages of my Masters love. All the Princes did consent unto the reasonable motion which Chrisantes had propounded: yet notwithstanding they could not part so soon, but continued a good while together extolling the unfortunate Artamenes, and magnifying equally his virtues; his misfortunes, and his Glory.

ARTAMENES: OR CYRVS the Great. BOOK III.

Whilst these two famous Friends of Artamenes discoursed of his great misfortunes and high qualities: he in the mean time rendred himself worthy of more praise then they did give him, enduring his Prison with most admirable patience. The uncertainty of the Princess life was the only disturbance of his soul; but his Captivity was too incon|fiderable to move it at all. To speak the truth, never man was more in Love then he; this did so extreemly torment him, as there was no need of any other passion to be added. When he cal'd in his memo|ry the wonderfull events of his Life; and remembred how many dangers he had escaped; what love he had purchased from Ciaxares; what services he had done for Mandana, and what Passions he endured for her: what obstacles he had met with in his designs; how quiet a life he might have led, if he continued in Persia; what Travels he has undergone; how gloriously Fortune had shined upon him; what illustrious Rivals he had met withall; what famous Victories he had obtained, and into what a sad misfortune he was now reduced; All these, I say, coming confusedly into his minde, he had much a do to give credit unto himself; nor when he was alone solitarily in his chamber, he knew not well whether he was Cyrus or Artamenes, or either of them; but he was sure that he was the most unhappy Prince upon earth, who without some extraordinary assistance from the Gods could never hope for any satisfaction in his Life. The absence of the party belo|v'd (said he to himself) is, in the esteem of all the world, the worst misfortune. But alas, I am not separated for a time only, but I fear, for ever: When I was in the Army, I knew she was at Ancyra or Sinope: I knew she was well; I was certain she was in pleasant company, and a delightfull place, so that then my absence from her did not vex me; I had none but my own sorrows to endure, and my only sorrow was, to be absent from her: The Gods do know my grief, and how the deprivation of her sight was intollerable to me: But alas, alas, I am now in a most lamentable condition; for I know that my Princess is either dead, or Page 102 else in the barbarous hands of some who detains her against her will; I am most certain she is either in her grave or in a prison: And in what place soever she is, I know she suffers, and doubtlesse pities my misfortunes; yet (said he) if I could with honour shake off my fetters, I would finde out either her Tomb or her Pri|son; for the Sea, according to its custome, would render me this fair Corps either alive or dead: I would either die with her in the one, or deliver her out of the other; And it would be a greater consolation to me in my misfortunes to do so, then to languish out my life in pri|son, where I endure an unjust accusation, not daring to justifie my self; not because I should appear unto Ciaxares more criminall as a Lover of Mandana, then as a friend unto the King of Assiria; not because it is a crime whereby Artamenes is dishonoured, but rather it is in|finite honour unto him, and because the honour of my Princess is infinitely above my own: that severe vertue whereof she makes profession, alwaies forbidding me to give the least suspi|cion of my love unto any whatsoever; and therefore I will die a thousand deaths rather then let the least shadow of it appear; Not that (O my most illustrious Princess) you have any reason to make me hide my Love as if it were vitious; or conceal any of your favours to me, as if they were not correspondent with your virtue: for indeed what have you ever done for Artamenes which you had not good reason for? or which might contradict your purest innocence? you have oftentimes rigidly denied your self and me, and hid some part of your good will towards me, you never gave me any more testimonies of it then such as by some weak conjectures I could draw, that you did not hate me; you have oftentimes del|prived me even of your very looks; you have warily reserved your very words; and all that I can say of you is, that you had the power to destroy me, but did not: But O ye gods, Can you have such a thought as to ruine a man who loves you? A Prince who hath con|cealed all his desires from you, who stifled them in their birth, and never durst desire any thing which might offend the purest vertue? A Prince I say who adores you as men adore the gods, and who hath devoted unto you every minute of his life; yet for all this, it is your pleasure I should keep close my passion, and that to me is an absolute command: There|fore I am resolved never to discover my Princess: I will look for death without complainr, and never reveal the true cause of all my sorrows; Thus did the Amorous Artamenes pass his time: He had this benefit in his prison, that his Keepers did both lament and respect him; so that if he had been disposed to make an escape, he might easily have done it: Andra|mias who commanded the Guard was a neer kinsman unto Aglatidas, who bore so great a Love unto Artamenes, that he neglected nothing which was in his power to deliver him: Besides this alliance which was between Andramias and Aglatidas, there was some other Obligations which tied Aglatidas unto him; so that he permitted Aglatidas to vi|sit Artamenes when he pleased. It happened one night when all were retired to their Lodgings, that Aglatidas went unto his Chamber, and offered him all his assistance; He spoke unto him of some waies which conduced unto his flight if he pleased: Artamenes, did thank him very civilly, but told him that he would never come out of prison, unless by the same power which put him in; he said that guilty men might do well to slip out of their chains, but innocent men ought to stay till they were untied, and therefore he desired him to rest satisfied concerning that matter, and not to hazard the Kings displeasure for the love of him: He told him that it would be a very great comfort unto him to see him sometimes, especially since his melancholike disposition did best sute with his present fortune; but that it was not just to permit him for his sake to run into danger; Aglatidas then answered Ar|tamenes, that he found no such joy in his life as to fear the exposing it, but in this he did not run any hazard at all, because first the King had not strictly forbid the seeing of him; Se|condly, Andramias being his Friend, his Cosen, and one that was obliged unto him, it was no extraordinary courtesie to let him visit his friend: Also his Chamber being within the Chamber of Andramias, so by consequence far enough off from the Guard, he might conveniently visit him often without being perceived and might afford him that poor comfort to have one with him, who might condole his misfortunes. Artamenes denied him, but Ag|latidas was so urgent, that in the end he permitted him to come every night in into his cham|ber. There was none more fit to comfort an unfortunate man then Aglatidas, who was alwaies sad even then when any joy appeared in the faces of them who were in his Compa|ny: This Noble melancholy man came one night unto Artamenes, and after they had a long time discoursed of the mutability in Fortune, and miseries of life, they both of them were a long while silent. Aglatidas who knew nothing of his love, and who desired to cheer him up a little, spoke thus unto him: Sir (said he) I see you are unfortunate, yet for Page 103 all that you are not so unfortunate but one may possibly be much more: That Grandure which you have lost, may easily be found again: It is a common thing for a Prince to pass from a Throne to a Prison, and from a Prison to a Throne again: There are many misfo|rtunes which seem less glorious are yet more sensible; and the more close they are kept, the more are they insupportable: You have this sad comfort at the least (said he) that all the world laments you: and such great fals as yours do move compassion in all honest men. On the contrary there are misfortunes of such a dire nature, as they are not pitied by any; and are so far from inviting compassions as they who endure them are accused of weakness, of folly and simplicity: So that to prevent the growth or encrease of our misfortunes and sorrows, we must stifle our sighs, and hide our Tears, or at least never to publish the cause of our afflictions. Artamenes hearing Aglatidas talk thus, did imagine that the sad melan|choly which continually sat upon his soul, and appeared in his face, was doubtless caused by love, though he never did discover it before this time. As curiosity to enquire after the misfortunes of such as have resemblance of our own, is a quality incident to all unfortunate men; So Artamenes sighing and looking upon Aglatidas, Is it not possible (said he to him) that your melancholy which I have ever thought to proceed from your naturall temper, may have some other secret cause which yet I never asked you? Yes Sir, Replied Aglatidas, there is one, but it is of such a nature as I ought to conceal it from such as you whose souls perhaps are sensible only of ambition and glory, who having never found the force of Love, would call all those things which the passion produceth, folly and weakness, as I said before, Never fear (answered Artamenes, sighing the second time) that my vertue is so severe as you beleeve; for though my unhappy life be not yet far spent, yet in so many travels as I have gone through, perhaps I have not been altogether insensible of that passion: There|fore my Dear Aglatidas, (said he to him) if you have any desire to comfort me in my mis|fortunes, let me not be ignorant of yours, and I do conjure you not to think but my soul shall be very sensible of them, and though I am overwhelmed with my own sorrows, yet I shall make shift to condole yours also. Aglatidas did a while deny him, but at last being overcome by his importunity, and by the perswasions of Andramias, who had been a wit|ness of his misfortunes, he began thus, after that the Captain of the Guards had given all re|quisite Orders to prevent either discovery or interruption.

The History of Aglatidas and Amestris.

I Have often heard say that Love above all other passions does most fortifie or most en|feeble men, according unto the occasions which present themselves: and that it never doth so absolutely subdue a soul, but it leaves some Reliques of its ancient dominion: but yet it is not so in my heart; this general rule, hath its exception in me; for since Love com|manded in chief, it hath quite rooted out all ambition, it hath absolutely extinguisht all de|sires of glory, and left no other resentments but jealousy and sorrow. I will not stay you Sir, in telling that I am descended from the illustrious Race of famous Aglatidas, (whose Name I own) who did such gallant acts under the Reign of Phraortes, in his Persian, Medean, and Assirian Wars; for perhaps you do already know them: I will only tell you, how since that time all they of my Family have alwaies held the first Rank (next after the Princes of bloud) about the King: I was born then Sir in a high condition; and I dare say of my self that my inclinations have not degenerated from the worthiness of my birth. I had a father, whose indulgent cares did doubtless give me good education; and if Love had not given a stop unto what he expected from me, perhaps I should at this day have been much above what I am. I no sooner attained unto my seventeenth year, but having a desire to get some esteem in the world, and seeing all was peace in Medea, I went unto the King of Saces, Falther of Prince Mazares, who has suffered shipwrack, where I dare say of my self that in a little time I got some honour: But after his wars were ended, and peace was established throughout all Asia, I was compelled after two years spent among the Saceans, and in my Travels, to return unto Ecbatan, which as you know is one of the goodliest, most magnifi|cent, and most delightfull places in the world. I arrived there some few daies after. Astiages received news of the death of young Cyrus, son to the King of Persia, and the Princess his daughter. Then I know you have been Sir so long in Cappadocia as you cannot be ignorant of all the passages in Medea: of the menaces of the gods, of the fears and frights of Astia|ges, and of the joy which he conceived for that security which all Asia hoped for by the Page 104 death of that Prince, who, as men say, did promise mighty matters unto the world: I came then to the Court in a time of great jollity and feasting, and there I staid a while with all delight imaginable: The King never hunted but I was with him; There was never any meet|ing of Ladies but I was sure to be there; I wore rich clothes, and recreated my self in the pleasant walks: And as you know there is not a more delightful place upon Earth then the Kings Palace, and Gardens at Ecbatan, so there was not one day which did not afford me fresh delights: The King was pleased to take more notice of me then I deserved. I got the love of all the young Gallants in the Court, and if I durst say it, there was none of the La|dies which did hate me; for as my design was general to please all, so it had been a hard matter to have displeased any one in particular. Thus did I enjoy my youth and liberty with abundance of satisfaction: Whenas Artambaces who as perhaps you know had heretofore been in love with the Queen of Persia, before she was married unto Cambises Father of Cy|rus (of whom I speak, and who going from the Court upon that occasion, was afterwards married in the Province of Arisantine unto the daughter of a great Prince in that Countrey, and who went away from Ecbatan, and carried with him his only daughter about fifteen years of age, whom he loved extreemly, and who doubtless did deserve as much.) It chanced so at that time, being gladdened with variety of pleasures, and weary of the tumultuous court, I took Horse (being waited upon by only one servant) to go and enjoy my solitude, at a fair House which my Father had some thirty miles from Ecbatan: I departed very melan|choly and lumpish, not knowing any cause for it at all, my design being only to recreate my self in viewing the Pictures, Statues, Gardens, Grotts, and Fountains about my Fathers House, that thereby I might make my conversation more pleasant at my return to the Town. But alas Sir, little did I think what would hap unto me in this Voyage; I have often won|dred since at the pains which I took to captivate my self, and how I found out a way which lead me into such a Labyrinth of trouble as hath disquieted all my life, When I came into a great high way a hundred paces of the Castle, I saw a chariot overturn'd which was quite broken in peeces; the magnificence of it did tell me that it belonged unto some person of quality; but since there was no Grooms about this Chariot of whom I could enquire, I went on: being come unto the first Gate of the Castle, the Porter who opened the Gate told me that Artambaces whose Name and Quality I knew very well, coming from the Countrey to Ecbatan, had the misfortune to break one of his Chariots, and seeing he could travell no further that day, desired to stay there that night whilst his Chariot was repaired: The Porter told no more then that Artambaces was there, but mentioned not a word of Her|manista his wife, or Amestris his daughter; So after I had given order for the best entertain|ment possible, I went straight into the Garden, where I was told he was: But Sir, I was much amazed, when crossing a Quarter in the Garden, I saw in a green Arbour the fairest Lady that ever eye did look upon, and whom I did not know at all; for Amestris had never been at Court: This beauty was no less surpris'd to see me, then I to meet her in that place: For she thinking there had been none in the house but Servants, she little expected there one of my Garb: It was very hot, and she had none with her but one of her women; she had pulled off her Cypress, wherein she used to cover her fair neck; and being bare armed, she lay negligently upon a bed of green grass, her head lying upon the knees of that woman, which was with her: I no sooner saw her but I stopt, and as soon as ever she perceived me, she started up and put on her Cypress: we both did blush at the passage; but certainly it was out of different apprehensions, modesty causing that in her which Love did in me: For Sir, the first minute of this fatal view was the first minute of my Passion; yet, notwithstanding all my unparallel'd astonishment and wonder, I saluted the adored Amestris with much devotion; and beginning discourse, Madam (said I, to let her know who I was) I did not think to finde such fair and pleasing company in my Fathers House; and if I had known that such an one as you had been in the Arbour, the reverence I owe unto such as you seem to be (though I think there is not such another in the world) would have taught me better manners then to disturb your rest. Sir (answered she) it belongs to me to desire pardon for interrupting the pleasure of your solitude, which it seems you came to take in this pleasant place: But Sir, (said she in beginning to walk on) It is my Fathers part to make excuses for the freedom which he took upon him to lodge with you to night, since an unexpected peece of luck did force him to it: Seeing then that her design was to conduct me to her Father, I presented her my hand, and easily observed by this first address, that she had a desire to make me know who she was: for there appeared in all her actions so much gallantry, spirit and modesty, as I saw she was Mistress of as much Soul as Beauty. Madam (said I, conducting Page 105 her, and answering unto what she said) it is a great happiness to be interrupted by such an one as you; and I think there is no reasonable man, who would not for such a blessedness not only quit his solitude but the Court also with all its magnificence and pleasures: I alwaies lookt for Flattery (said she smiling) out of Ecbatan, and perhaps I shall well enough defend my self against it here; but I do confess unto you that I do fear it a little here where I did not think to be assaulted. When you came into the Arbor where I was, I was commendling unto my woman whom you saw with me, the innocency of these woods, and the honest simplicity of our COUNTRY, but for ought I see the dominion of Flattery extends it self furthier then I imagined, since there is no safety for humility and modesty within thirty miles of Ecbatan; If you should Madam (replied I) forbid all those praises which without doubt the Court will pay you, then certainly you must forbid your own knowledge, and be ignorant that you are the fairest beauty in the world. By this time we were approached so near Artambaces and Hermanista his wife, as in lieu of her answer, she told him who I was, and obliged me as was fit, to present my Complement unto them: they made many excuses for the freedom which they had taken; I professed that my Father was much obliged unto them for it; and that for my own particular I took it for an infinite honour: they answered me with the like civility; and their conversation stood too much upon Ceremony: so dangerous it is to stay long in the COUNTRY from the Court: After this they began to commend the handsomeness of the Gardens and Fountains. And Amestris did like the beauty of the place so well, that she could not beleve Ecbatan had any place could please her better: although she heard many wonderful reports of it. Artambaces enquired concerning Court-news, and was satisfied in a hundred things whereof he was ignorant before, because they happened since his departure: I had the happiness to finde a great disposition in Artambaces and Hermanista to affect me: As for Amestris I was well satisfied to finde some hopes that she wou'd not hate me: And since she was of an excellent judgement, knowing there was much difference between the Court and the COUNTRY-Tone, she would speak but little, and with much moderation, being resolved to reserve her self until such time as Ecbatan had a little glossed her, before she would suffer her charming soul to shine. And it was a secret which many who come out of the COUNTRY unto the Court, may make good use of, if they desire to get esteem there; for their manners, customs, and fashions are so contrary, that let these new comers do what they can, they will run into many absurdities, if they talk much, and the more they expose themselves the more they become ridiculous. Amestris therefore kept her first conversation very reserved: but yet it was impossible to hide those rare qualities wherewith she was adorned. During one day and a half that Artambaces staid at my Fathers house, I gazed so long upon the splendour of Amestris Beauty, as I was dazed: I wondred at the cleanness of her accent; the sweetness of her expression; with what a natural eloquence she spoke: I admired also at the solidity of her judgement, the gallantry of her spirit; the quickness of her wit; the complacency of her humour, and the charms of her discretion in reserving her self. During the time that these welcome guests were there, I studied all the diversions I could devise to entertain them: I carried them to hunt in a Park which was behinde the Garden; I led them into all the shady Walks in the heat of the day; where, what with the Singing of the Birds, the noise of the Fountains, the curiosity of the flowry Borders, the Statues and Pictures in the Galleries, and my converse, I gave some satisfaction to these illustrious persons, who assured me they thought themselves welcome. After then Sir I had treated them with all the magnificence I could possible, they resolved to depart; but it was not in my power to stay there any longer, though I came with intentions to stay seven or eight daies; I told Artambaces I would be his guide, and go to blaze the apparition of that bright Star unto the Court, (pointing at Amestris;) she blusht at the phrase, and replied without pride or affectation. The Chariot being put into order, we parted; I took Horse, and kept continually on that side where Amestris did sit: and all the way I did as I did the first minute I saw her, to wit, look upon her, and adore her with so much delight and satisfaction, as I thought it impossible there should be so many vexations in Love was talked of: My eyes, my heart, my thoughts, my soul, and all, was upon Amestris: But all this while I found my self so tranquil, and so pleasingly contented, that I beleev'd this kinde of Love which I bore unto this excellent beauty, was no other then such as men use to have unto all beautiful objects: I did finde that I had nothing else in any admiration; and as I know that I had never seen any thing so beautiful, so I wondred not at any thing else: I did infinitely joy to see her; to have the honour to be near her and hear her speak: Thus did we pass on the time and the way from my Fathers house until we came at Ecbatan. During Page 106 which intervall I acquainted Amestris with all the delights and diversions of the Court; She asked what Ladies had the Empire in matter of beauty, and who were esteemed the best wits: And a hundred such Questions as these, which Artambaces or Hermanista or Amestris do put unto me; She knew the Court before she came there: at last we arrived at Ecbatan, and went unto the ancient Palace of Artambaces which is one of the fairest there: I suppose Sir, that you do well remember, how this famous Town hath seven wals one within another, that the battlements for distinguishment are all of severall heights; And to make the object more magnificent unto the eye of those who behold them, they are painted all with severall colours; those of the sirst were white; those of the second height black; those of the third red, the fourth blue, the fifth orange, the sixth silvered, and the seventh gilt: And Sir, be pleased to know, that within the circuit of this last wall was the Palace of the King of Medes, ever since the famous Deiocus did build these proud wals; and within the circuit of that wall next it were the Palaces of those persons which were of the highest quality: The Palace of Artambaces was between the wall with golden battlement, and that with silver; and as chance would have it, my Fathers joynd unto it: As we were arrived at the gate of Artambaces Palace, there we found a great number of his ancient friends, who there expected him: so that I could not present my hand unto my adored Amestris, to conduct her unto her chamber, because that great number of men which were there, stopt in before, and presented themselves unto Hermanista and her: Until now Sir, my soul was all joy; and love, that dangerous Serpent, was lurked so close under those pleasing flowers, that I did not discover its sting: But from the first minute of my thoughts to part from Amestris, and to take my leave of her, then did love appear unto me immediatly in a most horrid shape, I saw him armed with his Bow and Arrows: I saw him with a Torch in his hand, and knew him perfectly to be the most terrible of all the Gods: No sooner did I perceive the company preparing to depart, but I blusht, and became dumb immediatly, I was all serious and sad; and looking upon Amestris, without a heart or a tongue, my minde told her many things which she could not understand: In conclusion, part we must, and part we did, but it was with so much sorrow, and so much love, that never was Passion like unto mine. My Father asked me at night, why I return'd so soon? But as I was going to answer, in comes a Gentleman from Artambaces, to thank him for all civilities which he had found at his house; and indeed it fell out happily for me, because my soul was unquiet, and all so disordered that I knew not how to frame a handsome answer unto my Fathers question. I retired then unto my chamber, and was very indifferent what became of me: Me thought the Idea of fair Amestris haunted me alwaies, and I could not forbear admiring her Beauty, her Wit and her Judgement: my imagination preferred her before all that the Court had amiable; and I could finde nothing comparable to her: I was astonished to see one brought up in the COUNTRY, and in a COUNTRY so far remote, should not be distinguished from those which were most accomplished in the Court, neither in her Garb, or her Habit, or her Language; I considered her as an absolute miracle: Then, thus esteeming of her, you may be certain that I admired her with abundance of satisfaction. But that which I did think most strange, was that in spite of my heart, I was unquiet and melancholy. What would I have? (said I unto my self) How comes it to pass that the beauty of my lov'd and ador'd Amestris should not produce the same effects in my soul, which other beautiful objects do use to do? for commonly the sight of Fair and Fine things does fill our imaginations with delight; from whence comes it then, my divine Amestris, that in thinking upon you, I should be thus turbulent and disordered? but on the contrary, have I not sufficient cause to be content? I have seen you the first of any in your coming to the Court; and had the good fortune to finde you in a house where I was able to pay some part of that service which is your due; and after such a manner it was performed, as the civility must needs invite you to prefer me before the acquaintances you shall get at Court: At the least I have this advantage, to be the first of your acquaintance who admires you, and—(at this word I stopped, not knowing whether I should say) who esteems, loves, and adores you: But determining the matter in my self, after I had a while consulted with my thoughts, No, no, my heart (said I) consider it no more; confess that thou dost esteem and love, and adore Amestris; and if there be any other phrase more fit to express so violent a passion, make use of it upon this occasion, and publish unto all the world how happy thou art to be the first Conquest of so perfect a beauty? From whence then comes all this melancholy? (said I in my self, and examining the cause) but alas Sir, I was yet a very simplician in love; and did not know that the nature of this passion was to bring a restless disposition with it. I knew not that the happiness which a lover hopes for, does afflict him; Page 107 that the favours he enjoys do make him restless; and that which he has lost makes him desparate: I was such a novice as I knew not that grief and melancholy were inseparable concomitants of love, That a Lover never gets a conquest without pain: That he can never keep his Mistress without trouble, nor cannot lose her unless he lose his reason also: But yet I rested not long in this ignorance, for I had such sad experience of its rage, as never man became more knowing then my self in all the fantastical, giddy humours of love. After I had thoroughly consulted with my apprehensions, I did conclude, that without all manner of doubt, I was in Love; and that restless disposition which reigned over me, did very apparently proceed from that fear which is alwaies born with Love, to wit, least he which loves should not be beloved by her he does Love. And when I began to think, that perhaps all my services would not finde a favourable reception; this word perhaps did seem most sad unto me; and that uncertainty was so tormentive, that I became almost mad: So that if I durst have followed that folly which possessed me, I should have accused Amestris of that which she never thought upon, and desired her to recompense a love which yet she knew not of, and of which I my self but a little before was ignorant. I shall desire your pardon Sir, if I do particularly relate unto you the roivings of my passion: For I conceive it will be pertinent unto my design, that you should know them; least you should be astonished to finde with what violencies I have been tormented in all the sequel of my life. After I had then passed over that night with much turbulency of minde, I arose in the morning, and intended to present my self with my father unto Artambaces, to accompany him when he went unto the King, supposing it to be in some kinde a rendering of service unto Amestris, in payling it unto one who was so near and dear unto her: In conclusion, Artambaces after he had saluted my Father, thanked me for my last civility, as a thing which obliged him very much; for he was not ignorant that Astiages looked favourably upon me: We went then unto the Court, and to the King, where I could not chuse but speak of Amestris unto every one I met. I published unto all them whom I knew to be in love already, that their constancy would be put unto a dangerous trial: and I warned all them which were not in love, that if they had any desire to preserve their liberty, to be sure they never looked upon Amestris. Upon the matter, I may say I spoke so, that I spoke too much, as you shall know by the sequel of my discourse. Presently after I asked my self what design I had, in desiring to gain so many hearts unto Amestris? and where some secret resentments of jealousy bad me be silent in the midst of all my discourses of her. Going the next day unto Hermanista, I understood she was not to be seen, because she found her self very ill the last night. Then I went to visit some other Ladies, not in hopes of any diversion, for there was now no thoughts of any such things in me, but only with Amestris: but my intentions were to speak of her, not fearing to procure my self any Rivals: so I went unto the rarest beauties of all the Court and Town; and though it was not very judiciously done, to commend unto any fair one, the beauty of another, and that so extraordinarily as I did: yet I did it with such aggravations, as I was sure that I procured my self the hate of all those I saw that day: And I used the matter so, as there was none but Amestris her self, who was ignorant that I was in love with her. I moved jealousie in some, envy in others, and a curiosity in the wisest: The next day Hermanista found her self to be reasonable well disposed: all the Court came to visit, and I amongst the rest the first: Amestris was very handsomely drest that day; and I thought her so wonderfully fair, as I wished a hundred times that I might be so happy as to be her slave: She entertained me with much civility, and desired me sweetly, that I would tell her the names of all those which came to visit her, least she should out of ignorance commit a fault against their quality: You may well suppose Sir, that I received this command with abundance of satisfaction, and went not that day from her. I confess unto you that I passed it over with different thoughts: both joy and sorrow mingled in my soul; so that I could say I enjoyed not pleasure without pain; nor any pain without pleasure: It is very true as I told you before, that the whole Court came to visit Hermanista; and it is more true, that the beauty of Amestris did charm them all: Not a man did enter, but was amazed; nor a woman, though the fairest in all the Court, but blushed to see her self excelled by any Country Lady: It would be a hard matter to tell you Sir, how much I joyed at the glory of Amestris, or to tell you how it troubled me to think that I was sure to have as many Rivals as men which saw her. That which moved most admiration in me, was, that in this first day of her visits, she committed not the least absurdity in all this so great and so long a conversation; and that she received the commendations which every one did give her with so much modesty, that the fairest of our Ladies, in spite of their eclipse, could not chuse but love her, and Page 108 confess she deserved the esteem of all the world: When most of the company was gone, only some five or six, whereof I was one; I began like the rest to commend her, but she told me that though perhaps she had not committed any gross absurdity in this meeting, yet she had so many obligations to me, that though it may be she did deserve some commendations, yet she was not to receive them from me; I would have answered her, and told her that she might very well pretend unto my best commendations and praises, yet she would not suffer me, but began to discourse of what she had seen before: She highly commended the beauty of all those who visited her, and enquired more particularly of them; praising sometimes the wit of one, and sometimes the handsome behaviour of another: I must confess unto you Sir, that I was very much perplexed; for I observed every one found her to be so fair, that I was afraid to satisfy her curiosity, in speaking over well of any that might be my Rival: And I found by her inquisitive curiosity of every one, that she had a desire not to be hated of them: I spoke therefore with as much moderation as I could: I commended my dearest friends, though contrary to my custom, with less zeal; lest I should perhaps help them to destroy my self. Night drawing on, I must leave her; and as soon as I went from her, I went unto the King, where we talked of nothing but the beauty of Amestris, and that so advantageously, as the King designed a visit unto Hermanista; and Artambaces told her she might expect him the next day; though his age, you know, might very well have dispensed with thy curiosity of seeing fair Ladies: But the next day the King went thither, and, as the rest did, acknowledged Amestris for a miracle: I cannot tell you how many slaves this Beauty captivated; how many Lovers threw off their old fetters, and entered into hers; and what a strange Revolution she caused amongst all the Gallantry of Ecbatan. But I can very well tell you, that there was not one in all the Court which had not seen her, and which did not love her, or at the least admire her, except one who was my friend called Artabes, brother unto Megabises, who was there; and who as you know is allied a little unto the Royall Family: This man was of a good disposition, and shewed much affection towards me; and I also returned unto him so much fidelity that I preferred him before all the rest of my friends: Arbates affected solitude, and never cared for the conversation of Ladies, so that say what you would unto him, he could not be won unto this visit: He was contented to see Artambaces, but he had never seen Hermanista, and by consequence Amestris; yet I visited this bright Star with a constant assiduity, and I had better opportunities then any other for it, because there was a very great League of friendship betwixt Artambaces and my Father: Amestris had such an absolute power over my soul, and I so much reverence of her, that I durst not discover the passions of my heart unto her, but did hide them with as much pains as others to make theirs known, such were my fears to anger her: Amongst many others I perceived that Megabises was one who was fettered in the chains of Amestris. This did very much vex me, and as I never used to conceal my soul from Arbates, so I acquainted him that his Brother Megabises was become my Rival, and asked his Counsel in the business: He gave it me, and doubtless most faithfully: He told me that if he could possibly he would cure me of my dangerous disease; but if he found that he could not, then he would endeavour to cure my Brother: But he told me in the mean time how he thought it fitting that since I was the first Lover of Amestris, since she came to Court, So I should be also the first which should discover my Passion unto her: I thanked him for his faithful advice, and was so importunate with him to see Amestris, that in the end I prevailed, upon condition I would undertake to prepare her so as the conversation might be solitary, without multitudes of company. I went then unto Amestris, whom by good fortune I found alone, so that I had an opportunity to speak unto her unheard by any: Madam (said I after other indifferent Discourse) you will perhaps think me very bold in not being contented with that honour which I have in coming to you my self, but that I must also beg leave to bring a friend of mine, who passionately desires to receive the same honour, although it was never his custom to visit Ladies: I am the more obliged (answered she) and since you think him worthy to be your friend, it would be a happiness to me to become mine: Madam (said I and changing colour) I would desire one favour from you, and if it be possible obtain it, that you would carry it so with my friend as he may only esteem and admire you without loving you: I think (said she smiling and blushing both together) that you desire a very difficult matter: but since you forbid only impossibilities I will do what I can to satisfy you; Ah Madam (said I unto her) little do you think what you have said, you would think this which I desire to be impossible, if you did but know your self as well as I do: Aglatidas (answered she with a more displeased smile) know, that I pretend Page 109 unto no more, then that you who are a friend unto Artambaces my Father, should not live with me as others do, from whom I endure their flatteries out of complacency and custom; but as for you I would not have you use it, and if you continue these kinds of speeches unto me, you will force me to carry my self so towards you, as perhaps displease you: Why Madam (said I to her) will you let all the world commend you, and will you not permit Aglatidas to say that all the world does love you? or at the least I am certain it is so, if I may judge others by my self. I confess, (said he smiling, and turning her Discourse unto a jesting) that since you speak your affection unto me after so unusual a way, and since, not in speaking of your own fancy but the fancy of the Court in general, I have no reason to blame you in particular: But (said she then, and changed her Discourse) Go, bring your Friend, and as for the rest, leave the care of it unto my small merits; without any fear of his being captivated. I wish Madam (Replied I) that he may be more happy then one of his dearest friends is: You are so unwise (replied she) that one may finde of your speeches more subject to pity you then to quarrell with you, therefore Aglatidas for this once I will be more indulgent to you; in saying so, she rose, and went unto a Balconie which opened into a Garden; she called two of her women unto her, so that I saw she desired to break off discourse. Then I went unto Artambaces and Hermanista, from whom after I had held a little discourse, I departed, and went to finde out Arbates, unto whom I imparted the permission I had obtained from Amestris: I related unto him all that I spoke unto her, and all her answers, and how I desired her to give Arbates leave to enjoy his freedom: It seems (said he unto me smiling) that you are not only jealous of Megabises and others who have seen your Amestris, but you are also jealous of Arbates who never saw her, and who never desired to see her, and who never would have seen her if you had not desired him: Arbates spoke this with such an angry smile, that I was much puzzled; certainly if I had not already asked leave of Amestris to bring him, I should have been well contented to have let it alone: But as the case now stood I should have seemed too giddy-headed unto my Friend, and Amestris would have thought it strange if I did not bring him: yet when I considered that Megabises was his Brother, and a Lover of Amestris, I thought my self safe enough; and that which so much troubled me before, did now not at all disquiet me, supposing that Arbates would never become a Rival unto his Brother and his Friend both at once: I remained silent a good while after I had propounded unto my self that Arbates should not see Amestris: but upon a sudden I said No No, I will not deprive Amestris of the acquaintance with so compleat a man as Arbates; or him of the incomparable delight in hers; but if she should chance to enchain me (said he smiling) what would become of our friendship? then if you break those chains (answered I) for the love of me, our friendship will be more strong; But what if I cannot (Replied he) will you then blame me? I know not (Replied I) but yet I know that I do not see how any one should love a Rival: Never then (answered he) put me to the hazard of losing your friendship; and since Amestris is so terrible and dangerous, leave me to my solitude, and let me enjoy my liberty; for if I should have the misfortune to lose it, I know not whether I should hate you more for being the cause of it, or you me for being your Rival: not that I finde any disposition in my self why I should fear any such thing at all; but on the contrary I perceive the spirits of the most rational men are so weakened by this Passion, as I will never be without an Antidote, against this so dangerous a poison: Fear me not Aglatidas (said he to me) and believe, that if I do lose my Liberty, it shall not be without strong opposition: When you were caught, Love took you unprovided, and put a trick upon you: You went into the Country to enjoy your solitude, and unexpectedly you finde Amestris there; you were not prepared for so sudden an assault: Your eyes were blinded with over-sudden light; Your reason was confused, and your heart was surprised: and therefore it was no wonder if she captivated a man who had no Arms wherewith to defend himself. But it is not so with me, for all the world tells me of it, you your self tell it, and that a hundred times, how Amestris is the Fairest upon earth; and from these Reports I have fancied so perfect an Idea of her, that I am absolutely perswaded she cannot surprise me; and perhaps too I have over-fancied her, and shall finde her a meaner Beauty then my expectation lookt for: Moreover, I go with resolved intentions to dispute with her for my heart, as much as possible; and since my Brother loves her, and you love her, very reason saies, that there is no danger I shall be captivated: I told him that I wished as much; yet I could not chuse but fear the contrary. Arbates not being able to forbear laughing, you are so simple (said he to me) that the very fear which I have to be like you, may well Page 110 make your minde at rest; yet notwithstanding let me tell you whilst it is time, if you please, I will not see her: since there is nothing but hazard in it; I confess unto you Sir, that I was in a hundred mindes whether or no I should take him at his word, but I could not resolve upon it; I found such folly in my procedure, that I was confounded at last, I told Arbates that I would not alter my minde, but to morrow after dinner we would go unto Amestris. Arbates as I have described him, was something solitary, but he was none of those angry Melancholiques whose conversation was clownish or incommodious; but on the contrary he was of a very pleasant disposition in any company which pleased him. The cause of his reservedness was not any melancholique composition in his natural temper, but it was because he was of a more delicate fine spirit, which without much difficulty could not endure the least fault in his friends: he looked for perfection in every thing, and could not endure defects; so that since it was a hard matter to finde many exactly perfect, therefore he found but few to love, and many to shun: As for me, he did me the favour to finde an exception for me out of the generall Rule, and forced his inclination to love me. The next day we went unto Amestris, with whom we found Megabises who was the most assiduous observant of all my Rivals, and most to be feared, being without question the handsomest and compleatest man about the Court. As soon as we entered, I presented Arbates unto Hermanista, and after to Amestris: They received us both with much civility, and treated us after such a manner as I might discern they esteemed those whom I did; for besides the common respect which was due, and which they rendered unto his condition and merit, they did things in such an obliging manner, as told me without words that the Favours which Arbates received, were partly done for the Love of Aglatidas. To speak truly those first welcomes which he received, because they could not be attributed unto his merit, in so short acquaintance, therefore they were far from moving any jealousie in me, but rather much joyed me, not but that I had some farre fetched fears lest this civility should engage Arbates more then I would have him, but because she did quickly dissipate them. The Conversation therefore was very pleasant that day, for Megabises was so surpris'd to see his brother amongst Ladies, that he could not forbear telling Amestris this was one of the greatest miracles of her beauty: Think not Madam (said he) that my Brother comes hither to finde in you all those excellencies which all the world admires: But on the contrary Madam, I dare assure you that he would be ravish'd with joy to finde if it were possible any imperfection in your beauty; or any fault in your Language: any dullness in your wit; or any harshness in your humours. Perhaps it would be advantageous unto Megabises, and many others (Replied Arbates) that the fair Amestris had some imperfections, so that she could censure theirs; but as for me (who never look for any defects but because I look for perfections) I am ravish'd with joy to finde them all in one; and to see my self undeceived in that error wherein I have been, in believing that there was nothing perfect in the world; You are a very good flatterer, for a solitary man, Replied Amestris. I am very sincere Madam (Replied he) and therefore I freely tell you what I think: After this Hermanista diverted the Discourse; News and Court-diversions was all that afternoons entertainment. For my part I spoke but little all the day: I was so taken up with looking upon Amestris, and observing Megabises, Arbates, and Otanes, that I cared not for discourse: I saw Megabises grew every day more in Love; and a hundred others also were daily captivated: Arbates for a man who affected solitude methought was much pleased with this first daies conversation: and Amestris did deal her civilities with such equality, and covered her thoughts with so much modesty, that I could not discover any partiality: Indeed I was very unquiet all the time, insomuch as Amestris perceiving it did pleasingly chide me, saying, that if she had not known how I had a better reputation than my friend, she should have taken Aglatidas for Arbates, and Arbates for Aglatidas: Yet I thought my self happy that Amestris would take any notice of my naughty humour; and Arbates was very well satisfied, so that his accustomed solitude appeared no more Melancholy than any other. Night being come, every one retires to his own Lodging: I carried Arbates unto my Fathers house, and because I had a minde to treat him civilly I carried him upon a Tarrass where we saw the River Orontes, which runs by Ecbatan: We took two turns upon that Tarrass, and spoke not a word: Ar|bates not daring perhaps to tell me what he thought of Amestris; nor I daring to ask him his opinion: But here Sir, you may admire at the fantasticalnesse of Love: I protest unto you, I equally feared that Arbates would commend Amestris too much, or that he would not commend her enough: I feared that he would not disapprove of my choice; and I feared that he himself would chuse where I had chosen before him. I being then thus perplexed, Page 111 as I have told you, and walking silently two turns about the Turrass, at last I broke the silence, and said with a little forced sight, Well Arbates, have you defended your self very well: has not the fair Amestris made a Rival of the dearest friend I have? You are so jealous (answered Arbates) that to break that ill habit, I will not satisfy your curiosity: I will only tell you thus much, that I think Amestris to be worthy of all admiration: But if you admire her (said I to him) I believe you love her also: That is not an absolute necessity (answered he) nor a necessary consequence, yet I will not talk any more of it; for I would work a cure upon your minde, and insensibly unaccustom you not to fancy monsters to fight withall: Ah my dear Arbates (said I to him) leave me not in the midst of these uncertainties; Tell me I beseech you, what are your real thoughts of Amestris? What would you have me tell you (answered he) if I commend her, you will say I am in love; and if I dis|commend her you will say that I either deceive you, or have lost my reason: It is no matter (said I to him) though you should let me know that you only esteem her, but I would know whether your heart be not taken; and whether you love her so much, as you must one day hate me for it. I know not what's to come (answered he) but for the present I know I am infinitely obliged unto you, for bringing me to the knowledge of the fairest Lady in the world. I confess Sir, that seeing Arbates spoke with such freedom of spirit, I did believe all his tart answers had been only in jest, and mocks at my imbecillity: so that being ashamed of my self, I left off troubling him, and went quietly to supper. In conclusion, I found, that though Arbates was extremely wounded with the beauty of Amestris, yet he would not be forced to love her, and by the power of his vertue, he resisted it as much as he could, and strove with all his strength not to become a Rival unto his brother and his friend, such a friend too, who had made choice of him to be his confident, and without whom he had never seen Amestris. It is to be beleaved that what he told unto one who was a friend both to him and me, was true; that he did all things possible not to love her: But Sir, all was in vain; love made a wonderfull strange alteration in him: Untill now he seemed to be the most sin|cere and faithfull friend unto me of all men that ever I did meet withall; but he became up|on a sudden the vilest cheat upon the earth: We met many daies, but not a word of Amel|stris, as if he had never seen her: He did so cure all my jealousies of him by this cunning, that I desired him to let us visit her sometimes, but he denied it very stily: and indeed he was many daies and never went unto her: But to my misfortune, I knew afterwards that he had seen her thrice in the Temple, twice walking in the Garden of the Kings Palace; and once walking upon the banks of the River Orontes, where she often used to walk: Arbates then seeming unto me to be farre from any design upon Amestris, I kept correspondency with him, I spoke to him concerning my Passion, and asked his counsell. When I told him that I had not yet followed his counsell in discovering my love unto her as soon as I could, because she did shun all such occasions; then he answered me thus; When I counselled you to speak of your passion so soon, I did not then know Amestris: But oh Gods, Aglatidas (said he) I have much altered my opinion upon sight of her, and finde, that the grave mo|desty which I observed in her countenance, doth tell me you must not discover your love too hastily and lightly unto her. Believe me (said this treacherous friend) you must not think to tell Amestris of any love, untill you rendred her a hundred services, and untill you have brought her to that passe, as she cannot deny you without ingratitude. This way (said I) is very far fetcht; Yes it is so (said he) but it is very sure, and the other very dangerous: for (said he) what if she should be displeased when you discover your passion? if she should forbid you to see her? if she should shun you, or if she should hate you; what course would you take then? Surely (replied I) I should die: But (continued I) if she be never acquain|ted with my passion; if I never must tell her, but let my Rivals be more favoured than my self, and speak of their loves, how can she come to know of mine? Would you have her recompene me for that which she is ignorant of? I would have her know it (answered he) but I would have it after such a manner as will not displease her; I would have her heart engaged a little to embrace your love when you tell it openly: But who shall engage, replied I, this illustrious heart of Amestris? Your endeavours, your services, your reverence, and your silence (answered he) whereas others procure her hatred by their importunities: And believe me Aglatidas, although I am not acquainted with matters of love, more then by report of others; as I have examined the passion in it self, knowing the cause, I can guess at the effects: Be assured then, that if you love, Amestris will come to the knowledge of it; Love is a fire, which shines as well as burns; and cannot be, but be discovered. Therefore Aglatidas rest contented concerning that: Let all your cares be to finde out waies of serving Page 112 her whom you adore, and make her plainly know your love without telling her. Thus Sir, this cunning Arbates, who knew well enough my disposition, caused me to resolve not to discover my passion more then I had already, unto Amestris, or any else: But though all the Court did suspect me to be in Love, yet I confessed it unto none but Arbates: And though many others did appear to be before me, yet I kept my self within the limits which my un|faithfull friend prescribed me; I promised to order my self according to his directions: and he also promised me to take off one of my most dangerous Rivals, not conceiving it; as he told me, that this design was advantageous unto Megabises. Indeed he promised very fair; but alas, all was for his own ends, as afterwards you shall know. Then Sir, the true reason why he would not go so often unto Amestris, was, not only to hide from me his love unto her, but also that the counsell which he intended to give unto Megabises his brother might not be suspected. In the morning therefore he went into his chamber where he found him alone, and after discourse of a hundred indifferent matters, he asked him how he would be|stow the day? Megabises who did not suspect the subtily of his brother, answered him ingenuously, that he would spend the day with Hermanista: You should have said Amestris answered Arbates laughing and scoffing at him) for what vertue is there in Hermanista: If Amestris had no beauty, I believe you would not visit Artambaces so often. It is true (answered Megabises) but what do I more then all the Court does? Aglatidas who is your special friend, is not he continually with Amestris as well as I? Yes (answered the false Ar|tabes) and I would to heavens he were not so; for loving his quiet as I do, I wish he would not trouble himself with a design which cannot be advantageous unto those who are so much bent upon it. I know very well (replied Megabises) that love is a restless passion, which affords no serene delights; yet for all that, if Arbates did experimentally know it, he would not be so forward to blame those who are possessed with it; and would finde, that how ri|gorous soever the pains of love do seem to be, yet it affords more delight, then all the plea|sures in the world, which are not caused by it. Yet this wherein you are engaged (answered Arbates) is so full of danger, that I would do any thing in the world which were in my powder to divert you; begin then with Aglatidas (said Megabises embracing his brother) and believe me I shall be more obliged unto you for curing his disease then mine. I'll do my best (replied Arabes) and perhaps I have already done more to him then you. Oh heavens (replied Megabises) is it possible that you can divert Aglatidas from prejudicing me con|cerning Amestris? Certainly (answered Arbates) I will do all that is in my power that Aglatidas shall not prejudice other lovers of Amestris: But deceive not your self, and know that it is not with any intention that Megabises shall get any more interest in her by it. But on the contrary, I wish with all my heart that he would prejudice others no more then I would have Aglatidas prejudice him: What then would you have me do? (replied Megabises) I would (answered Arbates) have you strive to stifle a passion which has much weakness in it in general, and will in this particular procure you much unprofitable trouble: for, said he, there are a hundred more which promote the same design; and which is more; you are to Court one whose heart is stone, and therefore difficult to be pierced. Difficulty (answered Megabises) is the life of love: Yes, replied Arbates, but impossibilities will make it die: It is true, answered Megabises, but why is it impossible that one of my quality should marry the daughter of Artambaces? I do not hold it absolutely impossible, replied Arbates, that Megabises should marry Amestris: But I do not hold it an easie matter to be beloved, for I know by Aglatidas, who is very well informed of it, that Amestris, for all her modesty, is so passionately in love with her own beauty, that she is absolutely incapable of loving any thing else: Then brother, do you imagine it such a happiness to marry a woman who loves her looking glass better then her husband? and whose soul is sensible of nothing but her own attracts. Moreover, continued he, assuming a more serious countenance, Amestris is daughter to Artambaces, a banished man eighteen years since, and who has made his peace no otherwise, but because Ciaxares (who hates him in behalf of the Queen of Persia his sister) is not now here: Do you not think, since Astiages is so very old, that Artambaces must pack out of Ecbatan the very same day that Ciaxares leaves Cappadocia, and assumes the Crown of Medea? Imagine then Megabises, what pleasure you will have in leaving this Kingdom to live in the Province of the Trisantines with a proud insensible woman, who will waste your fortunes in lieu of advancing them; and who then perhaps will not be so fair (for a hundred things besides age may decay a beauty) nor contribute anything to your satisfaction. Ah brother, said Megabises, you are deceived, Amestris will be for ever fair: Do but assist me so farre as to marry her, and never trouble your self with my good fortunes Page 113 afterwards: What though I be banished? I care not though she be insensible, it is no mat|ter, so we be banished together; for then I shall enjoy my good fortune with more freedom, and if she be incapable of loving any thing, then I shall be free from all causes of jealousy: Therefore if you love me, assist, but no more oppose my passion: You desire that of me which I cannot do (answered Arbates) we must not give poison unto frantique friends when they ask it, principally to you. Hard-hearted, insensible brother (replied Megabises) I do almost wish you my Rival to punish you for condemning my passion so severely, and to teach you experimentally that love is not a voluntary business: You would perhaps repent you of your wish; replied Arbates, if it could possibly be; but however confess unto me thus farre, that you would be more happy if you were at liberty, then you are at pre|sent: then promise me only that you will endeavour a while to break out of your prison: Never think it possible for me to do it; replied Megabises, but because I will not deny you in every thing, I will promise you to try; though to tell you truth, it is as good as if I promi|sed you nothing. Arbates perceiving that he could work no more upon the minde of his brother, left him for that time; resolving to dispense with the interest of a brother and a friend, and promote his own love before theirs. I was perswaded, as he said himself, that he was forced unto this by the extremity and violence of his passion; and that he did take up the humour without much resistance unto himself: But I am perswaded that let love be ne|ver so potent, it neither can nor ought to force us unto things which are contrary unto Ho|nour or Honesty: and that though this passion be the most noble, yet it must not excuse any base or wicked act. However Arbates was involved into a most perplexed condition: He was deeply in love with one whom he durst not visit, least changing his retired life; he should grow to palpable and become suspected by his brother and my self: He was violently in love, but durst not discover it: He had two Rivals whom he loved and whom he was engaged to love: His brother commanded him not to be his hinderance; and he had passed his promise to assist me: He assured me that he would do all in his power to reclaim Megabises; and he told Megabises that he would set Aglatidas free: What should he do then to see Amestris; to betray his brother; to deceive his friend; and to promote himself unto their prejudice: He knew they were inseparable from Amestris: what course could he then take to visit her every day without being suspected by us both? and what cunning could he use to bring about his design? Prepare your self Sir, to hear the most notable piece of Treason that ever love did prompt any man unto, and be perswaded that you must needs be amazed at what I am to tell you. Arbates then a while after came and told me that he had employed the best of his endeavours to reclaim his brother, and cure his passion; and indeed, as the thing was true, so he related it so punctually, as I made no question of the truth: I thought my self so obliged unto him for it, that I think if he had discovered his own love unto me, I should have returned so much friendship unto him; as to have died, and yielded up my interest of Amestris to him also; so sensible was I of so great a benefit and addicted unto the Laws of Generosity. Whilest Arbates had sufficiently amused me for some time by the relation of all he had said unto Megabises, and all Megabises answers unto him; He personated himself of another hu|mour with his Brother, and feigning himself by little and little to be very compassionate unto his Brother, heated his part so well, that Megabises made him his dearest confident; He was his only Oracle, and was guided only by his Orders as well as I. As Arbates feared nothing more, then that Megabises and I should finde him alone with Amestris, and moreover, finding that according to his plot there was a necessity of our being often with her, so I was sure to give notice unto Megabises of the time when I ought to be with her, and also to give me no|tice in my course when my brother should be there; Insomuch as since he transacted in our business we never saw Amestris one without the other: Love and jealousy moved him to fear one Rival single with Amestris more then many together. Yet he had this piece of prudence to desire me both for my interest and his own, not to quarrell with my brother, and to assure me alwaies upon his word, that he would transact with all his power to ruine the designs of Megabises, which also as he told me did not please him: He also advised my Brother not to quarrell with me, lest when we were gone far off to fight, others might in the interim step in and supplant him: And thus we lived: Megabises he complained that I was a perpetual obstacle unto him; and I complain'd that Megabises was the same to me; As for Amestris she lived in such wisdom and reservedness that her virtue could not discover any of his Projects. It is certain that notwithstanding her impartial behaviour and civility which she used unto all that came unto her; yet every one observed that Megabises and I had a greater share in her esteem than any else: and that Otanes who doubtless you have seen in Page 114 the Court of Medea, was the man most hated and scorn'd: for my part I could not discover any more extraordinary favour from her then unto many others: but thought that Megabises was the happier of the two; insomuch as I could not forbear to complain continually of Artabes: Megabises for his part he thought that I was better treated then himself, and complained also of his Brother, who indeed intended to betray us both alike: One night then, when we were alone in my Chamber, My dear Artabes (said I to him) how long will you hold me in hopes? and how long must the Passion of Megabises persecute me? Why has the enticing eyes of Amestris made a Lover of my Friends Brother, and such a Lover upon whom they look more favourably, if my jealousy do not much deceive me? Ah my dear Artabes (said I) if Megabises had not such relation unto you, my sword should long since have done me right, and revenged that injustice which is done unto my Love, which I am sure preceded his, and which perhaps would have been more faithful and sincere unto me. Artabes seemed much touched at my complaints and sorrows: Sometimes he would desire pardon for his Brothers injuries; sometimes thank me for the respect which I had unto his friendship; and sometimes he entreated me to continue it: After he had asked as much as he desired, looking suddenly upon me with a troubled countenance: You shall see Aglatidas (said he) If Artabes did not love you, and love you as much as one can love another, he would not make that Proposition unto you which he is about, and act such a piece of Treason as he has premeditated: Know then (said he) I know but one way which will infallibly break the designs of Megabises upon Amestris: Ha my dear Artabes (said I) let us quickly take that happy way, if it will rid me of my Rival who is so much to be doubted; You know (said he to me) that Megabises loves me with abundance of tenderness, so that he will perhaps do that for my preservation which he would not do for my prayers and reasons: I must then (said he) for a certain time seem more troubled and melancholique then I use to be; and when he asks me the reason of it, and presseth me importunately more then once, I will tell him that I am in love with Amestris; and that all my trouble and melancholy was nothing else but my endeavours to overcome my own passions which I could not do; In conclusion, I will entreat him, and press him to take some care of my life, and with tears, and sighs, and sorrows dispute with him for the Victory: I know very certainly (said he) that he loves me most dearly, and that it will go hard with him to resist me: I blush (said this vile perfidious Artabes) my dear Friend, to propound so horrid a Treason, but what will not one do for a Friend he loves? But My dear Artabes, (said I, embracing him, and fearing he should be offended at what I was intended to tell him) since the Friendship you have with me moves you so strongly to deceive Megabises; what would you not do both to him and me if you should chance become in love with Amestris? And may I not fear that counterfeiting to be so in Love, you should become really so? Is it so (Replied the crafty Artabes, seeming very angry) do you thus take the proofs of my affection? Take heed Aglatidas, lest if I keep within the simple limits of reason, I do not assist Megabises against you, and prefer the consideration of blood before that of Friendship: Artabes pronounced these words with so serious a look, that I thought I had angered him; so that checking my self I began to trust in his Promises, and spoke him so fair that his counterfeit choler was appeased, and his answers were so well that my fears did vanish: I confess Sir, that at the first this Proposition did astonish me, but considering the benefit which I might perhaps receive by it, and resolving that I would never lose Amestris without losing my life; I thought it better to have recourse unto gentleness then force, and consented unto his Plot, having no suspicion or jealousy; or any imagination of his real being in love with her: fearing only lest he should hereafter be entangled: Mean time this was sufficient for him to have the freedom of seeing Amestris without incurring any displeasure from me; but yet he wanted the same advantage over his Brothers minde, therefore the next morning he went unto him and deceived him as well as me, and almost after the same manner, though the reasons which he used were not the same: he found Megabises in the Kings Garden, where he was informed he might finde him: as soon as he met him; What makes you here Brother (said he unto him) whilst perhaps Aglatidas is with Amestris: at least I am certain he went this morning to Artabaces: You would do much better (answered Megabises roughly) to be no more his friend, but rather leave him unto my fury and jealousy, then to tell me of his tenders to Amestris: Never think that I am able to endure this complacent way; my Patience will not alwaies suffer Aglatidas to be the Friend of Artabes, and to be favoured by her I love; Aglatidas I say who of all my Rivals is the only man I fear, and he alone can come in competition with me. Artabes was surpris'd and astonished at this, and looking upon Page 115 Megabises, Why Brother (said he) would you have me break with Aglatidas, because he is your Rival? He who is so generous as not to break with me although you be his Rival and I your brother; who has asked me pardon a hundred and a hundred times, for that it was his ill fortune to be so engaged in the Love of Amestris; who moreover loved her before you knew her; and who has lately given me some hopes to conquer his passion for the love of you and me? yet for ought I see (said the crafty Artabes seeming very angry, and offering to go away) you take all the good offices which I have done you in so bad a sense, as I will trouble my self no more about them. Ah my dear Brother (said Megabises, staying him) I pray you pardon an unfortunate man who hath lost the use of his reason, and leave him not thus in despair: I saw (continued he) that you loved my Rival so much that I took you for him, and against my will my anger surprised me, and forced me to say something, which perhaps has angered you: But pardon me I most heartily beseech you: and since it is so that you love me and love Aglatidas both, cause him, I conjure you, to leave loving Amestris, for I am not able to endure it, he must either leave loving or else I must leave living: You are very violent (Replied Artabes) and what likelihood is there to help a man who is so incapable of reason? one who would have to renounce all manner of generosity, to satisfy an unruly passion? Love (replied Megabises) excuses all sorts of injuries: Remember what you say (Replied Arabes) and to prevent such an inconvenience as that my Brother and Friend should quarrell, I will become a Traitor unto Aglatidas in behalf of Megabises. At these words Artabes stopt, the better to examine himself concerning the Proposition which he was to make (for Megabises related it all afterwards) and after he had a while ruminated upon the matter, he began to speak in a more serious Tone, Hitherto Brother (said he) I have transacted with Aglatidas only by perswasive reasons, to give over his Passion, he I say who respects you much, and who doubtless bears as great a Love to you as me: But now since I perceive your Love is grown unto such an extremity, and since I fear my affection to Aglatidas should hazard his life, I will follow your own Maximes without consideration of what is just or what unjust. I will therefore counterfet a false friendship unto Aglatidas, and ask his pardon for a secret which I am to reveal; I will tell him that when I endeavoured to reclaim his Love, that it was merely for my own interest, and not for his nor yours; In conclusion, I will earnestly pray him and press him, that he will give leave to love and serve Amestris, as a hundred others do the like; telling that otherwise it will cost me my life, conjuring with all feigned tears and sighs not to hate me or suffer me to despair: But how will this feat advantage me (Replied Megabises?) I hope (answered Artabes) that perhaps he will yeeld Amestris unto me, or at the least when he knows that I am in love with her, he will not think it strange if I visit her, and not suspect that I am with her upon your account: Ah Brother, said Megabises, if Aglatidas knows how to love he will never yeeld unto you, but will dispute the matter as well with you as me: However (Replied Artabes) you will get this advantage by it, that you will have a faithful man about Amestris, who will defeat all the designs of your Rival, and advance your own: Your reason is good (answered the too credulous Megabises) but Brother (said he) I saw you once with Amestris, was it not because you did then a little love her? When I was there (Replied Artabes smiling) I loved your Rival too well, and it was at his importunity that I came thither; and he thought so little of any such thing, that I think you need not be jealous of your Brother: Consider it well (said he) and resolve whether I should serve you, or whether I should not: For I assure you I should think my self much obliged unto you, if you would not imploy me in any such infidelity to my friend: Megabises seeing such an indifferency in the minde of Artabes, assured himself, nor could suspect that man who loved both Aglatidas and himself so much, would ever fall in love with Amestris: And thus Sir he cozened both him and me, and brought all things to the passe he desired: In conclusion he assured me that he had acted his part unto Megabises according as was covenanted between us: He expressed his sorrows and despair to the life, and told me that he would not absolutely promise him to see Amestris no more, but he had given him permission to see her, and to endeavour with her in his behalf, swearing unto him, that if I found her more tractable, he should then absolutely retreat, and leave him in quiet possession of his good fortune; Then Sir, the same which Artabes told me he told also unto Megabises: and perswaded him that I respected you so much as to yeeld up Amestris unto you, and that he should also permit him his leave to see, and then Sir there was nothing which could oppose his joy; so that he told us severally there was no more to be done, but for him to court her in their behalfs daily, and to gain her esteem by some particular civility: But said I then to him, My Page 116 dear Artabes, if she should chance to love you in earnest, during this fiction, where were we then? I fear not that (answered he, and doubtless it was the least of his fears) for my own defects assure me of the contrary; And moreover (continued he) I will faithfully promise you that when I am alone with her I will not then speak a word to her but in your behalf, and therefore there is no danger at all: In a word Sir, Artabes did so work upon the minde of Megabises, and mine, as we did consent that he should visit Amestris, and that he should be very assiduous with her, I leave you to judge Sir, if ever the like chance happened: and if ever there was a more prosperous cheat for a while; for since I thought that Megabises retired himself, because he thought Artabes would be better treated then himself: I wisht Artabes all good success: Also Megabises having the same thoughts, had also the same desires: Thus did both of us pray for our greatest enemy and our most dangerous Rival: and whilst he was transacting our Ruines we gave him as many thanks as if he were perpetuating our felicity: He went daily to Amestris who treated him with abundance of civility, and shewed him more favours then any else, because she conceived his visits were only in consideration that he had quitted his solitude, and changed his course of life: he had freedom of discourse with Amestris when he pleased, and that with more respect then either of us: for as we were both of us perswaded that when he discoursed alone with her, he spoke unto our severall advantages, we endeavoured to facilitate the way unto him; and we our selves furnished him with Arms to destroy us: for in lieu of imploying those precious minutes with her in private to the advantages of Megabises or me, he all the while was endeavouring to gett himself into her good opinion: But for the first daies, it was after so handsome and respective a way, that she could not be angry: and if she did suspect any such thing as love, she thought also that he had never given her any occasions of displeasure; she behaved her self unto him with much reservedness, but yet as I have said with very much civility, because indeed he was worthy of it, both in respect of his quality, and of his wit; Megabises asked him every day whether I began to change my thoughts, and I asked him very often, if his Brother did pity his counterfected Passion: To this he answered me, that he began to have very much hopes of him; and to the other, that yet he knew not what to hope of him: To the one, that the thing was possible, that the thing was possible, but difficult; to the other, that notwithstanding all the difficulty he would bring it about: and to them both that nothing ought to be done precipitately, if they would have it done will; and that they ought to give time of consideration and contrivance of the matter: In short Sir, this Impostor transacted his enterprise so cunningly, that whereas he should have acted for us, we both of us acted for him, and gave him a thousand thanks for his knavery: We met oft all together at the Chamber of Amestris, and both Amestris, and both Megabises and my self endured torments beyond imagination: Sometimes our Passions were turned all into despair, sometimes jealousies mingled; Megabises suspected his Brother was more my Servant then his: I also thought that Artabes would betray me to favour him, sometimes we were all fears, and sometimes we did apprehend that Artabes neither was in love nor ever would be. As I remember I told you, that by the orders of my unfaithfull friend I was never to speak openly concerning my Passion for Amestris: But though I observed that order most exactly, yet dare say the fair Amestris was not ignorant what power her bewitching eyes had over my heart: And although my tongue did never reveal the secrets of my soul, yet all my actions, my looks, and also my common discourse of indifferent matters, did clearly evidence (I knew not how) the violence of my love, especially unto any that was possessed with any inclination to judge things for my advantage: I was obliged for the justification of Amestris, and her favours to me, to say, that since it was her pleasure to honour one so much, it was because she knew that Artabaces and Hermanista allowed of it; it being certain, as I was well informed since, that it was their desire I should become a servant unto Amestris, because I was the first man of all the Court which had the honour to be known unto her, and because I had never said or done any thing which displeased her, but was upon all occasions diligent to serve and direct her: Yet notwithstanding her slight disposition not to hate me, did not at that time afford me much happiness, because the severity of her wisdom, and prudence of her civilities was such, that none could reasonably guess she bore any good thoughts of me; neither fear she had any ill, because of her aspect, such was the wisdom and judgement of her behaviour. Yet I dare say that Artabes as prosperous as he was in his knavery, had some angry times; for when he was with Amestris, between Megabises and me, it was impossible but he should be stung with some remorse of conscience, for betraying his brother and his friend, and sometimes apprehend the end of the adventure; not but that he had foreseen all things; and that if his design did Page 117 not hit, he was not to seek for excuses: His design was, that when he had assured himself of the favour of Amestris, to ask pardon of us both, for covering his love to Amestris with the cloak of a seeming it to be affection unto us, and to seem so extremely sorry for the accident, that we should pity him: He imagined that for his brother there was no fear of his life from him, and as for me, he believed that our friendship, and the reverence I bore unto Amestris would hinder me from spoiling his design; and after all, the fair Amestris would not expose her self unto any danger of causing a quarrell. Thus had Artabes laid the foundation of his Plot: But Fortune, which meddles in many matters, would not suffer it to hit: And thus we lived for a reasonable long time: Then Artabes seeing how he was baited both by his brother and himself: and thinking that he was upon good terms with Amestris, he began to express his passion more openly than formerly he had, and intended to open his design unto her; and a while after he found a favourable opportunity. He told Megabises and me severally, that now he was resolved to know which of us two stood best in the favour of Amestris; but to that end we must not go unto her this two daies, but give him the opportunities to entertain her in private: We both consented unto his desire, though on my side with much ado: He went then unto Amestris, unto whom he could not speak the first day, by reason of much company; there happened to be then there one of her lovers, called Oltanes, an illfavoured man, and most displeasing both to her and all the Court: This man was seldom from her; not but that Amestris had a very great dislike of him, but because he being a man of quality, Artambaces would not forbid him his house: It was this man who did most hinder Artabes from speaking unto Amestris the first day: but the next day after proved more happy, for he found her without any company besides her own women: She her self was leaning upon a Balcone which looked into the Garden; so that he might deliver his minde without being heard by any: At first their discourse was upon indifferent things; but since he had a hidden design, and desired to fall insensibly into discourse of something which might discover it unto her: Madam (said he to her) I found you yesterday in such a solitude as was not usual with you, very like unto that humour out of which you have drawn me; I should think my self much honoured (answered she) in being a means to regain you unto your friends: But I believe I rather the persuasions of Megabises and Aglatidas which had that power over you, then that I contributed any thing at all. Megabises and Aglatidas (replied he) has not so much power over me as the fair Amestris: You are very unjust then (answered she) for in my opinion they have more right unto that power then Amestris hath, who desires power over none but her self: That which you reserve unto your self (replied Artabes) is doubtless much better then all the rest of your Empire: though I assure you, that you have an absolute dominion over all those who have the honour to come near you; and for my particular, I preferre you before all the Crowns in the world: If difficulty in getting of any thing (answered she) do add any thing to the value, then you have reason to esteem me so, since it is most certain, that it is no easie matter, ever to get an absolute power over the heart of Amestris. That would be too much, Madam, to desire an absolute Sovereignty in so glorious a place (replied Artabes) and I know some men, whose ambition would be contented with less, and account themselves most happy if you would acknowledge them for your slaves: For my part (replied Amestris) without thinking that Artabes would more clearly explain himself, I would advise none, either to give or receive any fetters; and by my good will, none of my friends shall ever become unhappy: Ah Madam, (said Artabes then) continue alwaies in so just a minde, and never repent it: To repent of things which are just, replied she is doubtless a crime, which I do not intend ever to commit: If so Madam, replied he, why do you suffer one man in the world (who adores you without parallel, and whose rigorous silence cannot express himself) without shing upon his misfortune, by your favourable aspect? you I say, who expresse your self so divinely, and say, that by your consent none of your friends shall ever be unhappy? Amestris stood a while without an answer, not knowing well whether Artabes spoke concerning Megabises, my self, or him|self: She was so surpris'd at the discourse, that she knew not well how to expound it: but the first disorder of her spirit being passed over; I know not Artabes (said she in a higher tone) whether or no you have any design upon me, to make me follow your accustomed humour, and preferre solitude before society: but I know very well, that though you do not change me, you move me to advise you to rest your self quiet in your own closet, and trouble my chamber no more: I cannot be any where but with you (replied Artabes precipitately, who was naturally of a hasty violent temper, though he seemed dull and melancholique unto those that knew him not very well.) Surely Artabes (said Amestris in looking Page 118 upon him with many marks of anger in her eyes) you do not know me? Pardon me, Madam, answered he, I know you very well, and cannot be ignorant, that you are the fairest, and most amiable in the world: but it is you Madam, added he, who knows not the unfortunate Artabes; he, I say, who adores you, as devoutly as men adore the Gods; he, whose thoughts are all upon you; and who seeks nothing upon earth else; I say, who will die, and die a thousand deaths rather then live without the love of Amestris: Then you must pre|pare your self for death (replied she and broke off his discourse) for Amestris will not bestow her esteem esteem nor love, nor friendship upon any, who want those respects unto me which are fitting. It to adore you to want respect? replied he: To tell me as much, is, answered she: Do as the Gods do then (answered Artabes) and know my thoughts, and like them, receive my prayers, and grant me that which it is your pleasure I should not ask: I'll grant nothing, said she, unto them who render themselves unworthy, no not my compassion, which I seldom refuse unto any in misery: But Artabes (said Amestris) I desire no more of your company, and forbid you ever visiting me any more: In saying so, she would have gone away, but he staid her: Since this is the last time (said he unto her) that I must have the blessedness of your company, you may very well hear me all I would speak, and it is but fit I should let you know what Artabes is; to the end, that before you do absolutely destroy him, you may consider well whether you have any reason for doing it: I know but too much, replied she, and it would have been better for him if I had known less: You do not yet know Madam, said he, that he who speaks unto you does love you so extream violently, that there is no crime which he hath not committed for your sake; he hath betrayed his friends, he hath cosened his kindred, he hath dishonoured himself, and there is nothing which he hath not done, which might make him rest capable of getting your affection, and to hinder all others from possessing it. The reason, Madam, why I tell you what I have done, is, that you may know what I can do: If there be any of my Rivals which displeases you, do but seem to wish, and I shall presently rid you of them; but (continued he) Megabises and Aglatidas they are more fortunate then I, if you desire to preserve them, hide so all your advantageous thoughts of both of them, that I do not perceive them, and that they themselves do not perceive them. Megabises and Aglatidas, replied she, are wiser then you are, in my opinion: I know not Madam, answered he, whether they be wiser; but I know very well, that if they be more happy then I, they shall not be so long: At these words Amestris grew so extremely angry, that she used all the vile and ill terms she could invent against Artabes, who doubtes did often repent him of his violence, though in vain: This crafty and subtle man, by the violence of his passion and sorrow, had lost all policy and craft upon this occasion. As they were upon these terms, a servant came in and told Amestris that there were a great number coming to visit her; but since she found her spirits a little disordered, and left any signs of anger or sorrow should appear in her face, she left Artabes upon a sudden, and went into her Closet to compose her countenance. Mean while Artabes went out of the chamber, but in such a fury, and so desperate as possible a man could be: Sorrow so possessed him, that because he could not resolve to see either Megabises or me: he took his horse and went for some certain daies into the Country, leaving order to tell every one, that important business so hapned that he was forced to go without bidding adieu to any of his friends, or seeing us: Mean while, Megabises and I, who knew nothing of the truth, and who were in absolute dispute, because Artabes had rendred us no account of the discourse which he had with Amestris, we would go the next day unto her; but we were told that she was not well, and would not be seen: The next day we went again and saw her, but much more melancholike then accustomed: Methought she treated us more coldly then formerly she was accustomed. I leave you to imagine Sir, how troubled I was; for as I beleev'd that Artabes had spoken to her concerning me, the last time he was with her, so I expounded this coldness in her, in a cruel sense: Megabises, as I have heard since, he was at no more rest then I, and therefore passed all that afternoon in much melancholy: But here may be admired Sir, how Fortune disposes of things; All the while I was thus tormenting my self, and had trusted the conduct of my Love unto a Friend who had betrayed me, my Father, I knowing nothing of it, was an earnest solicitor for my happiness, as you shall know. I was then very melancholike both at the absence of Artabes, and the coldness which I observed in the Countenance of Amestris; when my Father sent for me, and propounded unto a Marriage, with the Daughter of Artambaces, not only as a thing which he wished might be, but as a thing already done up amongst them. Sir, Replied I, this which you propose is too advantageous to Page 119 be consented unto without much Joy: But do you think Sir, that Amestris does resent it with the like gladness? Amestris, answered he, does not yet know of it; but I beleve she is so well educated to be obedient unto her Parents, who I know do desire it as much as I; Sir, said I to him, I would know it from Amestris, and not from Artambaces; It is your own office (replied my Father) to inform your self of her thoughts and desires: I leave you to judge Sir, how infinitely I was joyed at such welcome news: it was so abundantly pleasant, that I relished it but imperfectly, and it moved such violence in my soul that I could not resent it as I ought: Oh Heavens, how oft did I wish, the perfidious Artabes were there to be a witness of my good fortune, and to ask him pardon for the displeasure Megabises did resent: Mean time, because I thought it strange, that they should marry me Amestris, before I had acquainted her with my Love; I took an occasion the next morning to visit her, and it was my happiness to finde her alone: I observed, that she did often change colour, and I imagined, as indeed it was true, that she had been acquainted with the intention of Artambaces concerning our Marriage, of which he had spoken unto her, an hour before I came: But alas Sir, what strange inquietudes did this fair and amiable divinity afford me? and how great were my fears, that she had no dislike of me, because they had propounded it unto her! Madam (said I to her almost trembling) dare Aglatidas be so bold as to ask the fair Amestris, whether the many changings which he perceives in her fair face, be a good or a bad omen for him? I think, said she (blushing very much) that I have heard the Magi say, that men ought not to consult with any but the Starres, to know their Fortunes, and not to trouble themselves at such lame and slight observations. I think (replied I) that those who desire to know whether they shall be Rich, or fortunate in War, ought to do as you say; but I beleve that they who would know nothing else but what the heart of Amestris thinks, ought to consult with nothing but her eyes; and ought to ask their good fortune from nothing else but them. Amestris (answered she) is not considerable enough to give Felicity or bad fortune unto any: But, Aglatidas may believe that Amestris will never seek her own good fortune, but by the will of those who ought to dispose of her: But Madam, said I, if those whom you speak of should advise you unto a thing which is repugnant unto your minde, would you obey them without murmur? I would, doubtless (replied she) as long as I have life; and I hold it better for my self to do that which I ought, then to do that which pleaseth me: It is a most severe virtue, replied I, and methinks it is a little too blind an obedience; for Madam, unto how much despair would that man be driven, who should be so happy as by the choice of your parents to be a husband unto the divine Amestris, if he should afterwards know that she obeyed her parents only, and married him by constraint? I would hide my thoughts so close, answered she, that he should never know it: Ah Madam, said I to her, do not abuse your self so much, this is a thing which cannot be; Therefore Madam, I conjure you by all that is most venerable and holy, to tell me ingenuously upon what terms am I in your heart? for I cannot think my self more unhappy, then that you should be ignorant how you are absolute Commander over mine; yes Madam, said I, you know that since the first minute I had the honour to see you, I have loved you with unequalled passion: that I have served you with as much reverence as any can the Gods; and secretly adored you with every atom of my heart: Then Madam, it's your part to let me know whether I must hope or fear, whether you can endure me without aversion, or whether you like me out of Complacence without compulsion; it is absolutely in you to determine upon either my good or my bad fortune: I have already told you (replied she) that I have no power in my own felicity, and therefore by consequence cannot have in anothers: But Aglatidas, since I have received a command from Artambaces and Hermanista to entertain you, when you speak of your affection, let me tell you with much sincerity, that I think the choice which they have made for me is very advantageous for me, and so much, that when I understood it, I was in much confusion; and if you observed any alterations in my countenance, doubtless it was, because I was ashamed to be no more worthy of the honour which you do me, then I am: Amestris pronounced these words with such reservedness, that I could not discover her heart, which put me into great perplexity and melancholy: I was at this time almost angry with my father for so soon putting forward my good fortune; for, said I to my self, how should I know now whether or no Amestris loves me; Amestris, I say, who is the wisest Lady upon earth, and one who would dwell with the ill-favour'd man if she once married to him: So very much was I possessed, Sir, with this kinde of inquietude, that I could not hide it from Amestris: Madam (said I to her) you see here before you the most happy and the most unhappy Page 120 man both, of all men upon earth: The most happy, in the noble hope which Artambaces gives unto my father, that Amestris will not refuse me; but the most unhappy, in that I cannot know whether Aglatidas be the choice of Amestris or Artambaces: What will it advantage you to know it, or to know that which I know not my self? For as I have ever been strongly of this opinion, that I ought not to dispose of my self, so I am contented to deny my heart my own choice, and submit my self unto a blinde obedience: Then Madam (said I unto her) if your Parents should command you to accept of Megabises or Otanes, would you obey them? I have already confessed it if I be not much mistaken, replied she: Oh heavens (cried I) Madam, why will you not make me happy? I will not deny you happiness (answered Amestris) if my consent be necessary unto it: But Madam (said I, interrupting her) how shall I be assured that your consent is more than a constrain'd obedience? since you tell me that you will obey, though never so repugnant to your minde: You are very unjust Aglatidas, said she to me, to desire that I should tell you my thoughts, and I only to guess at yours; therefore endeavour to discover them if you can, and content your self to know thus much, that Artambaces has the heart of Amestris in his power, and if he dispose of it unto you, as very likely he will, then you shall have an absolute and lawfull power over it: This is not yet enough Madam, said I unto her, I would precisely know what you thought of Aglatidas at that very time before Artambaces did speak unto you in his behalf? I thought, said she, doubtless as all other reasonable people would think: But were you so absolutely indifferent, said I to her: You are too inquisitive (answered she smiling and blushing both) and if I should continue answering you thus, it should go hard but I would say something which should be either to your disadvantage or my own. After this manner Sir did this wise and nimble Lady free her self from my persecution, and cured me a little of my melancholy humour; for I thought she spoke these last words in such a manner that I might very well expound them in a favourable sense for my self: Then thought I my self most happy; and if Artabes had but been at Ecbatan, there was nothing more which I could have wished; yet since persons of Quality do never marry in Medea, without the Kings consent, Artambaces and my Father did conceal it some certain daies, until they found a fit time to acquaint Astiages with it; But Sir, they were happy daies for Aglatidas, what delights did he not finde in the conversation of Amestris: for since her Father commanded her to respect me as one that was to be her husband, I found in her soul so sweet a complacence, and observed such tenderness towards me, that I might very well say, I was fully recompensed by these blessed minutes, for all the ill ones that ever I suffered: Yet she would never confess that she loved me, or ever did love me; but permitting me to hope what might be hereafter, she said enough to satisfie me that she did not hate me: Artambaces and my Father having met with that fit opportunity which they waited for, spoke unto the King concerning our marriage, who presently consented unto it, because he knew not that Megabises pretended unto Amestris: The consent of Astiages was no sooner obtain'd, but immediately the matter was divulged about the Court: Megabises being presently informed of it, went presently unto the King, and desired him to forbid the Banes; but the King told him he spoke too late, that his word was past, and the thing was absolutely without remedy: Megabises went away from the King sufficiently Malecontent, and resolved of another way to compass his end, he sought an occasion to meet me, and having found me, without any more preamble, Aglatidas (said he to me with a low voice in my ear) you shall not enjoy Amestris, but by the death of Megabises; therefore, without more ado, let us go out at the gate which opens towards the Mountains, and compleat your joyes by my destruction. Megabises (said I to him) I need no pressing to go whither you would have me; but I confess I would not, if possible otherwise, take Sword in hand against the brother of Artabes: But you may (replied he) if you will yield Amestris unto me: Amestris, replied I, Ah, no no, Megabises, I can never yield her, and if there be no other way to give you satisfaction, we must follow your intention: In saying so we went out, as soon as we were rid of those which were about us, and came unto the foot of a great Rock under a great Hill, where he would have us fight, I confess that the friendship of Artabes troubled me a little, and I had no minde to lose the blood of his brother: But when I began to think that Megabises was my Rival, and that the possession of his Amestris depended upon his life or death, all other considerations vanished, and fury become master of my spirit: We were no sooner at the place which he aimed at, but we drew our Swords, for it was so near the Tower, that though we were on foot, yet we need no taking our breaths: Megabises came up to me with so much fury and violence, as let me know I had a dangerous enemy to deal with; and I dare say he received Page 121 me with so much resolution, as he had no ill opinion of my courage; We being both of us nimble and well skild at weapon, did hold out many blows without a wound, which I believe did anger us both: So that we resolved to put the matter unto Fortune, and not to stand fencing any longer. Artabes, the politique Artabes, having in all likelihood invented some new cheat for us, and returning to Town, saw us afar off at the foot of the Rock; who not knowing who we were, rid up unto us with drawn Sword to part us: But, O heavens, how he was surprized when he knew us; and what variety of thoughts he had upon it: Megabises being his brother, it may easily be beleev'd, he would treat me to hold, and regarding me as his friend, he obliged his brother to use his Sword no more against me: But when he did resent us as his Rivals, I know not whether he had a minde to set upon us both, and lay aside all respects of fraternity or friendship: yet natural resentments alwaies appearing first upon sudden accidents, Artabes no sooner saw us and knew us, but he cried out as loud as he could to hold our hands: his voice being known unto us both, and both Megabises and my self being moved at it, we turned aside and saw Artabes with drawn Sword, as I said before, who having got between us, in parting us, not lighting from his horse, What strange fury possesses you (said he unto us) and what new quarrel is risen between you? The fault's not mine, my dear Artabes (said I to him) the Gods do know with what unwillingness I came to it; Why then 'tis you Megabises (said Artabes to him) who without consideration that Aglatidas my friend, and contrary unto your promise, have begun this quarrel in my absence? It was I indeed (replied he) who invited him to it, and who will send him to his grave, unless he either send me to mine first, or yield Amestris to me: Artabes, who knew not how things stood since his departure, and would not have his brother Megabises to enjoy Amestris, no more then he would have his friend Aglatidas; therefore looking upon us both; You are too furious (said he) and have lost your reason; I never heard say that Artambaces would give his daughter unto him that was most valiant, therefore in lieu of fighting to no purpose, go both unto him together, and he to him he consents, let him continue quiet possessor of Amestris: Ah my dear Artabes, you have pronounced a most favourable sentence, for Artambaces has promised his daughter unto me: Yes, said Megabises, and the King has consented; therefore judge you if it be not time to fight with Aglatidas, or whether I am in such a condition as to follow your counsell. At these words Artabes, who doubtless would never have given that counsell, but that he imagined Artambaces would never bestow his daughter upon men that would quarrel about her, and thereby he might get advantage by it, therefore he began to change colour, and looking upon me with eyes full of rage and despair; And is it true, said he unto me, that they have promised you Amestris, and that Amestris hath consented? It is true, said I to him, and I rejoice in the good fortune, and Amestris did obey without any murmure: Hah, if it be so, said he, Megabises let me sight with the happy lover of Amestris, and do not you meddle, for I have more interest then you have, and Aglatidas shall be more innocent in causing my death, if it chance, then yours; In saying so, he fell upon me with much fury, and I stept aside, not being willing to fight with my friend, and yet wondering from whence these words should proceed. Megabises very generously stept in betwixt us (and incensedly said unto him) What wilt thou shame us both, and make all the world beleev'e we were two against one? Retire, or else my thoughts of honour and love shall make me forget those of nature; at these words I let fall the point of my Sword, to let Artabes see I had no desire to fight with him: How now Artabes, said I to him, can I beleev'e what I see? and can Aglatidas imagine that Artabes is become his enemy? Ah, no no, said I, I can never believe it; for I cannot hate any unless the lovers of Amestris And it is under that notion (answered the furious Artabes, lighting from his horse, and advancing towards me) that I cannot suffer your good fortune, and which prompts me to dispute the matter with you unto my very last drop of blood: Are you a lover of Amestris? (said Melgabises) as well as I? Yes, I am (replied he unto us) and so zealous a lover too, that none shall ever enjoy her as long as I live: I leave you to judge Sir, how Megabises and I did wonder; and admire a little the various effect of Artabes his language: I who a little before did love this perfidious friend, and hated Megabises, as soon as I heard him so express himself, the love I had formerly to him extinguished, and the hate which I bore unto the other suspended, this new jealousie operating upon my fancy more strongly then the old one: Melgabises for his part, looking upon me as one that had been deceived by Artabes as well as himself, <◇> lessen his aversion to me, and increase his hate of the other: And Artabes being all despair and violent passion, made no difference, as I thought, between his brother and me his friend; although I think he was the most unhappy, it being to be thought, that the Page 122 mage of his crime and double treason did often present it self into his minde, and tormented him without cessation; yet Artabes could not now fight with me, because indeed I refused, and because Megabises would not suffer him; and on the other side, he would not stay to be a witness of the Combate which was begun between Megabises and my self, nor was he as furious as he was able to fight against us both, nor would I have suffered him to fight with his brother. But because Megabises was not less amazed at the love of Artabes then I was; Since when, brother (if I may call you Rival, said he to him) have you been in love with Amestris? Since the first minute that ever I saw her: (answered he) What (said I to him, interrupting him) did you fall in love with her that day I carried you unto her? Yes, cruel friend, replied Artabes, it was you which forced me to go, and who forced me to betray you afterwards; to deceive Megabises, to offend Amestris, and to dishonour my self: There-Aglatidas (said he) since I can be no longer your friend, it must of necessity be that either you or I must die: It were better, said I unto him, that you did repent of your crime: I cannot repent (answered he) untill Aglatidas and Megabises leave loving Amestris: Since it cannot be but upon those terms (said Megabises and I both together unto him) we must bethink our selves whether it be better to pardon or to punish you: As we stood thus argu'ing the matter, we saw a number of people coming towards us, who being told that we went out of the Town together, came to seek us, having some suspicion of our quarrell: The furious Artabes, having no minde to stay, took horse, and told me in my ear, that three daies hence he would expect me from morning till night, in a certain place which he appointed, and told me that if I were not the basest coward that ever lived, I would come thither and give him satisfaction: Then he presently rid away, and we lost the sight of him. Those men who sought us, did finde us, and brought us to the Town, but for all their vigilance, both Megabises and I escaped them, and went out to fight some five hundred paces from Ecbatan. I will not trouble you with relating the particulars of our Combate; I will only tell you, that I was so fortunate as to hurt Megabises slightly in the hand, and disarm him: I thought it not fit to go into the Town the same day, because Megabises was allied unto the blood Royall, and it would seem some disrespect in me to fight with him, though it was not I who began the quarrell: I went therefore unto a friends house, without thinking that this way led me unto the place which Artabes had appointed: for if I had considered it, it may be I should not have took that way, so much was my former love to him stronger then my present hate: But Sir, I forgot to tell you that in disarming Megabises, my own Sword did break, so that in the end of the Combat I could not restore unto him his own, since it seemed not just unto me that he who had the good fortune to be Conqueror, should himself be disarmed: Therefore I had then Megabises Sword, by reason of the fault which was of a very extraordinary fashion: So that as I came to the place Artabes had appointed, and where he punctually expected me: he no sooner saw me but he knew the Sword of Megabises, and thought I had killed him: This fight suspended all other thoughts for a time: Why now (said he in coming towards me) I do not only see him who enjoys Amestris, but also my brothers murderer: Your brother (said I to him in going back) is not in that condition; and if it were as easie for me to leave loving Amestris, as it is to render you your brother, we should be quickly friends: That cannot be so, said he, for none of our Family use to quit their Swords but with their lives, but however it be, you must fight with me, and though that should not be, yet I have other causes to hate your life; and wish your death: In the name of the Gods Artabes (said I to him) do not urge me to kill the man I so much love, and lend me so much patience as to hear me a little: Artabes at these words stayed, and did not press upon me so hard: I began then to speak of a hundred things (notwithstanding my hate, and my resentments) to bring him unto reason, though I could not do it; Why, said I to him, do you not remember that I was your friend? Yes, said he, but I remember better that you are my Rival, and such a Rival who is to marry Amestris: The Gods are my witnesses (said I to him) I would yield her to you, if it were in my power, notwithstanding all your treasons against me: So would not I, answered this desperate man) if it were my case; for if I thought my heart could stoop to yield her unto any one, I would run my Sword through it, for a punishment for a thought so base and unworthy of Amestris, But, replied I, though I should not marry Amestris, perhaps Artabes would never be the better, but another might be more happy then us both: That other, replied he, should be unto Artabes as Aglatidas is at present, that is, a man whose sight nor life I could endure: If I look upon you a <...> friend, I am confounded at my treacheries which I cannot repeat of; If I look upon you as the Vanquisher of my brother; I must revenge his dishonour: If I look upon you as my Page 123 Rival, I must hate you, and kill you if I can: But, said I to him, must I sight with you with the Sword of Megabises? and wound you with the Arms of your brother? My brother, said he, is my Rival as well as you, and you imploy none but the Arms of an enemy against me, when you imploy his: In the name of our former friendship (said I to him) do not force me to fight: In the name of our hatred and love to Amestris (replied he) discourse no more: Upon these words he fell upon me, and I was forced to look to my self: I was a long time only putting by the blows he gave, so long that I observed his anger and fury had lost him his judgement; he struck at random, and laid himself open all the while, and if I had a mind, I could have run him through a hundred times: But when I observed how he fought, I pitied him: and he should not have died if he himself had not caused his destruction: When the Combat had lasted a long while, he observed how I spared him, and then that which should have relented him, did the more exasperate his fury; so that making a Pass at me, and stepping on the wrong side with great violence he ran himself upon my sword, which pierced him to the hilt; I drew it out instantly, but it seem'd I gave a freer passage for his soul, for he died immediately without speaking one word. I confess to you Sir, I never found my self more troubled then now, for indeed I loved Artabes very dearly, more I was sorry it should so fall out as to be with his Brothers sword; but that which I was most sensible of, was, because it would retard my marriage, and force me for a time to forbeare the Court, since Artabes was a man of that Quality: yet it so fell out that Artabes fell upon me, there were divers people Spectators of our actions, and such as were able to testify in my behalf if necessity should require it: But as my sorrows were extream, after I had entreated those people to take care of the body of my unfaithfull and unfortunate friend, I went unto a Kinsmans house not far off that place: I was no sooner there but I dispatched a Letter to my Father, to Artambaces, and to Amestris, to acquaint him with the accident, and I neglected nothing which was fit to be done upon such an unlucky occasion: I will not lose so much time as to relate the various censures of several men, since you will easily conjecture them: The death of Artabes made a great noise throughout the Court: The chance to fight with two Brothers in a day, and to kill Artabes with his Brothers Sword, were circumstances, that in appearance did aggravate the matter; but in substance did not at all make me more guilty: yet notwithstanding, Astialges seemed much incensed, and Megabises thought his Brother had betrayed him, and was his Rivall, yet he could not chuse but shew much resentment of his death, and cloak the interest of his Love with Revenge of his Brothers death: Artambaces therefore and my father resolved that for a while I should keep close, and get from Ecabtan as I could, to the end a new quarrell with Migabises might be prevented; and they did both of them contribute all their endeavours to compose the matter: they had no sooner resolved upon my departure, but I was acquainted with it; and that I did foresee as much, yet I could not chuse but be much surprised at it: The thought of that felicity wherein I was before, and the condition wherein now I was fallen, did so much sad me, as I hardly had the power over my own reason; I therefore sent to beseech my Father that he would be pleased to give me a little time to resolve upon this irksome departure, and to prepare my self for it, which was easily granted unto, because he knew I was in a House which you safely conceal me; and he thought, though Astiages was much incensed against him, yet he supposed that he would not long continue so against the Son of one who had so long time served him. I stayed here some few daies, during which time I want three Letters unto Amestris, to obtain leave of her that I might come, and bid her adieu, but notwithstanding all my urgent prayers, and reasons, I believe she would never have suffered me, if I had not employed a Kinsman unto her, who was also a prevalent friend of hers: In conclusion Sir, I obtained License to come one night into the stately Gardens which are about a hundred paces from Ecbatan upon the South side, and whose vast extent was such, that it deserved the phrase of a great Park rather than a great garden: Hither it is where those who are weary of the tumultuous Town, use; to come and walk, there being much lesse company then in the Kings Garden, or upon the Bank of Orantes. Perhaps you remember Sir, that in that place there is a great Border whose Partitions are grasse, in the midst of which there is a stately Fountain whose Bassin is half sable, half argent; whose sides are coloured Massie green, whose largeness and coolness affords a very pleasant neat unto those which desire to rest themselves: Then Sir, this great border is environed with a Table and thick wood, in which is many paths cut, and which by a hundred turns and returns makes the walk very long and difficult to finde the way out. Also it is much less frequented that not at all less pleasant then the rest; But because the other Page 124 borders are neerer the entrance, therefore they were more used, and none but solitary and melancholy persons used to go unto this Fountain: It was in this place where the fair Amestris being perswaded by my Kinswoman and her Friend resolved to meet me: It would be hard Sir for me to tell you all the joy which I received at this welcome news: I forgot that I was to see her upon terms of bidding her farewell, and never thought of what might follow this interview. I thought only of her permitting me to see her in a place where I might discourse of my Love; and where perhaps I might receive some testimony from her that she was not displeased with me. I came thither before break of day for fear of discovery: I passed away all the morning and the afternoon in a little Lodge at the farre end of the Walk, where none dwelt but the Gardiner, who for a little money will do what you please; the Sun no sooner began to decline neer her Bed, but I arose, and went into the thick wood which compasseth about the green border of grass, looking and longing with much impatience for the coming of Amestris with abundance of impatience; The winde whifled not a leaf, but I thought I heard her coming, and her fair Idea presented it self so lively in my fancy, as though I saw her often when I saw her not: At last, the Sun being set, this glorious Star appeared, and I saw her come out of a part of the Wood, attended by my Kinsman, and three or four of her women; for though this secret meeting was no crime, yet this wife Lady did chuse rather to come accompanied with a reasonable number then a few. I no sooner saw her, but I went to meet her, and presenting her my hand, I led her unto the Fountain, where we were certain to be heard by none, nor fear any surprisall: At first I thanked her for her goodness towards me with all the reverence and respect that was possible; but since time was precious, she was no sooner seated, but I kneeling unto her, whilst my Cozen and the rest of her women discoursed of the beauty of the place, some six paces from us: Madam (said I to her) may the unfortunate Aglatidas believe that you have honoured him so far as to see him here with a good will? and was it not by chance that he hath this delight to meet you? No, Aglatidas (answered she) it was by my own consent that I see you, and I believe that my Father having commanded me to honour you very much, would think it no crime in me to give you this testimony of my esteem, and (if I durst say it) of my friendship: Ha Madam (said I to her) hide not my happiness from me, and if it be so that I am so happy as to move you unto any slight acknowledgement of my Passion, let me know Madam, whether it be your pleasure to preserve my life, and think not that I am of their humour who use to flatter themselves, and expound all things to their own advantage; but on the contrary I do alwaies use to be jealous of my self, and doubt whether any can esteem me: therefore Madam, I beseech you be so indulgent unto my weakness as not to incline so much unto that severe humour, which makes you think Love to be a crime, and which causeth you to use only these cruell words of esteem and friendship in all your discourse, but those of Love and Passion are never heard from you: Be pleased to consider that I am an unfortunate man, and am to be an Exile in some Countrey where I can finde no joy: Think I conjure you that I have need of some consolation, during this cruell absence, and that if you do not afford me some signs of your affection, I must die with despair and sorrow: Do you think Aglatidas (said she to me) that these are small things which I do for you? to come into the Garden, to admit you private Discourse, and to hear you discourse of your Passion, which how lawfull soever it be, yet has danger in it since it is so powerfull? and which cannot be endured by a maid without injury to her modesty, if she be really reasonable: Why Madam (said I to her) does a Passion which Artambaces and Hermanista approve of leave any scruple in the minde of Amestris? and is it a crime in Aglatidas, (who has not one single thought to offend you) to tell you of his Love? Ha Madam, if it be so, I shall think my self the most unhappy man upon earth; No No, Aglatidas (said she to me) I will not be so severe: I confess (said she casting down her eyes) that I esteem too much to be angry with you for loving me, and I wish you may alwaies do so; I know not Aglatidas, if it were true that I did love you, since you would have me believe you love me; I know not I say whether it be not out of course to tell you as much, or whether it be not better to let you guess at my thoughts, then to explain them plainly; for indeed Aglatidas (said she) absence does often weaken the strongest affections: and if it should so fall out that you should alter, Amestris should never enjoy her self, if she had once confessed her self sensible of your Love: Ha Madam (said I unto her) let not that consideration deprive me of one favourable word from you: and be confident that when Aglatidas does not love his adored Amestris, then he is not in this world: Time and absence are two potent enemies (Replied she) Yes Madam, against weak men (replied I) but Aglatidas Page 125 is not of that number, your fair eyes have too strongly tied his heart ever to be disengaged. But you Madam (said I) whom all the earth adores, does tell me that you have reserved one corner of your soul for some one of my illustrious Rivals, which you have not given unto me; for Madam I must conclude this from all that you have said, that I am beholding unto Artambaces for all the favours of Amestris: You are not beholding to him for this Walk (replied she) since none knew of it: Good gods Madam (said I to her looking upon her) will you not determine my fate? and either positively tell me you hate Aglatidas, or you love him? the first is not just (Replied she) and the other though it were no fault yet it were not very handsome. I beseech you then Madam (said I to her) be pleased to let me explain all your actions, and all your words unto my advantage, to make your eyes confess you love me, and let silence be a consent since words must not. I permit you (said she to me blushing) to think all that will preserve the life of Aglatidas, and to bring him to me full of fidelity home again; It is enough Madam (said I to her) it is enough, and since it is your desire I should be constant, there needs no more to make me the happiest of men: But Madam since you have by such a glorious Commandment engaged me to be faithfull, dare I then perswade my self, that since you have done so, you will be so your self? Believe it Aglatidas (said she then unto me) Amestris does not use to engage her heart upon easie terms, and since you have a Place in it, nothing shall take it out but death: I leave you to judge Sir what effects these favourable words wrought in my soul; Then I took Amestris by the hand, and kissing it whether she would or no, with as much reverence as love, I thanked her in such passionate terms, that I dare say they mollified her heart; yet since I left Megabises, Otanes, and a hundred more in Love, Madam (said I to her) I have one favour to desire which I dare hardly name, and which yet I cannot conceal: then she pressed me to know what it was, assuring me that any thing which was not unjust, should not be denied: that which I desire Madam is, if without forfeiture of my respect I may name it, that you would be pleased to be as reserved of your favors as you can both unto Megabises and Otanes, and a hundred others who are your servants, and not to let all my Rivals be happy, whilst the unfortunate Aglatidas suffers unimaginable torments: I do ingeniously confess, Madam, that my desire is unreasonable, but Love knows no Laws of reason, nor can be kept within limits: I cannot promise you (answered she) not to see them whom you call your Rivals: but I will assure you I will not give them any favourable respect: This is too little to satisfie my jealousie Madam (Replied I) unless you will be pleased to do me so much honour as to promise me to respect them as little as can be possibly: for Madam (said I) though your eyes be never so much displeased, yet they are alwaies lovely, so sprightly and so divine, that it is much better to see them in their anger, then not to see them at all: Therefore Madam I beseech you have compassion upon my imbecillity, and refuse me not the consolation to hope that my enemies shall not gain by my absence: and that I may not be the only man which shall be deprived of that happiness in seeing you: I would Aglatidas (said she to me) see your heart at rest concerning that, and assure your self that I will with as much care affect a solitude, as I should rejoyce in your presence and preservation: But in consenting unto this which you desire, I must tell you thus much, that I will engage my self no further then civility will permit, thinking it not just I should promise more: That perhaps may be too little Madam (said I) to satisfie my Love, though it be enough to satisfie one that gives Laws unto the whole world, and receives none from any but his own will: And indeed it is too much for me, if I do rightly consider my little and your great merit, I should consume too much time Sir, if I should relate all that was spoken at this sad but pleasant conference, but since it was grown very late, Amestris would part, and I parted from her both with sorrow and satisfaction: The more obliging words she had given me, the more unhappy did I conceive my self in leaving her: and I could almost have wished that she had been lesse favourable, that I might have been lesse grieved: After I had a while continued my so much interested thoughts, I did so much love the cause of my grief that my grief became precious and pleasant unto me: And I cherished them with more care then I can express unto you: and from that fatal minute when I left Amestris, until this, wherein I speak unto you, I almost never ceased from entertaining them: I followed Amestris by my eyes as long as possible, and parted from her sighing, not being able to speak adieu: I returned unto my melancholy lodging, not minding my way, nor any thing else but my sorrows; The Idea of Amestris with all her attracts, and charms, and all her splendour, appeared unto me, notwithstanding the darkness of the night. Two daies after this interview, I went into the Province of Arisantines where Artambaces Page 126 procured a convenient Retreat for me, with one of his Friends who had been Governour of a considerable place; I will not relate my Melancholy sorrows all this voyage and exile. It's enough you know that the violence of my love was so predominant in my heart, and my soul was so much infected with that Passion, as I was never at rest: And to more augment my sorrows, I was no sooner departed but I received the sad news that Hermanista being seised upon by a violent Feaver, did die the seventh day, and that Artambaces who loved her with unspeakable tenderness, was fallen sick upon it; But the misfortune ended not here, but a few daies after I heard that the loving Husband followed his wife to the grave: And that Amestris by Orders from the King was committed unto the Guardianship of one that was allied unto Megabises, and not at all a friend unto me: Imagine Sir, into what a condition this dismall news transported me; for I was infinitely bound unto Artam|baces and Hermanista; and moreover I resented the sorrows of Amestris: I imagined that I saw her in the hands of her enemies, who would not easily suffer me to see her, and upon the whole matter, I had nothing to rely upon but the fidelity of Amestris, which me thought I had not well enough deserved, to put too much confidence to it: Not but that I knew my Father did very much desire our Marriage: But yet there was some cause to fear, lest if when he saw the King alter his minde in favour of Megabises, who had already made his peace, that then my Father should comply with the time and alter his minde, in hopes he might more ea[sily] obtain my pardon: Thus I lived in such Melancholy as may be more easily conceived then expressed: Amestris also for her part her life was very full of bitterness: I did write unto her constantly every week by an express messenger whom I sent, and she did me so much favour as to answer me, and that with so much wit and wisdom both, as her Letters moved no less wonder then love in me. As she was extreemly troubled for the loss of Artambaces and Hermanista, so she writ unto me in such sad expressions as would have inspired sorrow in a soul that was in its height of jollity: She expressed such tenderness for those she loved, that I almost wished my self in the room of Artambaces and Hermanista, that I might so receive the feeling testimonies of her affection. Alas, said I, how well does this fair Lady know how to love those whom it is her pleasure to love? and how infinitely happy should I be in the enjoyment of her affection in quiet and liberty? But whilst I sigh't and complain'd away my daies and nights, without any other comfort but the Letters of Amestris, my business rather went worse then mended, because Megabises having ingratiated himself in the Kings favour, did impede it; in so much as my Father alwaies sent me word I should come no nearer Ecbatan but rest in patience: Amestris also feared I should run some hazard for the love of her; and least I should expose my self unto some fresh quarrell with Megabises or Otanes, who were busie about her; he prayed very importunately not to return too ha[stily]: Thus I saw I was arrested, and remained in the most cruel anxiety that eve• did Lover; I knew that Megabises was ever upon better terms with Amestris then any other of my Ri|vals; that for a long time she had treated us with equal respect: that Megabises was ha[n]some, and had Courage, Wit and Quality enough. Moreover I considered that his Estate was much augmented by the death of his brother Artabes, and that he was much in the Kings favour: So that as I made all these things Arms wherewith to persecute my self, I did charge my self with all those misfortunes which I feared; imagining, that if I had not killed Artabes I should not have had such cause to fear that Megabises could marry Amestris, because he was not so rich, nor perhaps in such favour: Thus did I live the most unhappy of men, al|waies perswading my self, that what I wisht for, would never happen; and that which I feared would fall out every minute. Sometimes I could not hope that Amestris would continue sincere and faithful; sometimes I conceived her Letters were but disguisements of her thoughts, and that all the testimonies of her affection were but tricks to delude me; but yet (as I knew afterwards) the amiable Lady preserved her faith, and her self inviolably for me; for she did not only reserve her Love for me; but she acted so vigorously and so severely with all the rest of her Lovers, that if she had inspired meaner passions, her cruelty to them had absolutely cured them. But as her beauty never begot any but violent loves they could not quite give over their design, but did daily persecute her; yet her time of mourning which she did really (as well in her heart as her habit) observe, furnished her with a specious pretence of reservedness and melancholy, she kept her self within those limits as exactly a <...> upon such occasions is required: And she became so solitary and retired, as those who loved her had much ado to get so much opportunity as only to see her: The first month of her mourning being over, still she did not alter her sable mode, but did refuse all manner of di|versions whatsoever; only the conversation of Menastes (for so they called him that was Page 127 my kinsman and her friend) was some comfort and pleasure unto her: They went out sometimes together to walk in the same Garden where I saw her last, and she testified all that love could infuse into a virtuous Lady, and certainly he infused in my behalf as much resentment|s as he could into the adored Amestris: But alas, I was not a jot more happy; and I looked upon things much otherwise then they were: not but that I supposed Amestris to be faithfull unto me, and did really love me: But, O heavens, this pleasant imagination, how delightful soever it was, yet did it not free me from impatience; but I had an extream delseire which moved me to go unto Ecbatan, with greater hopes to see Amestris constant, then to see Amestris unfaithfull: In conclusion, I was so prompted both by my Love, and by my Jealousie, that I resolved for Ecbatan secretly, and to go unto that Gardiner, where I staid a day, when I took my leave of Amestris, and whom I found very pliable to receive gifts, and do me any good office I should employ him in; so I went with one man only, ma|king all possible haste to be at Echatan, before any report of my departure could come either to my Father or to Amestris, because I had obliged him with whom I dwelt, not to write of it unto the Court: My design was to arrive in the night for fear of being known; and having sent my servant unto the lodging which I appointed him, I went presently to the Garden resolving to inform my self secretly how Amestris did before I saw her; after my servant had carried my horses unto their lodging at the next Town: I passed away all the night in that place where I saw her last; and calling into my memorial the favourable words which I had from her fair self; I was in such delighting satisfaction as I cannot express unto you: I know not by what secret charms this place did qualifie the turbulency of my soul; but I am certain that since I came thither, not any jealousy or melancholy, or any other distempered passion troubled me, only my impatience, and longing desires to see Amestris; and that was so great, that as I told you, I walked all the night, it being an absolute impossibility to sleep. Then, as I could no way let Amestris know of my arrivall but by my kins|man, I must therefore stay untill day time; but I had the misfortune to understand that he was gone into the Country, and would not return untill the next day: Yet notwithstanding I conceived it better to confine my self unto my patience, then to hazard the displeasure of Amestris, by letting her know the news by any way then as she was accustomed to receive it. I will not tell you Sir, how restless I was that day in the Gardiners house, whither I was re|tired, to prevent my discovery: But I will tell you that as soon as the Sun was set, that I thought there was no danger to be within the little paths of the thick wood which compassed about the grass border, in the midst of which was the Fountain, as I have already told you• then I went thither to rejoyce my self in that place, where I last saw her I loved: I look up|on all the places where Amestris had been, especially that where she did sit: It was here, in this very place (said I) where the incomparable Amestris assured me of her constancy, when she commanded it upon me, and where she permitted me to think any thing that might con|duce unto the preservation of Aglatidas, and bring him back full of fidelity unto her: See (said I to my self, and as if I had seen her) see here adored Amestris, the same Aglatidas, the very same you desired him to be, that is the most faithful, the most amorous, and most pas|sionate of all your Lovers: But my loved and adored Amestris (said I) I hope you also will retain the same I left you; and I hope to have nothing to contend about, but that severe virtue which forbids you things most innocent: As I was in the midst of these pleasant con|templations, I discovered through the boughs of trees, on the other side of the green Bor|der, one who seem'd to be Amestris, waited upon by three other women. I looked upon her most earnestly, and I was confirmed in my belief: I saw she made towards the Fountain, after she had looked about her, to see if the coast was clear from any interruption of her soli|tude, she sat down by that pleasant source, directly in the same place where I kneeled unto her when I took my leave: She leaned her head on one side upon her left hand, which did lie upon the moss-colour edge of the Fountain, and letting her right hand negligently upon her garment, she looked upon the water like one that was in a profound study, at least as I might judge by her posture, for her face was not towards me: But, O heavens, what operation had this vision upon my soul? My heart trembled, my spirits were disordered; and I was not master of my reason; I would have advanced towards her, though I had not power to stirre: and I know not what odd fancy, which I cannot express, moved me to stay unseen, rejoicing a while at that good fortune which chance afforded me beyond my hopes: Indeed Sir, my joy was so absolutely predominate to my soul, as I was never sensible of the like; for I did not only see Amestris in a place where I hoped presently to speak unto her, but I saw her in such a place as moved me to think she thought of me; and that the end of Page 128 her coming thither was but to remember our last discourse: O most happy Aglatidas, said I to my self, what dost thou muse upon? Why dost thou not present thy self unto thy faith|full Amestris? upon these words, violently bending the bows which hindred my passage, I was going out of the wood to throw my self at her feet, and to interrupt the thoughts she had of Aglatidas, by rendring her Aglatidas himself: But when I was almost out of the Wood, and ready to enter into the green Border, I saw one on the other side, who by his garb and gallant aray, seem'd to be a man of quality: Then I reti|red with as much hast, as I advanc'd before, and as Love is alwaies ingenious to persecute those who acknowledge it for their Sovereign, I suddenly exchanged my joy for inquietude; which of my Rivals is this, said I, which comes to interrupt the thoughts of divine Amestris from her dear Aglatidas? Ha, said I, if it be true, that I am in any corner of her heart, why should I envy him that throws himself at her feet, to acquaint her with his passion? But who knows, said I presently, whe|ther or no Amestris does not stay her to meet this happy Rival? and whether she do not prophane that place by her infidelity, which I took to be a testimony of her affection? Doubtless (said I, being much transported, and hardly my self, when I saw him advance to|wards her) this inconstant woman staves for him; for if it were not so, he would not make such haste, but would approach her with less straining himself: But, O heavens, what multi|plicity of sorrows seized upon me, when I perfectly saw that he who came unto her was not only my Rival, but the most of all dangerous Rivals, Megabises• I could not think on it with|out extraordinary turbulency: Yet since from the place where I lay hid I could not see the face of Amestris, neither durst I change place for fear of making such noise as might discover me, therefore I could not precisely know whether she saw him coming or no: Yet as jeallousie blinds all objects, I did imagine she saw him coming towards her; and by consequence, because she did not rise and go to him, therefore I beleaved she staid for him; and that there was a great familiarity between them, because she did him not the honour to salute him, nor use any manner of Ceremony: I know not Sir how I should express unto you my sad resentments at that time; but I am most certain that Love did never invent any so cruel to torment those she would punish, then that which I endured upon this occasion. In conclusion Sir, to make it known unto you, that what joy soever the sight of that fair and dear Person had given me in the instant before, I must tell you I could not chuse but passio|nately desire I were destroyed, I wished she would rise and be gone from that place: But, said I, if she go away I shall see her no more, yet if she stay, I may perhaps see her bestow her favours upon my Rival; If she should rise he would follow her, and I should not see the manner of his treatment: But if she do not go away, said I, is it not an infallible proof that Megabises and she are upon good termes? Go then, adored Amestris (said I, joyn|ing my hands) and stay not for my greatest enemy: But alas, this illustrious Lady, never thought of going; for she was so taken up with thoughts of Aglatidas and his long absence, that she never saw Megabises, until he was so neer her that she could not shun him. She no sooner perceived him, but she rose, contrary to my expectation: and as I knew af|terwards, asked him with much severity, why he came to molest her solitude: But, oh Hea|vens, as I did not see the face of Amestris, nor her sidity to me, nor her rigour towards Melgabises, so I was not a jot satisfied: I was in a hundred mindes to rush out of the wood, and break off their discourse which I could not understand: I thought to assault Megabises before the face of Amestris: yet seeing he had not a Sword, and I but one, I changed that de|sign and deferred my revenge; and notwithstanding my despair, my jealousy, and all I saw, I had so great a respect unto Amestris, that though Megabises had had a Sword as I had mine, yet in consideration of her, I think that I should not have dared to have set upon him; besides the consideration of a scurvy noise which this manner of doing it would have raised: Therefore then I remained an immoveable spectator of this tedious discourse: for as I exactly learned afterwards, after she had shewed Megabises how ill she took his abrupt intrusion, she would have gone away: but he did conjure her so urgently to hear him, as the last time, protesting unto her, that if after he had expressed himself, she should then for bid him any hopes of her affection, he would never importune her any more, nor see her; Amestris thinking she had found a good occasion to be delivered from the persecution of Megabises, told him at the last, that he might speak, upon condition it should be the last time; and upon condition he would absolutely resolve, to follow her order whatsoever it might be: Megabises being glad in the midst of his despair, that he had obtained permis|sion to speak, after a low reverence, thanked Amestris for the favour she had done him: But alas Sir, How deep a wound did this thanks make in my heart? and how little did I Page 129 understand the truth of the passage? the Fountain was in the midst of the Green Border; the Border was very large; the Wood which compassed it about, was every where equally distant from the midst where they were, and the Border round: I was too far off to under|stand: I could come no neerer without discovery: I saw not the face of Amestris: I saw Megabises in a posture of thanks for some favour, and I could conceive nothing but cause of despair; nor do nothing, but endure the most intollerable Hell that ever was. Yet Megabises, not to lose his precious time, whereupon the joy or the sorrow of all his life did depend, began to speak unto her in these termes: You know Madam, said he to her, that my Love to you has ever been so full of reverence, that it never almost durst appear in your eye, but when despair had robd me of my reason, and forced me to reveal it: Yes Madam, I have suffered, I have endured without complaint, untill the news of that good fortune which Aglatidas was to enjoy, for me to dispute with him for an Honour, unto which I thought I had as much right as he: For, indeed Madam, our Qualities are equal: I have Loved you since the first minute I saw you: I have served you with an unparalleled assiduity, and unexampled fidelity: and all this Madam without receiving one favourable word from you, nor one common Smile which had the least sweetness intended in it towards me: I have found you civil, it is true; as long as only matters of indifferency were in agitation: but as soon as I had discovered my Passion, ha Madam, then, those eyes, those fair eyes which I adore, never looked upon me but in anger: you have shun'd me as an enemy: and to lap up all in a few words, I belevee you have hated me: Yet for all this Madam, I have not left adoring you: you I say, who has deprived me of my rest, and troubled the tranquility of my life: who has made me lose a Brother whom I much loved: you rob'd him of his reason and virtue, and caused me to hate him; you have preferred the man who kil'd him with my own Sword: Yet Madam, I Love you still, and shall eternally Love you: yet notwithstanding there remains some beams of understanding in me, though my soul and spirits be infinitely troubled: and I desire to conjure you to tell me without dissimulation, What is the Cause of your aversion towards me? to the end I may regulate my resentments: for although I know well that your Marriage was resolved upon with Aglatidas, and I know that Artambaces Loved him, yet I am not resolved whether it was by his choice or yours. Therefore tell me Madam I conjure you, Whether your insensibility of my Love, be an effect of your Sumpathy with Aglatidas, or your naturall Antipathy to Megabises: Speak Madam, I beseech you, to the end I may know after what manner I ought to transact; and fear not my despair: but on the contrary I promise to acknowledge your sincerity for a double favour when you shall pronounce the sentence of death upon me. I could Madam (said he) without further troubling my self to discover your true thoughts, make use of other means, and take other courses to effect my designs: you know that I do not stand upon ill termes with the King: and that you are at present with one of my friends and allies, who might advantage me more wayes then one; and that either by cunning, or the Authority of Astiages, I could take more violent and infallible courses. But Madam, I cannot, I am not capable of such wayes: the heart of Amestris is a thing which can never be gotten with satisfaction, but by her self: therefore Madam, it must be you only which with ingenuity can tell me the secret of your soul: for if it be not engaged, then I shall esteem my self a most happy man, and will not despair of good fortune; but if Madam it be engaged, it is but just, that I only should be unhappy and not be perpetually a trouble unto you, either to your self, or to that happy Rivall whom you have chosen: Speak Madam I beseech you (said he to her in a most suppliant and passionate manner) and deny not unfortunate Megabises this small favour: At these words he stopt, and with much impatience waited for the answer of Amestris, which I could not understand: But alas mine was more cruell? and when I thought that perhaps the answer of Amestris unto Megabises was favourable: I was upon the point of resolving to leave the place where I was, and interrupt their Discourse: Yet notwithstanding it being the nature of jealousy to nourish poison, and to seek that which will maintain it, and shun that which would destroy it, so I kept my station, and endeavoured to know by the countenance of Megabises, whether the answer of Amestris was gracious to him or no: for (as I told you before I could not see hers: This wise Lady then, being moved with some compassion towards Megabises, resolved to try if she could cure him, by telling him her very reall thoughts: But here admire Sir the fantastick effects of Love: Amestris discovered more things now to my advantage, unto Megabises, then ever she had discovered unto me in all her life, and whilst she was telling them, I took them for so many injuries done unto my Page 130 own heart, supposing all her actions and gestures to be Testimonies of a new Passion: and all those words which I could not understand to be so many infidelities: After then a little study upon that which she would answer, I know not (said she to him) whether what you tell me be your reall thoughts or no; but I know very well that I will not dissemble mine: Know then Megabises that I have esteemed you according to your deserts, and I held you in a degree of friendship as long as I beleaved you intended nothing but civility towards me; but since you have given me such testimonies of a violent passion, I do think that I ought not to deceive you by any false ill-grounded hopes: for since I was resolved absolutely to obey my father, I would never give my own minde leave to determine upon any thing: What (said Megabises interrupting her) if Artambaces had commanded you to accept of my services, would you have consented? Doubtless I had (answered she:) But (said he) have you the same resolved blinde obedience for Aglaridas? and did not your own choice precede the choice of Artambaces? It did not precede his.; answered this lovely Lady: But Megabises, it is so strongly confirmed that nothing can alter it: Never think (said she) that by acknowledging I do not hate Aglatidas, this should give you any ground for hope, that since my heart is so sensible of him, it can ever be so of yours: No Megabises deceive not your self, I love Aglatidas, because my Father when he was dying com|manded it, and because my own inclination does not refuse it, and because my own reason argues for him: But besides all this I must acknowledge something more unto you, and tell it in hopes to cure you, though I cannot without blushing tell you that I doe love him, and I will love him eternally: I have no other reason to give you but I do and will love him: Love (said she) is doubtless a Passion, which if it were possible we ought not to have: But when it is entertained, and innocent as mine is, it ought to be made illustrious by an inviolable constancy; My Fathers command hath rendred the originall of this Passion in me to be no crime; and I must not make it become criminall by infidelity; never think Megabises that there is any thing offensive unto you in the affection I have unto Aglatidas: I chose him not, but he was given unto me, but since I have accepted of him, I must preserve him till death, and keep my self for him as long as I live: yet notwithstanding to rectifie that I will do all I can for you; I perswade you to regulate your thoughts if you can: Content your self with my esteem and friendship, and be confident you shall enjoy both them as long as I live: Amostis having done speaking, the unhappy Megabises, who bore an unconceivable respect unto her, in lieu of breaking into complaints and reproaches, thanked her for her freedom and sincerity, and testified with tears in his eyes that he was much obliged unto her for offering unto him her esteem and friendship; but as he had a little changed his station, so that I could see no more then his side; I could not perceive any melancholy in his face, I only saw a gesture, as if he had given thanks for something, which (as you may conceive) did not a little vex me; yet Megabises after he had a little deplored his misfortune, and admired at the change and his own moderation, told Amestris, that he durst not promise her an alteration in his thoughts: But at the least Madam (said he) I will so hide them that you shall never perceive them, and so far I will promise you: I will not have you (said he sighing) divide your heart: No Madam, since I can have no room in your affection such as I with never bestow your esteem nor your friendship upon me neither: Drown all those petty favours in the love you bear unto too happy Aglatidas, and give nothing unto unfortunate Megabises, only one favour which he design'd to ask you: After this Madam he will be as good as his word, he will speak unto you no more: therefore Madam (said he with eyes full of tears) refuse not to grant me this Request; and permit me during this Banishments which I intend, to say, that you have not absolutely forsaken me: Assure your self (said Amestris to him) any thing which will neither offend against my own duty, nor Aglatidas shall not be denied you; Say then only Madam (added he) that if despairing Megabises had been happy, he might have been loved by the divine Amestris, and that being unfortunate she hath only some slight compassion upon his misfortune: I have already said the first (answered she) and for the second, as I am neither blinde nor stupid, and do see things as they are; and as I ought to see them, and to say more, I think as I ought to think of them: but ask me no more and remember your Promises: I die, if I remember them Madam (answered he) but I will never forget them: at these words he kneeled to give her thanks and bid his last adieu, and before she had any time to hinder it, or make any sign, she was displeased with it, he kissed her hand twice: Oh Heavens Sir, what did I think I saw what I now tell you? at that very instant both my Love and my Love and my Jealousie gave place unto another passion, and that was hatred; or to say better, Page 131 Hatred, and Love, and Jealousie, Anger, Fury, Rage, met and mingled all together in my minde: and all striving to be predominate in my soul, put it into a great disorder, so that I had no respect for Amestris; I began then to come out of the wood where I was hid, and resolved to bestow a thousand taunts upon her, and perhaps worse upon Megabises, when presently I discovered the King attended by the whole Court, who contrary to custom came to walk there: the Guards no sooner appeared but Amestris parted from Megabises, who for his part went to lament his misfortunes in some solitary place; But they neither of them came towards the place where I was, and staid alone, not being able either to complain or revenge my self: I went into the thick of the wood, but so tormented by all passions that I could not fix my minde upon any object; I no sooner began to think of the infidelity of Amestris, but I thought of Megabises his good fortune: and as soon as I thought to come plain of my Mistress, but I began a design to revenge my self upon my Rivall: My soul was so tormentingly tosed that I was not a minute at quiet in my self; yet as the King came late, so he staid not long: Night coming on apace I only waked and staid in the Garden, I remember the Moon shined very weakly that night, because she was at the last end of her course, and that dim Melancholique light suited best with my humour, after I had sent my Servant to fetch my Horses, I passed away the night without setting down or resting my self, only a little while upon the side of the Fountain: I walked in every path, and one might have said I was seeking my Mistress and my Rivall in every corner of the wood, although I knew neither of them were there; But when I came to the place where I saw them together, It was here (said I) where I saw the unfaithfull Amestris bestow a favour upon my Rivall, such a one as I durst never pretend unto: Here it was, in this place (added he) where I received such a favour as I thought none could ever have obtained but my self: Yes Amestris, I thought your virtue was so precise that without the assistance of Artambaces I should never have obtained any place in your heart: but for ought I see, Megabises needs none to help him unto the Sovereignty of your heart; and your inconstancy has excluded the unfortunate Aglatidas: But cruell Lady (said he) must you needs chuse the very same place which was the only Testimony of that love you gave me, and there bestow your favours upon Megabises? Must you needs betray me there where you promised your fidelity unto me? Is it possible but that in speaking unto Megabises you should remember Aglatidas? Does not the murmur of this Fountain, with which you saw me mingle my tears at parting, put you in minde of him? Did not that mosse-green Cushion upon which you leaned remember you that I bedewed it with my tears? Cruell and perfidious Lady, have you forgot how you drew back your fair hand which I would have kissed, and which Megabises hath obtained with your full consent: Why (unjust and ungratefull Amestris) were you so libellall unto him, and so ingardly of your favours unto me? Do you not remember how you permitted me to think of any thing that might preserve Aglatidas, and bring him back unto you full of fidelity? Would you have him preserve himself only to ruine him? and did you desire him to continue constant, to the end he might be more sensible of your infidelity? If it had been your minde I should have been unhappy, had not that been enough, but you must make me sensible of it also? Had it not been more honour for you to have treated me ill then to betray me? You had been only cruell then, and perhaps less unjust; but as you have now used me; you are cruell, wicked, perfidious, and inhumane; But alas (said I) is it possible that all the while I courted Amestris, she did not love me? Whether it is that she alwaies did deceive me or has changed her minde? Must I look upon Amestris, as one that is a cheat, and insensible, such a one as laughs at the misfortunes of another? or must I think her weak, unconstant, and a Lover of novelty? who loves those she sees, and forgets those she sees not? Such a one as gives her heart to any, that asks it? But alas (said I) that heart, that glorious heart, has cost me too dear in the obtaining for that to be so. How many tears have I dropt? how many unprofitable sighs? and what abundance of pains have I taken before I could receive the least shadow of any good will unto me? what then can I think of you unfaithfull Amestris? have you ever loved me? or have you ever hated me? Ha, No No (said I presently) you did love me when I last left you; I discovered your heart moved, I perceived in your eyes whether you would or no, some tears of tenderness which your modesty did strive to keep in: You did hide some of your resentments from me, you grieved when I left you, and certainly you did then love me most lovely Amestris; But unhappy man that I am, you did not love me more then you had reason for: I < ◇ > (said I) that absence is most dangerous, but alas, I was absent for the love of you. More lover you have alwaies writ unto me, as if you had continued faithfull and < ◇ > I see you Page 132 the most unfaithfull woman that ever was: Ha, too happy Megabises (said I) never think you shall enjoy your happinesse quietly: for I must revenge the wrong that you have done me. Is it thou, who by some trick or other has altered the heart of Amestris; and seduced her from her good inclinations to me: It must be thou doubtless who is the only cause of her Crime, and my misfortune: I will therefore have this respect unto Amestris, as not to speak any thing unto her concerning it; nor complain of her injustice, nor charge any but him only who has made her culpable. But Oh Heavens (said I) Amestris is one of an excellent wit and judgement; she cannot easily be deceived: Artabes as cunning as he was, could do no good upon her: No, no; let me not flatter my self (said I) the heart of Megabises holds correspondence with Amestris; she is as culpable as he: and he enjoys not her affection, but because she has given it unto him. If I should tell you all I said, Sir, and all I thought upon, I should not finish my sad story this night, but should too much abuse your patience and goodness: I will only relate, that I intended a hundred times to quit Amestris, to forget her, and scorn her: then again I resolved a hundred times also, to repent and Love her eternally, maugre her crime: there was only one resolution which I kept constantly in my minde, which was, to kill Megabises, wheresoever I found him; but yet I did not know sometimes whether I should Love or hate Amestris: yet however I was fixed upon it to ruin my Rivall: Day and my Horses were no sooner come, but I sent my Servant to know whether Megabises was with her, and inform me of it; but to my ill fortune, he was gone into the Country, and none of his men could tell which rode he took: This chance did much displease me; and the thought, that this meeting of Megabises and Amestris, was only to bid adieu in that place, did double my despair: Then I sent to see whether Menasta was returned out of the Country, to the end I might make my complaints unto her of the perfidy of her friend; but I understood she was fallen sick, and could not so suddenly return: Then was I the most despairing man upon earth: I had seen such passages as moved me not to doubt of the Infidelity of Amestris: I saw her more fair then ever, at least in my imagination: My Rivall was absent; my only confidant was sick, so that I had no opportunity either to lament or revenge my self. I stayed two dayes close in a little Town neer Ecbatane, in this deplorable condition, with intentions to be informed whether Megabises was gone; but do what I could, there was no certainty of it to be learned: I was only told that he went that way which leads into the Province of the Arisantines, which was the place of my retreat: yet because there was divers cross wayes conducting to severall places, I could not conclude any certainty thereupon; yet I did imagin that he was gone to seek me out and fight with me, that so he might more quietly enjoy Amestris: This thought made such impression in me, that I took horse to return, enquiring very exactly all the way for him: sometimes thinking I had found him, and then presently found my self deceived: I came at last to the place of my retreat without any intelligence of Megabises: At my return I found a Letter from Amestris which came during my absence, and which did vex me so much as it would have pleased me if my minde had not been prepossessed: but since it is not very long, and serves to the purpose which I intend, I will relate it to you; and if I be not mistaken it was thus indited;

From Amestris unto Aglatidas.

Since you have so much Curiosity and desire to know how I do, and what my diversions are, know, that I do shun the tumultuous Court as much as handsomely I can; that there is only one, whose Conversation I can endure without regret; and that I do as much as I can, make this Conversation solitary and retired, you may very well imagin that I do not choose the Gardens of the Palace for my walks, but the Fountain in the Green Plain, is the ordinary place where I entertain that only one Person, who at present can afford me any delight in Ecbatane: there it is where I entertain my self: I will not tell you Aglatidas all my thoughts in this retired place, for perhaps it will more conduce unto your quiet, to keep you ignorant; and perhaps also it will be more advantageous unto Amestris if you do not guess at them.

I beseech you Sir, to wonder at the odness of this accident; If I had received this Letter, before I had seen what I did, I had been ravished with joy: for then I should have understood this solitude whereof she speaks, to have been for the Love of Aglatidas; I should have talken that only Person which she could endure, to have been my Cozen with whom she had discourt of me; I should have thought her going to the Fountain in the Green Plain, had Page 133 been to remember the last time I saw her: and should doubtless have thought her Letter to be infinitely obliging, since in telling me it would not conduce to my quiet, that I should know her musing thoughts, I should have interpreted her meaning was, that the knowledge of her sorrowes would augment mine: And I should have thought that none could express affection more strongly and gallantly then she did in the end of her Letter, in saying, that perhaps also it would be advantageous for her that I should not guess her thoughts: But Sir, this Letter did work a far different effect in my minde; and I expounded it in a quite opposite sense to what she did mean it: I did apprehend it so inhumane, that seeing she betrayed me and had written to me in a double sense, I beleaved that the more to oblige Megabises, she had shewed him the Letter: yes yes perfidious Amestris (said I in reading the Letter, and commenting almost upon every word) I have some desire to know what you do, and what are your diversions, I know indeed that you do not lie when you write unto me that you shun the tumult of the Court, and that there is but one person whom you can endure without regret, and that you also do what you can to have that conversation in a solitary and retired place: you tell me cruell Amestris, that I may imagine you shun the Gardens of the Palace for your walks; but perfidious as you are. I cannot imagine you go unto the Fountain in the green Plain unto any other end then to entertain Megabises: yet I do understand and saw with my own eyes that the only person in Ecbatan which can please you is the too happy Megabises: You say further, that you entertain your self: Ah, I have seen too much, cruell Amestris, I wish the gods I had not seen it: But you have reason (said <◇>) to say, that it would conduce unto my quiet to be kept ignorant of your Musings, and more reason to say that it would not be advantageous unto Amestris that I should guess at them: But how (unjust Lady) can you acknowledge them a wrong, and not repent of them; but perhaps you writ this Letter before that cruell discourse with Megabises: and indeed I was not mistaken in my conjecture, for looking upon the Date of the Letter, and remembering the day I saw them together, I found it was writ the day before it: This did put me into so hot a chafe, that I was resolved to use all possible means for the curing of my ill-grounded Passion: You may easily conceive that I took up this resolution with abundance of sorrow, and that I was to endure more then one Combat before I could overcome: I resolved to wait until Fortune gave me an opportunity to be revenged of Megabises, and not to travell the world over in quest of him, as I once intended: and I resolved to surmount those resentments which Love had infused into my soul: I would not answer Amestris nor seek for any Consolation in reproaching or taxing her for her crime; but I commanded him who used to receive the Letters, to send them back again without letting me see them or opening of them: If you ever were in love Sir, I need not tell you what I endured upon this occasion: You will easily know that it is a most difficult thing to break ones heart of a violent passion: That I have reason enough not to think upon Amestris; yet I thought perpetually upon her: and it is in vain to make any offers to scorn her, since I did ever esteem her more then all the world: I sought out company and discourse, thinking to divert my self that way; but it was so distastefull that solitude was less supportable: I called books to my relief, but in them I found nothing but good unprofitable Counsels: I went to hunt but I found that my weariness of body did nourish the distempers of my minde: In conclusion I resolved to let time cure that which nothing else would: But O Heavens, this remedy was long and tedious. All this while the innocent Amestris, she hearing no news of me, and seeing all her Letters sent back, gave over writing to me any more, and was in a very sad condition: Sometimes she imagined I was dead, but my Cozen understood from my Father that it was not so: They endeavoured, but in vain, to finde out the cause of my silence; and the innocence of Amestris was such as she could not guess at it: She had some fears that Megabises would render but an ill account unto me, and had told him some tales of her: But upon second thoughts she could not beleve him so base as to do such a vile act, nor me to be so weak as to beleve him since I was his Enemy and Rivall; so that there was no likelihood of any such thing; for he was too much a man of honour to use any such cheats: also he was going to live in a place where he could enjoy no fruits of his policy, since it was then known that his despair had carried him into those wars which were then up in Lidia: What did not then the amiable Amestris think? and of what crime did she not accuse the unfortunate Aglatidas? She thought him to be unconstant, that some new beauty and fresh passion had wrought a change in him, and upon that thought she would forget her sorrowes, and repent she had ever loved him: She told a hundred Stories against me and my Love, and did all she could to take that heart from me which she had given me; Menasta who loved Page 134 me very well, and who was returned out of the Countrey, was not able to excuse me, but she nourished all her angry thoughts against me: Indeed Sir, it might very well be said that we were both of us as unfortunate as we were innocent, In the mean time, he with whom Amestris lived, and who had a desire to pleasure Megabises, and who seeing that he was absent, also knowing that there were abundance which pretended unto Amestris, intended to take a Voyage in the Province Arisantines, where the greatest part of his Estate was, to take some order concerning urgent business there; for Sir, it was unknown at Court, whither I was retired, and this man did not know I was there. Amestris who could not endure the Court was much against her minde, and who desired to hide her sorrowes, was very glad of the motion, and much the more (as I heard since) because she hoped coming into that Province where I was, she might finde out the cause of my alteration, of which yet she was ignorant: In the mean time, as the absence of Megabises did facilitate the matter, my Father having obtained my favour with the King, commanded me to return unto Ecbatan, just at the same time when Amestris went out of it. I confess I received this news with sorrow, and should have been content to have continued longer in banishment: Yet notwithstanding I thought to tell things as they were, and seemed to beleve that my heart was sufficiently cured from fear of any more wounds at the sight of Amestris: I then returned unto Ecibatan and met her not, because she took another way: I cannot relate Sir what troubles my minde was in when I came near Ecbatan, when I entred into it, and passed by the Palace gate of Artambaces. I feared to meet Amestris, and I looked about me exactly in passing through all the streets: I would have deceived my self, and not known the place where she was: But alas, that I should know my self so little, and that I should be so ignorant of what was to come: I was no sooner lighted from my Horse, but I went to my Fathers chamber who received me with unexpressible joy: though he resented some sorrowes to see my face so altered as it was: for indeed Sir I was so much changed, that I doubted whether I should have been taken for my self: My Father at last told me that he had been so solicitous about the business which concerned my life, that he never thought of pressing forward the business of my marriage, because that might have too much incensed Megabises both unto love and unto revenge: Sir, said I unto him, you have done very well, for at the present, Marriage is a thing which I more fear then desire: My Father desired me to explain that Enigma, but I excused it, and went unto my old Chamber in a mighty melancholy. The next morning my Father carried me unto the King, who received me very well, and who would have reconciled the Family of Megabises and ours, but as for Megabises he was not yet returned unto Ecbatan. In going from the Court, I was not long alone, for the report of my return was no sooner divulged in Ecbatan, but many of my friends came to visit me: And since my Love unto Amestris was known unto every one; After the first compliments were passed Arbaban the Brother of Harpagus (whom the King had heretofore employed to destroy young Cyrus) who was in the Catalogue of my best friends, asked me if I did not meet the fair Amestris upon the way as I returned to Court: I blusht at the name of Amestris, and asked my friend whether Amestris was in Ecbatan or no; to which he answered, that questionless she was not: But here Sir, admire what Love can do! I was no sooner assured of her absence but I resented both joy and sorrow together: and my minde was so divided upon this occasion, as I could determine upon nothing: yet notwithstanding I think that if the ground of my heart had been well examined, I should have more desired her return to Ecbatan then rejoiced at her absence: not that I was fully resolved never to make the least shadow of Love unto her, but, not to disguise the matter, I did yet love her more then I thought I should: and it is the naturall quality of Love to desire the sight of the party loved: I reserved my minde so closely all the time of this converse, that I never was the first which spoke: I had a hundred desires, that every one should speak unto me of it, but I never durst speak of it my self: since I had no other confidants unto whom I durst open my Passions; but Artabes who now was dead, and Menasta who was gone with Amestris: I could not make misfortunes known unto them who already knew them not. Yet notwithstanding I altered my resolution, and Arbaban did so diligently seek my friendship, and enquired concerning the causes of my profound melancholy which appeared in my face, and all my actions, that I being moved by his affection and my own sorrowes, did acquaint him with the originall of my Love, with its progress and end; for sometimes I was so bold as to speak as if I were no more in Love. It chanced one day when we were both alone together, and discoursing of some Passages at Court, I took the heart to tell Arbaban that the time was when I loved Amestris; But Sir, in pronouncing these words I blusht: And Page 135 Arbaban, embracing me, said, Ah my dear Aglatidas, you do love still, your face does betray you, your heart has more sincerity then your tongue: I know not whether I love yet (said I unto him sighing) but I do know very well that I ought not to love her any longer, and more then that, I will not love her any longer. Love (answered he unto me) does not use to ask counsels of reason, nor desire the consent of our wills to subject us; The same violence which made it master of our hearts whether we would or no, can maintain it by the same waies: Love (said Arbaban) is not a lawfull King but a Tyrant, which does not more kindly use them who do not defend themselves, then they who will dispute with it for their liberty, and who will have the Sovereignty where it would reign: Whatsoever it can do (said I) whether I love Amestris or whether I love her not, she shall never have any more shews either of Love or hatred from me: You will soon change this Opinion (Replied he unto me:) There needs not many words to prove that every minute of your Life speaks Love unto her; all your Discourses, and all your actions do manifest that you will be always faithful unto her: your Passion of her is very lively painted in your eyes: for (said he, not giving me time to answer him) From whence else can this strange alteration which appears in your face, in your spirits, and in all your humours procede? from what causes can arise this profound melancholy, this Solitude which you prefer before all your friends; these continuall sighs; that indifferency wherewith you look upon all Court-diversions, from whence can these proceed but from your being in Love? I do not nor will not love Amestris any more (replied I) and I hate all the rest of the world besides, except Arbaban. And why do you hate them? (answered he) so many brave and gallant men, who do court you, and infinitely honour you? what will they do? what will so many fair and amiable Ladies as are in Ecban say? what has nature and they done that you should thus hate them? No no Aglatidas (continued he) deceive not your self, you do love Amestris and you do love her so much as you hate all the world besides: If you did not love her, doubtless you would not hate others, but would love them as all other grave men use to love them: If I did love Amestris (said I to him) I should have wished her return, and have known of her departure, and have resented it: This resentment (Replied he) is no less a mark of your Love then your wishes; for Amestris cannot be terrible unto you: you cannot fear her return but you must love her: Moreover (said he) what other ground can you finde for your Melancholy? You are beloved of all the world; you have a Father which consents unto any thing you desire; your quality is inferiour unto few; you are abundantly rich; you enjoy youth and health; you are of a compleat and handsome deportment (said he flatteringly) you have courage and reputation enough: What is it then Aglatidas that you want? Where is any ground for your Melancholy? The remembrance of my misfortunes (answered I) the remembrance of your misfortunes (replied he) should cause your joy when they are past: You had better have said your misfortunes do continue: But I beseech you (said he) what will make you happy? They must be things impossible (said I to him) nothing else but that Amestris had never been perfidious: What then (Replied Artaban) is your good fortune so inseparably annexed unto Amescris? Can you never be happy without Amestris? You are very urgent (said I to him) and I will answer you no more: Tell me you cannot answer, but at the same time confess that you are the most in love of any man in the world: But my Dear Aglatidas, (said Artaban) why do you conceal so great and dangerous a disease which can never be cured but by discovering it? I hide it (said he and changing colour) because I think it incurable; and if I did not infinitely love Artaban, I should not tell him as I do, that in despite of my reason and against my will, Amestris the perfidious Amestris does take up all my thoughts, and possesses my heart whether I will or no: As I left speaking, Artaban embracing me, began; Now (said he to me) you have told me your disease, I will endeavour to cure it: I beleieve you wish it (said I to him) but it is not so easie to do as to say it; for know Artaban, that though Amestris should repent her of her infidelity, and come to me with tears in her eyes, I could not yet be perfectly satisfied: the remembrance of what is past would keep me in continuall inquietude for the time to come; and I should possess a treasure which I should be in perpetuall fears to lose: As often as she gave me any obliging language, I should imagine that the same expressions were used in favour of my Rivall: And I could not respect the heart of Amestris otherwise then as a prophaned Altar: What if Amestris (said then Artaban) should with all her charms and beauty ask pardon for her weakness and change, would you refuse her? Ah cruell friend (said I to him) what delight can you take in persecuting me in lieu of preser|ving me? and telling me of such impossibilities? But if it should so happen (said he to me) Page 136 how would you use her? In spite of all my inquisitive jealousies which fills my heart, I think I should throw my self at her feet, and hearken unto her repentance, to assure her of my eternal love, and to require more exact fidelity from her, then hitherto she has ob|served. But alas, how far am I from that condition? But will you follow my counsel (said Artaban to me?) I will do any thing (said I to him) that would procure me some consolation. If so (said he) neglect not what I shall tell you, and know, that considering the state of your soul, I have found an infallible remedy, either to make Amestris give you full satisfaction, or else to rid you of your passions to her. If I should hearken unto Reason (said I unto him) I should rather chuse the second then the first; but if I hearken unto my own heart, I should prefer the first before the second. Know then (said Artaban unto me) since Love is so noble a Passion, as nothing can recompense it but it self; and is so powerfull, that nothing can overcome it but its own forces: you must love, to make Love cease; and the hatred which commonly succeeds that Love, is but Love disguised under an appearance of anger; which is more dangerous then if it appeared in its natural colours. In short, Aglatidas (said he to me) you must cure one Passion with another; and to make you leave loving Amestris, you must love another Beauty. Alas (replied I then) how easie a matter it is for Artaban to give such counsel, and how hard it is for Aglatidas to follow it? But (answered he me) the Remedy which I will tell you shall be easie, and not so impossible as you think it: Truly, said he, as long as you remain in this kinde of solitude wherein you now live, it will not be an easie matter for you to engage your self in any new love: But you ought to look upon those which may entangle you; you must expose your self unto the waves, and throw your self into the Sea, to avoid shipwrack: The disease is so dangerous, and the physick so extraordinary, that you must almost die in hopes to live the longer. But do you believe (said I to him) that it is possible that I should not only love any other Beauty, but that I can endure it? You may questionless if you will (answered he); but at the first you must only feign a love of some other, and perhaps it will at length become a real Love. If it do come to pass, that you do love another, then you'll jeer at the inconstancy of Ame|stris; and if it do not come to that pass, yet at the least, it will be a handsome revenge for the injuries you have received. Perhaps, said he, this fiction may bring your Mistris unto some reasonable tearms; and her jealousy may give you that your love could not bring about. This Remedy, said I to him, is very dangerous, very uncertain, and very difficult; for you say, that perhaps I shall love, and perhaps I shall not love another; perhaps I may revenge my self; perhaps Amestris will see her error. In a word, all is grounded upon perhaps'es; that is to say, upon little or nothing; and I see so much uncertainty in this remedy, that I cannot think it good. Will you have another, said he to me? I have one, said I to him, which is infallible, and that is death, which will doubtless rid me from all my sorrows. That is the last Remedy which you must use (answered Artaban) and it must never be made use of, but when all others have failed. In conclusion, Sir, what Arguments soever he could use, I could not consent unto him that day: But a while after, hearing that Amestris was to return, he did so importune me to follow his counsel, as I resolved to follow this counsel, though it went much against the strain of my mind. There was then in the Court a Lady called Anatisa, one indeed of great merit and beauty, yet one whose beauty had never made many conquests, and was doubtless far less fair then Amestris; yet fair enough: Chance would have it so, that the same day whereon I had consented to try the remedy which Artaban had prescribed, I found her in the walks of the Garden in the Palace, where I had not of a long time been, because I had shunned company as much as possible: And as I neither had nor could have any particular inclination unto any, nor had any liberty to chuse in a time when none but Amestris could please me. Chance, I say, making me meet Anatisa sooner then another, I did not refuse dis|course with her, as I was used to do with all other Ladies, since my return to Ecbatan; I mean as much as civility would permit me: I spake then unto that Lady divers times that day; and although our discourse was upon nothing but upon very indifferent things, she thought her self much obliged to me, because I had done more unto her then unto any other Lady since my return to Court. And certainly it was advantagious to me, that the solitude wherein I had lived, did help me to perswade the world unto that which I would have it believe; else doubtless it had not been so easie for me to deceive it, as it deceived it self, and likewise if Anatisa had not helped me to delude it: For Sir, I did not think that the complacency which this fair Lady rendred me, was any effect of my merit; but on the contrary, I plainly saw it had a reflexion from Amestris, it being most certain that Anatisa would not have treated me so favourably as she did, but that she conceived it did redound Page 137 much unto her honour, that the man who had formerly loved the fairest Beauty of the World, should quit those fetters to be captivated in hers. This petty jealousy of Beauty, caused Anatisa then to treat me with all possible civility; and I finding so much facility to execute what Artaban advised me unto, did transact as he would have me: Not Sir, that I could ever resolve to tell Anatisa that I loved her, as well because in very truth I had no such passion in me, as because I thought it did too much trespass upon the Laws of Gene|rosity; yet my manner of living with her did tell the Court as much, and likewise told the thoughts of Anatisa the same, for I did visit her very oft, I almost spoke unto none but her, I appeared very melancholy and disordered; so that all the world took these things to be effects of a fresh passion. Anatisa, on the other side, did see that I was chained unto her society, and that I did upon all occasions which were offered, commend her; that I refused the company of all other women but she; and that in our Discourses I did often appear as if I were a little frantick, not knowing what I would say. But alas, all these which she took to be effects of my love to her, were onely effects of that which I bore unto Ame|stris, how perfidious soever she seemed to be unto me. Really, I did sometimes repent the following of Artaban's counsel, and all others also, when I began firmly to resolve of lo|ving Anatisa, and to banish Amestris from my heart and memory. Change, change, (said I to my self) this feigned Passion unto a real one, and be no longer faithful unto one that hath betrayed me; do not betray one that has nothing in her but sincerity for me. 'Tis true, Anatisa is not so fair as Amestris, yet perhaps she will love me more faithfully: Tell her then that thou lovest her (said I to my self) although thou yet dost not; so that being obliged by Generosity not to lie, thou maist no longer remain in any fears of returning unto inconstant Amestris, or to ever see her, or speak unto her, when she returns, as they say she will. This thought, Sir; did so fortisie it self in my minde, that I went three or four daies together unto Anatisa, with intentions to tell her I loved her, but some intervenient passage or other hindred me from executing them; but when I found the opportunity, not|withstanding all my determinate resolutions, I was dumb when I was about to speak unto her; I diverted the discourse, my tongue would not obey, my heart revolted against my will, my will it self altered and was unsettled; and indeed, not desiring that which I desired but one moment before, I dejected my eyes as being equally ashamed of what I did, and what I would have done. But, Oh Heavens, that which should have destroyed me in the opinion of Anatisa, did confirm me; for she supposing that the love and reverence which I bore unto her, had caused all these disorders which she discovered in my minde, she did treat me more kindly, and would not see it. All the Court Sir, beleieved I was in love with Anatisa; one of my Cousins did write as much unto Menasta, who, as I have told you, was with Amestris; but this Lady who writ, did mention it very obscurely, knowing that such news would be resented with sorrow, and therefore she would not plainly tell it, untill she came to Ecbatan to see it. Mean time, I heard of two things together which much grieved me; the one was, That Amestris would presently come back; and the other, That Megabises would very shortly be in Town; This business which fell out onely by accident, did seem unto me a thing agreed upon; and I did absolutely conclude, that the voyage of Amestris was caused by the absence of Megabises, though I could not guess at the reason. But as jealousy al|waies inclines more unto that which will augment it self, then that which would lessen it, I did not busie my self to reason the matter, from whence I might perhaps draw some conjectures unto my advantage, but I sought out those conjectures which would more torment me. They return, said I, to triumph over my miseries before my eyes; and they can|not esteem themselves happy, unless I be the witness of their felicities. However, perfidious Amestris, you shall not have so much satisfaction, as to think that I am unhappy; I will carry the matter so with Anatisa, as you shall not so much as suspect that I love you. But as for you Megabises, never hope to enjoy your conquest quietly, for though I will prettend no more unto her, yet I will take away the enjoyment from thee, in taking away thy life, or at least dispute it unto the last minute of my life. These tumultuous thoughts being a little appeased, I had some comfort to think, that Amestris should believe I was in love with Anatisa; and I was for a certain time so closely with her, as I my self did wonder at it. In the mean while Amestris came to Town, and Menasta was much confirmed in her be|lief of my new passion; yet notwithstanding, she would speak with me before she would absolutely condemn me; and she quickly found the opportunity; for indeed, as she was my Cousin, I was in civility obliged to give her a visit, which with much ado I resolved upon; yet I would not go alone: but do what I could, she spoke unto me particularly of it. Page 138 Is it possible (said she to me) that what I hear can be true? Can any man who has been so happy, as not to be hated by Amestris, think upon loving Anatisa? Amestris (said I unto her) has not thought Aglatidas worthy of her; and I do not know Menasta, whether she or I has made the worse choice: She perhaps did that out of weakness or an humour, which I have done out of Reason, and to be revenged on her. But Menasta, let us talk no more on or her; she was alwaies your friend, and I my self believed she concealed it from you, to be|tray me. It must needs be (answered she) that she has kept it secret, if it be true that she be|trayed you, for I never knew of it; but I confess, I have much ado to be perswaded of the truth. I have had more to do (replied I;) and if I my self had not been a witness of her infidelity, if I had not with my own eyes seen her perfidious Treason, I should never have believed it; no, though you your self should have assured me of it: But as I would not have believed you, so you your self would have spoke against her; nor do I think that you will justifie her now. No, no, Menasta, speak no more on it, Amestris has betrayed me, and I have left her; she has not thought me worthy of her affection, and I have not thought her worthy of mine; though, setting her infidelity aside, she is the admiration of all the Earth; and since she either hates or scorns me, I am dispensed from that fidelity which I promised unto her. I confess, said Menasta, if she be culpable you are not to be much bla|med: But however, you are to blame; for did you ever complain unto Amestris? have you ever accused her? did you ever give her time to justifie her self, or to repent of it? Complaints, said I, are requisite, when the Crime of the party beloved is in any doubt, or when it is so small, as a Confession may wipe it off: But when the offence is of such a nature as that is which I have received, complaints do but procure new matter to be again deceived: Spare therefore your pains unto Amestris (said I) and move her not to confess a thing which she cannot confess without confusion, as anticipated as she is in the Love which she posses|seth. Menasta was so surprised to hear me speak so, as she could not answer; for since Amestris never told her of any converse which she had with Megabises, she could not imagine any other colour of complaint which I could have: she thought, that to excuse my in|constancy, I had supposed a Crime whereof she was innocent, as appeared by her eyes, and that I was much more culpable than she. That which confirmed her in her opinion, was the disorder which she had observed in my minde; not doubting, but that the disorder was grounded upon my being ashamed of my weakness, and upon this change which I had made; yet notwithstanding, being desirous to augment it, I do assure you (said she) that during all this voyage which Amestris hath made, there was not one Lover which could com|mend her for her indulgency towards him, nor brag of any favour. I do not doubt it (an|swered I) for

she is more faithful unto him whom she has preferred before me. But who is that so happy Lover of Amestris (replied she in anger) that Menasta should not know him? Since you would have a secret of it (said I unto her) I will have so much respect unto her, as not to reveal what I know, and help her to hide that which cannot but be too much published, and of which within this little time you will make no doubt of. As we were upon these terms, there came in so much company, that our discourse could not continue longer, and I went from Menasta in a doubled perplexity: For said I, if Amestris were within the compass of repentance, her soul would have confessed some part of her weakness, or at least would have found out some handsome pretence and excuse for it: But in denying all, it renders her culpable of all; and since so, I have nothing to do but to revenge my self: Revenge then, said I, the real infidelity of Amestris, by a feigned infidelity. I will render my diligence unto Anatisa, though I cannot render her my heart; I will punish her by this bad choice, and neglect nothing that may satisfy my resentment, though I cannot satisfy my love. Mean while Menasta, who was really incensed against me, and thinking none would tell Amestris of my new Passion, thought fit to tell her of it, and went unto her that same evening. She was not the first who brought her the news; for amongst so many as did visit her, there was some who out of malice or simplicity had told her of that thing, wherein all the world knew she had so much interest. Menasta found her very sad; for Sir, to make you understand my misfortune the better, I am constrained to acknowledge, that Amestris did love me, and loved me with such tender affection, as I cannot yet think upon it, without extreme joy, and extreme sorrow, and strange confusion both together. She no sooner saw Menasta, but she made it evident by her melancholy, that she was acquainted with my new Passion, yet at the first she spoke onely of indifferent things. Menasta for her part, not knowing well where or how to begin so vexatious a discourse, nor knew well what she should say, did answer her with half broken off words. But in the end, the adorable Amestris Page 139 not being able to hide her resentments any longer, asked her whether she had seen me? and whether my new love was so strong as to make me forget my Civilities unto her? I have seen him (answered she) but I have seen him so deprived of reason, that I would no longer acknowledge him for my kinsman, nor believe that it was Aglatidas, whom I formerly knew, and so much esteemed. Indeed (said she to her) he courts Anatisa, he follows her every where, and I think he really loves her. But although this Crime be too great, yet it is not that which animates me most against him, for those who are naturally weak and inconstant, do deserve rather compassion then reproaches, since they do no more then what they can not help: But Aglatidas would excuse his fault by laying it upon you; this is that which I cannot endure, and this is that which I thought fit to tell you, to the end that you may punish his folly and ingratitude by your hatred and scorn. What (said Amestris) doth Aglatidas accuse me of any thing? Yes, replied Menasta, he saies that you have betrayed him; he saies he saw it with his own eyes, that he cannot doubt of it; and that your new choice is more unreasonable then his: Indeed (said she) I can say no more, but that he is full of folly and malice both. Amestris was so surprised at the story, that her Soul, as great as it was, could not choose but tremble; she changed colour, tears stood in her eyes, and her wisdom had much ado to restrain them. If she called to minde the love which I professed unto her, and the reverence wherewith I served her, she considered my change as an unrepairable loss: If she remembered the goodness which she used to me, she could not enough condemn my ingratitude: If she considered the Fidelity which she constantly preserved for me, she abhorred my perfidy: And if she observed the difference which was between Anatisa and her self, she could not but be astonish'd at my weakness and blindness. But upon the whole matter she must needs conclude me capable of both, and she could not possibly doubt of it. Menasta did assure me afterwards, that the wrong which I did unto her Beauty, in preferring one who was in all things so much inferior to her, did not so sensibly move her, as the wrong which I did unto her Virtue, in accusing her of inconstancy. What, said she, does Aglatidas take from me that heart which he had given me? Will he neither love me, nor see me? And has he forgot all his Obligations which were upon him for suffering him to manifest his Passions? But for all this, I will punish my self without anger, and perhaps I will cheer up my self by reason. But Menasta, that he should excuse his own imbecilities by accusing me, this is a thing which is above my Patience; and makes evident unto me, that Love is a most dangerous Passion: For truly, did he ever meet with any more excusable then I, or more innocent? I loved Aglatidas it is true, but I loved him not onely because he loved me, but because my Parents did believe him to be a man of wisdom and judgement, and that he had all the qualities requisite to be in a compleat man. Moreover, might I not well believe, that Fortune having made me rich enough, his own interest might move him unto that which my mean Beauty could not? And whether it was Love or Ambition which he was sensible of, I might well hope he would be faithful. Yet it seems I was deceived in my conjectures, and I was ignorant that he could not love any thing. But alas, said she, is it not in our power, when Innocence and Reason has planted Love in my heart, to finde a means to root it out? Yet it must be, added she, and I am so fully resolved, that I cannot hope to bring it to pass. In short, Sir, the adorable Amestris being not well at peace in her self, could not resolve what to do; and she designed the next day to take some solitary walk with her dear Confident, and endeavour to settle her resolutions upon the business, and to shun the conversation of all indifferent people, who as the state stood with her soul, did but importunately trouble her. They went the next day unto the Garden, whither very few used to resort, and where Artaban by accident did meet them; he no sooner saw them, but he had a great curiosity to understand their discourse; to that end, he hid himself behind a thick hedge, and following them by the eye, he saw them sit down in a green Arbor. Thither he went, shading himself by the boughs of a great tree which hung down, and there couched himself behind a little bush of Myrhe, which was close by the Arbor; he was no sooner settled, but he understood that Menasta answered un|to something which Amestris had said, and which he could not understand: No, no, said she to her, you must not take revenge upon your self, it is fit that Aglatidas alone should bear the burden of his Crime. Do not confound Innocency and culpable together: Hate Aglatidas if you can, and do not punish Amestris who is in no fault. Amestris (replied this lovely Lady) not being able to hate where she loves, what would you have her do? and why should she not think her self as culpable, for loving where she should hate, as Aglatidas is for hating where he ought eternally to love? After this, these two Ladies [Page 140 began to discourse upon that which might have given me the boldnesse to accuse Amestris; for (said Menasta) what likelihood is there that without any pretence or colour, he should be so inconsiderate? Amestris reflecting upon what Menasta said, began to tell her that which she knew not before, to wit, the converse which she had with Megabises; but (added she) if Aglatidas had been present at it, he would rather have thanked me then complained: but he was far off, and Megabises for his part, being ever since in Lidia, could not inform him any thing: No No, said Menasta, that cannot be the cause, for he did not so much as name Megabises unto me, and without all question if it had been he, Aglatidas would have named him to me, and spoke of him: so that it must be concluded, that he being ashamed of his weakness, was forced to fly unto this imposture, thereby to excuse him|self when he spoke unto me: Truly those who commit crimes, said she, do severely punish themselves in committing them; and had you seen how restless and unquiet Aglatidas was when he spoke unto me, you would have consented unto it: That which does most wonder me, said Amestris unto her, is, that when we were in the Province of Arisantines, we did understand that Aglatidas seemed alwaies to be melancholy: If his change had chanced since his return to Ecbatan, then I must needs conclude, that out of a capricious humour, or else out of reason, he has preferred the beauty of Anatisa before that of Amestris; But I conceive Menasta, that his change took beginning during his exile, in a time when he received most testimonies of affection from me, for I writ unto him, and that in a most obliging manner: But after all this (said Menasta) what do you intend to do? I intend (said he) to punish my self for my misfortune, To lament it eternally, To repent me of my weakness, and strive to forget Aglatidas, though perhaps it is not in my power; and to leade a close and more unhappy life then ever any did. But (Replied Menasta) I had rather you would take into your consideration one of these two important courses: The first is, that if you cannot perswade your self to hate Aglatidas, then to try all possible means that may bring him unto reason: The second is, that if you can bring your self to hate him, then to punish him severely for his crime: Alas, Alas, Replied Amestris, how difficult a thing is to hate where one hath resolved to love all their life long, and how hard it is to punish where one loves: I have one infallible way (said Menasta) but by the way you may admire Sir the odd destiny of things in this world; for Menasta did propound the very same way unto Amestris, which Artaban had propounded unto me: to wit, that she should feign to entertain some one of her pretenders very kindly: for said this Lady unto her, I have ever known Aglatidas to be extream sensible of honour, so that when he plainly sees that his mutability has put Amestris into a capacity of preferring another before him, then one of these two things will come to passe, that is, he will either forsake Anatisa, and return unto Amestris, or else at the least he will be sufficiently tormented in his heart; Moreover, who knows but that by permitting your self to be loved, you may come to cease loving him? Love for ought I understand (said he) is never cured by contrary remedies, nor by any violent applications; Time and reason by more insensible waies brings many things to passe, therefore if you will believe me follow my advice; It conduceth much unto your honor (added she) that the world shall not suspect you ever loved Aglatidas; and to prevent it you must do as I advise: This last consideration was very forcible upon the soul of Amestris; who after much other discourse, resolved to take my counsell. In the mean time Artaban who was ravished to hear the discourse of these two Ladies, did gently steal away without being perceived; going in haste unto all places where he thought to finde me, but as my ill fortune was he could not finde me: After he had in vain sought me at the Court, in the Palace-Gardens, and at Anatisa's Lodging, he resolved to stay till night when I should return, not imagining that the ignorance of what he knew could be of that importance as to be so prejudicial unto me: But O Heavens, how fatal it was unto me? and how many sighs did that journey which I then took cost me? I have already told you Sir, that the Garden where Amestris was is a very solitary place, where very few people use to walk: But all ill Fortunes conspired together to afflict me, and to make me the most unhappy man upon earth. Anatisa, prompted by my evil destinies, designing to walk with some of her friends, made choice of that place because she had never seen it; and I did particularly chuse it that I might there enjoy my sad thoughts, because I did verily think not to meet Amestris there, nor Anatisa, nor any thing that might interrupt my musing contemplations: But Sir I was wonderfully surprised, when in entering into the Garden, I saw Amestris afar off walking with her dear Menasta, and at the same time I saw Anatisa at the the foot of an Arbour, composing some flowers which she had gathered: This unexpected sight did much trouble me, and so surprised me that I stopt upon a sudden: I Page 141 knew not whether I should apply my self unto her whom I loved and had betrayed me; or to her who loved me and whom I betrayed: I stood in such an anxiety as I could not resolve nor can express: I was in a minde to go unto Amestris, and my jealousies did almost submit unto my Love; I thought to go and throw my self at her feet without regarding Anatisa; But her crime coming fresh into my memory, I altered that determination, and began to incline towards Anatisa; yet I made my approach so gentle, and was so unwilling to turn from Amestris, that I was in a minde to go unto neither, but to sink down under the load of my sorrows; yet my disdain driving me out of an extream anxiety into an invincible obstinacy: I regarded not Amestris, but went unto Anatisa, unto whom I spoke as I was accustomed: But yet I acted it with such distraction of spirits, as that if this Lady had not been distracted her self with observing the actions of Amestris, she might easily have perceived the cause of my inquietude; But she was wrapt into such an extasie of joy to see her self preferred before the Fairest Lady in the world, as she neither minded the alteration in my countenance, nor the obscurity of my words. Amestris (as since I heard) now seeing that her self which before she had heard only by reports, was extraordinarily surprised: Until now, this adorable Lady resented only sorrow for my change, but now, seeing with her own eyes, Aglatidas at the feet of Anatisa, her anger began to rowse up her spirits: and a secret resentment of honor did infuse into her so great a desire to be revenged for the scorn which I offered unto her, as she could not forbear to testifie as much unto Menasta. Here Sir may be admired the prodigious accident which chance only brought about in this business: I think, I told you how Megabises was to return within a few daies; and after he had been in the wars of Lidia, he resolved to returned unto Ecbatan, and never thought to call me unto any account, neither for the death of his Brother whereof he knew I was culpable, nor for any other of our ancient differences. The King did send unto him to forbid him absolutely, after the reconciliation which was made between our Families, and had commanded me to quarrell no more, but to shun meeting as much as possible, it being but just to have respect unto a man whose Brother I had killed: Megabises came into the Town in the night that he might be more particularly informed in the state of things before he received any visits; and resolved to pass away the rest of the day in the Garden where I was, knowing it the least frequented, and where also was Amestris and Anatisa; Megabises then who knew him un|to whom the Garden belonged, entered into it as soon as he lighted from horse, and at the very same instant when Amestris being transported with anger to see me with Anatisa, did say unto Menasta that she had good reason to counsell her to punish me: Megabises entering in confidently, was infinitely surprised to see both his Mistress and his Rivall in that place: But he was more amazed to see me not with Amestris; yet Sir, since Megabises had not seen her since the time he promised to see her or speak to her no more, I would make it known unto her by his respect that he had not forgotten to keep his word; so that after he had made her a most low reverence, he retired and would have gone out of the Garden; But Amestris whose spirit was highly incensed, and thinking it a fit occasion to be revenged, called him unto her, and received him with much civility: This afforded him as much joy as me sorrow: For Sir, I saw Megabises enter; I observed how he would have gone away, and she to stay him; I supposed that he offered to go away because he saw me there: And I doubted not but that Amestris knowing of his coming, came thither purposely to meet him: I leave you Sir to guess at the trouble of my soul, and the agitation of my minde: For my part I never think upon the condition wherein we were, but I wonder at the capricious humour of Fate: For Anatisa was wrapt up into the height of joy to see her self prefer'd before Amestris by Aglatidas, who neither preferred her nor loved her: Megabises for his part he was infinitely glad to be called back by her who had for ever banished him, though she which called him back did it not out of any affection she bore unto him: onely Amestris and my self, who if we had rightly understood one another, had been the happiest of all, we were the most perplexed souls upon earth: Mean time, though Megabises thought himself very happy in being with Amestris, yet the remembrance of his brothers death, and the sight of him who killed him, did so reflect upon his heart as he had no good minde to be where I was: Madam (said he unto Amestris) I should make a doubt whether the command which I received from the King could work so prevalently upon my spirit as to hinder me from my just resentments against a man whom I see before me, if the respect which I owe unto you did not restrain me; Therefore Madam, fear lest this respect should not be strong enough to resist the apprehensions of blood and nature, I most humbly beseech you to pardon my incivility, and give me leave to leave you: Upon those words he made a very low reverence Page 142 unto Amestris, and without staying for any answer he went out of the Garden; She who only staid him to anger me was not forward to retain him: As for me Sir who never understood what they said, I no sooner saw him gone, but I was in as great a chafe as I was to see him enter, imagining that he only went out to disguise the appointment which Amestris had given him. Not being to stay where I was, and thinking I should better hide my perplexity in walking then staying there, I proposed a departure unto Anatisa, who consented unto it: But she, more out of vanity then complacency, would needs, do what I could, go unto Amestris, thinking it would be a Triumph unto her to carry her slave whether she pleased: Then we went to meet Amestris and Menasta, and as we came near one another, Anatisa, not telling me her design, began to speak unto Amestris, whereat I was so angry that I was in a minde to leave her, and be gone from that place where the object of my love and the object of my hatred were together: I neither durst nor would look upon Amestris, I wished with all my heart that Megabises were there that I might fight with him: Sometimes I thought Amestris lesse fair, and Anatisa more: But O Heavens, that sometimes was quickly over, and I thought Anatisa ugly, and Amestris Angelike fair: yet Anatisa who as I told you, would needs triumph, and better assure her self of her Conquest, spoke very spitefully unto Amestris; and in accosting her, I am very happy (said she unto her) to meet such good company in a place which is used to be very solitary, and I have reason to think my self so, since expecting only the pleasure of the walk, I have met also with the delight of company; My company (answered Amestris very coldly) is so far from pleasant, that you have rather cause to complain, if you had not some other to divert you. If you should put to Judges (replied Anatisa maliciously) I am sure Megabises who I saw with you would not be of your minde; and as for Aglatidas, he is no competent Judge, for he would give sentence in my behalf: As for my part (said I in a great confusion) I do not doubt but Megabises findes Amestris to be incomparable in all things; and I confess (said I changing colour) that he has good cause to publish, that the conversation of Amestris is the most complacentiall of any in the world when she pleaseth: Ah Madam (replied Anatisa, who was ravished with joy to see such signs of anger in the face of Amestris) be not now of that humour, and be pleased to suffer all those commendations which I will give you: I deserve so little (answered she) that I will not advise you to employ your time to so little purpose. There is a kinde of humility (replied Anatisa) which honour will not admit of: Yes (replied Amestris) and there is also a kinde of false humour, which covers oftentimes abundance of baseness: I suppose (answered Anatisa) that neither you nor I are guilty of either: I know nothing (replied Amestris) for none do know themselves verry well: It is much more hard (said I unto her) to know the thoughts of another, especially of those (replied she) who do counterfeit to be generous and sincere, but indeed are not so; I am confident (said the malicious Anatisa) that Megabises cannot disguise his thoughts; Those who like him (answered Amestris thinking to spight me) do affect true honour, do never use to do so: there is none but base men use to dissemble their thoughts. I confess unto you Sir, that I was infinitely perplexed to hear Amestris thus express her self, that I could not possibly stay any longer in that place: As I came not into Garden with Anatisa, I thought my self not engaged to stay with her: Furthermore I was not in a condition to observe an exact correspondency in my actions. I had seen Megabises pleased so well, I observed Anatisa so well content, I saw Amestris so fierce, contrary to her custome; and I found my self so sad, so angry, and so desperate, that at last being stirred by my Love, my hate, and my Jealousie: I left this both dear and intollerable company: I went then out of the Garden with an ill intent, resolving to be revenged upon Megabises, for all the wrongs that Amestris had done me: And to that end in lieu of entring into the Town, I went to conceal my self in the house of one of my acquaintance, with intention to send the next day unto Megabises, to meet me with his Sword. I would not advertise Artaban of my design, because I knew he would contradict it; but alas, I did not know that I should have been the happiest man upon earth, if I had seen him, whereas now I am the most unfortunate. In the mean while, Amestris who had not treated Megabises so well, but only to anger me, had no sooner lost the sight of me, but not being able to endure the company of her Rivall, she thought out a pretence to leave her, and went to complain of her misfortune in secret unto her dear Menasta. As for Megabises it may be said, that his good fortune was but a flash and away; which ending as soon as it begun made it more dusky and intollerable then before. And as for Anatisa, though her joys to be preferred before Amestris did last a little longer, yet it was but to torment her more sensibly afterwards. For my part Sir, I never thought my self Page 143 so unhappy as now I found my self: At the first time when I saw Amestris favourable unto Megabises, I had this advantage as that she took a little pains to delude me; she knew not that I saw her; and at that time when she spoke unto him so mildly, she did not write roughly unto me: I might then think that her heart was divided, and that he did not so absolutely possess it, but that there might be a corner of it for me: Moreover, he then saw her to bid her adieu: but now, doubtlesse he came not with any intention to leave her, and Amestris was certain in the Garden staying for him: She now saw me before he came in, and cared not whether or no I was a witness, since she did not go away before he came: As for Megabises he would be something more discreet, he seemed to have no desire to stay when he had discovered me; but she did most cruelly call him back to spight me; she looked upon me with anger, but upon him with sweetnesse, and commended him before my face: She (I say) who heretofore made profession of such austere vertue, she who denied me her affection so obstinately, she who was so severe and rigorous unto me: How comes it to passe Amestris (said I) that you have thus changed your humour? But however, I must be so bold as to trouble your felicity as well as you have done mine, and though my respects be such as I will not revenge my self directly upon you, yet you shall give me leave to be revenged upon Megabises: See Sir, how I did draw poison out of the most innocent things; and how I interpreted all the actions of Amestris; who for her part did as much upon mine, and who determined to be revenged upon me in a most cruell manner: But Sir, I must tell you before-hand, that he with whom Amestris lived, being bribed unto it by Otanus, did no longer take the part of Megabises for her, and did continually persecute her, to the end that he might bring her unto that passe as to preferre Riches, before all other things in the world, and never to consider the good or the bad qualities of him whom she was to marry: Moreover, Artaban not finding me went to her, but her minde was not for any conversation, therefore she left me alone with Menasta in her chamber, and shut her self in her closet. Then Sir, the discourse between these two was only upon me: Menasta, who knew that Artaban was my Confident, did so press him, as he acknowledged that it was a terrible jealousy which had taken me off from the service of Amestris: but do what she could, she could scree no more out of him; for since he was to meet with me at night, therefore he would not discover any more unto her, least I should perhaps not allow of it. His visit continued not long with Menasta, because he did sit upon thorns untill he had discourse with me: He was no sooner gone but she went unto Amestris in her closet, who was retired thither under pretence of writing some Letters of importance: She told her how after much other discourse Artaban had confessed that it was a horrid jealousy which caused my change. How (answered Amestris) Aglatidas extremely jealous? Good Gods, how is it possible he can be so? What cause have I given him? Which of his Rivals is it that I have favoured so much as to give him any colour or cause of change? Has any observed any such complacency in me? Have I sought out any occasions to see and be seen? Have I held any private discourse with any one? Have I been a frequenter of any suspected walks? Have I received any secret letters or writ any? Is there any one that can vaunt of any favour received from Amestris, except the perfidious Aglatidas? Indeed Menasta what have I done? what have I said? or what have I so much as thought, which can excuse his inconstancy? for my part (said she) I never knew the like jealousy to this; But I pray tell me; suppose I could learn the ground and commencement of it, what can I do to help it? I must certainly never look upon any, but mew upon my self eternally; How is it possible, in a great Court, in a populous Town, where I am seen by all the world, and where I see with equall indifferency all those who come to me, that I should ever finde out who it is which causeth his inquietude? For perhaps it is Andramias, perhaps Araspes, perhaps Megabises, and perhaps the King: How should I then help it Menasta? How should I cure him if I would? It must needs be confessed (answered my cozen) that Aglatidas has carried it very ill: Say (said Amestris) that he has lost his reason, in losing that esteem which he ought unto me; for considering how I have carried my self unto him, he ought never to have made an ill interpretation of my actions, or suspected them, nor beleevved any thing against me, though his own eyes had perswaded him unto it. Must inconstancy be a consequent of jealousy? For my part, I think that jealousy makes men unhappy, but I do not believe that it ought to make them perfidious: That Aglatidas, because he thinks no sincerity in my words, will not see me, nor love me any more, but hate me, I do not blame him: I look upon his hatred as a consequent of his violent love unto me; but that Aglatidas as soon as he thinks that I do not esteem him, should at the very same instant have a soul sensible of a Page 144 fresh new passion; this Menasta is a thing which cannot be. If he had loved me very well, what cause of complaint soever I had given him, it was impossible but he should love me yet, or at least not hate me; and it is more impossible (if I may say it) that he can so soon love Anatisa. Ha, said she, whosoever should have told me heretofore, that I should see Aglatidas come into a place where I was, and leave me to go unto Anatisa, I should not have beleevved it: Yet it was injustice (not to speak of love) after he had seen me this last time, entertaining thoughts very advantageous for him, to accost me in so offensive a manner; Could he not have restrained Anatisa from coming to me? Might he not have shun'd the meeting? No, no, said she unto Menasta, he would not, but he on the contrary had a desire to put my patience unto the most vigorous Test: I know, added she, that at the last he quitted the company, and went alone out of the Garden; but it was confusion and anger, not repentance which drove him away; he was ashamed of his crime, but he had not so much vertue as to disingage himself: So that after all this, though he should have repented, yet I should not have been satisfied. But (said Menasta unto her interrupting her) what do you resolve upon? I will (answered she with a quite altered complexion) never think upon Aglatidas any more, and so carry the matter, that he shall whether he will or no think eternally upon Amestris: I will make him acknowledge his own crime by the thought of my innocency, and that he shall know my innocency by my misfortune: I must make him see that I never loved any but him, and that I have been ever faithfull unto him: But in letting him see it, it shall be done after such a fashion, that he shall get nothing by it. If he do not repent of his fault, said she, I shall punish him for loving, and if he do repent, then I shall punish him for betraying me, and punish him according to his desert. I do confess (said Menasta to her) I cannot easily devise what kinde of revenge it is that you have contrived: It is so strange a one (answered Amestris) that I dare hardly tell it, least you should divert me from it either by your reasons, or your prayers. But how can you make him certainly see that you have continued faithfull, since you do not know what it is which hath made him jealous? 'Tis true indeed, replied Amestris, I do not know the cause of his jealousy, but I do know him who is not the cause of his jealousy; and that shall serve me, both for my Justification, for my Revenge, and for my Punishment all in one: Menasta hearing her speak so, and finding little sense in her obscure words, was very urgent with her, to explain her self, and did oftentimes assure her that she would not contradict her intentions, untill at length she told her: You are not ignorant (said she to her) neither you Menasta, nor the inconstant Aglatidas, what an extream aversion I have ever had against Otanus, notwithstanding all his wealth and quality; for I have told you both a hundred and a hundred times, that for all his Riches and condition he is the man whom of all the world I do most scorn and hate: You know also, said she, that he has loved me ever since the first day I came to Ecbatan; and that I have hated him ever since the first minute I saw him: Know then Menasta, that before I will in any part reclaim the perfidious Aglatidas, I will obey my kinsman who is my Guardian, that is, I will marry Otanus, who is the ill-favoureddest man alive, and thereby make Aglatidas see whether I ever loved any of his Rivals: What, said Menasta, will you marry Otanus? Yes, answered Amestris, I will marry him, and I cannot make choice of a greater punishment wherewith to afflict my self for loving Aglatidas, and also to chastise Aglatidas for betraying me: This is the way Menasta, said she, whereby I will both justifie and revenge my self, although I do not know him whom Aglatidas thinks to be my partner in my crime: By this course I shall be sure to cure Aglatidas of his jealousy: for indeed Otanus has so many defects that I am sure I cannot deceive my self, it being absolutely impossible that Aglatidas should have been jealous of him. Ah Amestris, said Menasta then, Do not confound innocency and crime together; punish Aglatidas alone, but do not punish Amestris; rather marry Megabises, and believe that you will be sufficiently revenged of my perfidious kinsman that way: No Menasta, said she, that which you propose is not just; that way would be a revenge upon my self, and not upon Aglatidas; for Megabises is handsome enough to make Aglatidas think that I loved him; so that if it were so that ever he loved me, he would then quit that passion, and stick close unto his dear Anatisa: Then indeed he had some ground to believe that I might love a man who indeed was worthy of it: But when he shall see that I have chosen one for a husband, whom he knows certainly I could never love, then perhaps his heart, as perfidious and inconstant as it is will repent it of its fault: But it shall be an unprofitable repentance, for when I have married Otanus, I will then be as faithful unto him, as if I did love him, and as if he were the most accomplished man of the world: Ha heavens (said Menasta interrupting Page 145 her) take good heed what you say. Can you have such a resolution (or to give it a fitter phrase) can you be so inhumane unto your self, as to expose your self unto the greatest of misfortunes? Do you think, that you can all your life long endure the presence of a man whose conversation has glutted you in one single hour? I cannot endure it doubtless (answered Amestris) the torment which I shall endure will justify me yet in the mind of Aglatidas; and after I have in that manner cleared my self, my death immediately and infallibly following, will beget such a torment also in his soul, as shall never extinguish: If there were any other way to justify my self, then perhaps I should not take this: But upon the whole matter, since Aglatidas does not himself complain, how can I guess at his disease and cure him otherwise? Yet (said Menasta to her) appearances are oftentimes fallacious, and for ought you know there may be some other cause which has begot this jealousy in Aglatidas, which you are ignorant of: Though that should be so (answered Amestris) yet Aglatidas is not more innocent: I do confess he might be a little jealous, and I should not have been offended at him; but it seems he could not love Anatisa sufficiently, without doing me this irreparable wrong: Therefore Menasta, I must, if it be possible, I must choke this new taken up love in him by an eternal sorrow, and an unprofitable repentance: But do you not consider (said Menasta) that in destroying this love in him, you destroy your self also by such an unheard of way? That's it which I desire (replied Amestris) and if I did not know that melancholy is a gentle poison, which by insensible degrees does operate its effects, I would not abandon my self unto it: Permit me (said Menasta) to speak once more with Aglatidas: When I am dead (said Amestris) I will permit you; and then I conjure you to aggravate my sorrows unto him that it may increase his: What (said Menasta to her) do you speak of death and marriage together? Yes (replied Amestris) and as I am going to the Church, I will imagine it to be unto my grave, and shall hope that the Nuptiall Torches will soon be changed unto Funerals: But why would you die, replied Menasta? Because (answered she) I cannot both live happily and innocently, since I finde it to be very criminal to love Aglatidas. In conclusion Sir, Menasta was constrained to leave Amestris because it was very late. This prudent Lady was no sooner come unto her lodging, but she sent to seek me, being resolved to speak unto me, and if she could to cure my mind both of this jealousy and this new passion, for she did verily believe that I was in love with Anatisa, but all her labour was lost: The next morning she sent also unto Artaban, to desire his help in seeking me, but she sent a little too late for he was newly gone out: Mean while Artaban, as well as Menasta did despair of finding me: And these two which had such pleasant things to relate unto me, were both of them much troubled that they could not learn what was become of me: They were not like to know, since I concealed my self as close as I could with intention to let Megabises hear from me. Indeed, day did no sooner dawn, but I sent a man with a note unto him, which acquainted him how I desired to fight with him upon that Quarrell which he might easily guess at; and to let him know that the man whom I sent would conduct him unto the place where I would expect him with a Sword in my hand: But so it chanced that he whom I sent unto him found abundance of company with him, because three of his friends came to him and would have him go unto the King who intended to hunt that day, and to be with him before he went; this Note therefore could not be so handsomely delivered, but it was perceived, and suspected what the business was, so that it was impossible for Megabises to give me satisfaction. Artaban coming to hear of these reports acquainted the King, who gave order to secure Megabises, and commanded to look out for me: But here Sir may be admired how fortune does sport her self at the destinies of men: Although I did challenge Megabises, yet there was almost none in the Court that would believe it, unless those which were with him when he received the Note; and the report of it being spread abroad that Megabises and Aglatidas would fight, it was not thought likely that I who had killed his brother should also call him to an account: Amestris thought it to be Megabises who called me in question, and not I him; and did imagine that this would more confirm me in the opinion I had of her, so that she resolved to go on in her odd determination: Mean while Artaban with ten or twelve of his friends took horse and all the care they could to finde me out: I knew by the return of the man whom I sent that Megabises was clapt up, and that he sent me word by him he would give me satisfaction as soon as he could: But when I perceived Artaban some two hundred paces off, and because I would not be clapt up as Megabises was, Page 146 I galloped away, and as I often turned my head, I saw Artaban before the rest riding as hard as he could, and making signes with his hand to stay me, because he would speak with me. But as my misfortune had resolved my ruine, I perswaded my self that the wisdom of Artaban thought it not fit I should call that man in question whose brother I had killed, and indeed I my self did think it unreasonable; so that imagining that he had nothing to say unto me, unless that the King would make Megabises and me friends, the more he made signes to stay, the more I spurred my horse: I did oft understand what he said, but would not make answer; and I think he had overtook me, had I not met with a great Ditch which my Horse did freely take, but his would not under a quarter of an hours beating: In the mean time, I having found a thick wood which hindered his sight of me, I quit the common road, and took such an obscure path that Artaban was constrained to return very sorry and angry that he had not spoke with me. I not well knowing what resolution to take after I had contrived and devised a hundred designs, I went unto a Church which was not farre off, the Priest whereof I knew, with whom I had an intention to stay four or five daies concealed, imagining that they would restrain Megabises very long, and that as soon as he was at liberty, he would give me satisfaction; It would not be at all advantageous to you Sir, to tell you what kind of life I led in this place, supposing that you will imagine it to be most restless and melancholique. This Church was built in an ancient Forrest, the trees whereof were so thick, that the Sun did never shine upon it: I wandered all the day in places least frequented; Sometimes I passed away the time with the Magi which dwell thereabouts, and with him with whom I lodged: I had told him that some grumbings at Court caused me to retire for a time: But whosoever I entertained my self withall, and whosoever I walked alone, Megabises and Amestris took up all my thoughts: Perhaps, said I, they are just now together; perhaps Amestris is talking of me unto him with scorn, perhaps she is entreating him not to expose himself unto a new Quarrell; perhaps she is praying against my life; and perhaps Megabises and she are married: To tell you Sir, how sadly this last thought was resented, and how deeply it wounded my soul, is a story which I cannot possibly relate. Upon a day then when I was most dejectedly walking in the Forrest, I discovered a Coach full of Ladies; I no sooner saw it but I rusht into the Wood: But one of the Ladies spying me, Aglatidas (cried she) do not fly, and but suffer me I beseech you to speak one minute with you: I knew the voice full well to be Menasta's, and imagining that perhaps Amestris was with her, I knew not whether I should stay or shun her: But at last hearing her call very earnestly and very often, I turned and came to her, as she was coming out of the Coach, which was very near the Church; she having two friends and one servant with her, did leave them, and desired them to go and stay in the Church whilst she did speak with me concerning some business she had with me: we being cogens, the Ladies which were with her did not think strange at her freedom to me, so that Menasta giving me her hand, and walking some twenty or thirty paces into the Wood without speaking a word to each other, she said unto me, looking me earnestly in the face; I do not know Aglatidas whether what I have to tell you will be welcome or unwelcome unto you, for since you love Anatisa so well, you will not regard the marriage of Amestris. Amestris (cried I out being transported with sorrow and jealousy) is she married? Yes, replied Menasta faintly, but Aglatidas, what does the news concern you, that you should be so troubled at it? you who have told me you did not nor would not love Amestris any longer? I think so to, replied I, and I believe I should not love her; but I do hate Megabises so much that I cannot hear of his happiness without an unimaginable despair: If Megabises (answered she) have no other joy but what the marriage of Amestris affords him, I would advise you not to trouble your self at his good fortune: What (said I to her with a mind full of hatred, sorrow and jealousy, not knowing her meaning) can Megabises marry Amestris and not be the happiest and most satisfied man in the world? Ha Menasta (said I not giving her time to answer) this is not possible, but you have more reason to say that since he enjoys so much good fortune, that he shall not enjoy it long: for indeed that unjust Ravisher of the Treasure which belonged unto me, and which I thought to obtain, shall die by my own hand: Menasta wondering to see me so troubled, and transported with anger, she looked upon me, and interrupting me said, If you do not hate Megabises, I tell you again, but as the husband of Amestris, you may let your soul be in quiet, since it is not Megabises who has married her: Is it not Megabises that has married her, said I? No, said she: Ah Page 147 Menasta (said I with a lesse troubled mind) do not mock me but speak more sincerely unto me; I protest unto you (said she) I do not lie; for Otanus is the man whom the incomparable Amestris hath married: Otanus (said I to her) married Amestris? Otanus the ugliest of men; he whom she most hated? Ha, if it be so, then either her Kindred or the King has compelled her unto this strange marriage: Not at all (Replied Menasta) and you had more interest in her affections then any had: I (replied I) being all amazement? I confess unto you (said I not knowing well what I said) that I had rather she should have married Otanus then Megabises: But for all that, know Menasta, that Aglatidas could not marry Amestris; or if he had been disposed it would not have been advantageous to him: yes (Replied Menasta) it would before the Beauty of Anatisa had rased out of your heart the love of Amestris: Anatisa (replied I hastily) had never any place in my heart: Amestris the perfidious Amestris only did reign there with Sovereignty: Menasta not being less astonished to hear me say so, then I was to her say Amestris was married, did ask me if it were very true that I loved Amestris yet? yes Menasta (said I unto her) I do love her yet; and though my own eyes did see such things, as I did not think I should ever see, yet I did leave adoring her perpetually: The love I shewed unto Anatisa, was but counterfeit, and a meer effect of my despair: But Menasta (said I to her) what was it that set Megabises and Amestris at odds? and what moved her to marry Otanus? Megabises (said she to me) was never in league with Amestris: Ha Menasta (Replied I) you saw not that which I saw; Ha Aglatidas (said she) you saw nothing but what I know: You may here admire Sir what strange effects Love produced in my soul: The news of Amestris her marriage did infinitely afflict me; but because I thought she had been married unto Megabises, and afterwards heard she was not, I did a while resent some joy to mingle amongst my sorrows; this gave me a little comfort: But in conclusion Sir, after that Menasta had caused me to swear a hundred and a hundred times that I did not love Anatisa; She began to aggravate the Obligations which were upon me unto Amestris for her fidelity to me, and her rigour unto Megabises; And to make me more resent it, she told me how Amestris had forbidden Megabises for ever seeing her, and how he promised her that he would not, at the Fountain in the Green Border within the Garden, where accidentally they met. Ha Menasta (said I interrupting her) then have my eyes most cruelly betrayed me; and done me very bad service: So it was Sir, that Menasta telling me nothing but truth, and finding my soul softened with sorrows, it was no hard matter for her to perswade me: The Mist of Jealousie which was before my eyes did vanish; and I immediately saw that which I saw not before; that is, I saw Amestris appear extremely innocent, and my self infinitely to blame: After this, Menasta told me all that I have told you; the despair of Amestris to see me unconstant, and to know that I was jealous not knowing of whom, and at last to justify her self in my mind, she undertook this sad destinie to marry Otanus, knowing well that it was impossible it should be he of whom he was jealous. In conclusion Menasta told me that whereas I might have been the happiest of men, and given Amestris satisfaction, I had made my self the most unhappy, and made her more unfortunate then my self: Ah Menasta (cried I out) this is not possible, if it be, then never was misfortune equal unto mine: She told me further, that the quarrell which I intended with Megabises, did haste on her odd resolution: That my absenting my self, and Anatisa going into the Countrey at the same time, caused her to think that the voyage was agreed upon betwixt us: and she told all those who spoke unto her in the behalf of Otanus, that she was resolved to marry him, so that the business was not protracted but quickly dispatched: At the same time she asked the Kings consent, who consented willingly thereunto, supposing it to be a good expedient to reconcile Megabises and me, both of us being equally in the principal cause of our differences: Menasta told me also that the King spoke to my Father concerning it; and that my Father seeing the coldness that was in me towards Amestris, and being glad that I should be no longer interested in the Love of Megabises, did himself desire the King to conclude up the match: In short Sir, Menasta told me that the business was so closely carried as almost none knew of it when they went unto the Church to be married. Alas Aglatidas (said she unto me) had you seen Amestris in that condition, you would have rather thought her going to a punishment then a Marriage; and might very well have seen her innocency by her sorrows: I saw her (said she) an hour before this sad Ceremony, and she no sooner saw me, but looking upon me with tears in her eyes, I know not (said she to me) whether the unconstant Aglatidas, if he saw me, would resent my sorrows, and repent of his crime; But however Menasta, it were requisite that I did justify me self: I would Page 148 let him see his jealousy was ill-grounded, and I must die for grief; but if my prayers have any prevalency in them he must eternally lament it: As soon as she had uttered these doleful words, they called her to the Church, and I followed after with tears in my eyes like a sad Mourner: Every one who saw her wept also: all that knew of the Marriage were amazed, Megabises although he was very patient at it, yet it infinitely stung him: Artaban was ready to forbid the Banes when the Ceremony was almost finished, coming into the Church no sooner: Otanus himself. was so surprised, and not so well satisfied as he might be, because he did not very well understand how this good fortune did come about; and because he was so conscious of so many defects in himself, as he knew that he could not be beloved: indeed it was the discourse of all the world, and every one vented their conceits concerning it, though there was none but Amestris and Menasta which knew that Aglatidas was the only cause of this so unjust, so unreasonable, and so discordant a Marriage. Never ask me (said she unto me) what Amestris did after this dismal day; she was all Melancholy, all altered, and I could never look upon her but with tears; if you saw her your self, you would pity her and be sad. As we two were thus together, Artaban (to compleat my misfortune) having at last discovered where I was, came and found me hearkening unto Menasta: He no sooner saw me, but coming to me, Ah cruell Friend (cried he) what have you done? And why did you so obstinately fly me? I who had the best and most delightfull news in the world to tell you? I that could have told you that your own eyes had deluded you, and that Amestris was most innocent. Menasta much surprised to hear him say so, asked him what he meant by saying so? Then he told her before me, how he heard Amestris and she in the Green Arbour, where he had learned by their discourse, how that Amestris was faithfull unto Aglatidas, and that she never loved Megabises: how that their meeting in the green border by the Fountain, was by meer chance and not appointed, how that she had commanded Megabises never to see her more, and that accordingly he went away and observed her order, and in conclusion that he heard how Amestris was purely innocent. I hearing then Artaban speak thus, and being no longer in any suspicion of the fidelity of Amestris: Tell me some more cruell friend (said I to him,) And double my misfortune by telling me thus of my good: Forget nothing which might have made me happy, to the end I may be eternally miserable. It is hard for me to tell you Sir, what confusion my thoughts were in upon this accident; I looked upon my error with a horrid shame: I hearkned unto the justification of Amestris with abundance of joy; and I resented my own misfortune with a strange despair: But when my imagination presented unto my soul, that Amestris the fairest Lady in the world, should be in the possession of the most ugly and odious man; I quite lost all Patience, and could not chuse but lament and be stupid: But since Menasta could stay no longer, she left me: at last I said to her, May I not once more see Amestris? I do not think (replied Menasta) that she will permit it; and in that minde which I left her, you can never hope for any more favour from her: Ha Menasta, (said I) do not add to my despair; I would gladly see Amestris, I would discourse with her, I would throw my self at her feet; and if you would be pleased to facilitate the way, I may perhaps do something which would please Amestris, and which might render my despair more publique: In short Sir, I spoke with such violence as moved Menasta to pity me: and promised me to deceive her friend for once: and to let me hear from her when she found a sit time for her to meet me in some place: After this, Menasta went away, and Artaban who had no other business but to finde me out, and tell me that it was his design to prevent my misfortune, he staid with me, and would not leave me in that condition wherein I was: and so much the willinger because he saw the Counsell which he had given me took such unfortunate effect: But I was so just as not to be angry with him for it: I accused only my self not my friend: Must it not be confessed (said I) that I am the most unfortunate, the most culpable, and therefore the most to be blamed of any man in the world? for indeed (said I to Artaban) I have had a greater losse then ever any had; I have been in greater fault then ever any was; and I have suffered more then the most unfortunate man ever did; After I had said so, I was a while silent, then again upon a sudden I began to speak: But Artaban (said I unto him) did you see Amestris in the Church? No (answered he) for I was so troubled when meeting Menasta who told me that Otanus had married Amestris, that I could be no more inquisitive concerning a business which I could not help, and which I had helped doubtlesse, if I had but known it one quarter of an hour sooner: What then (said I to him) is it most true that Amestris did alwaies love me? and is it also certain she never favoured Megabises? and after all this can I be happy? How Artaban can this possibly Page 149 be? No, no (said I) I cannot comprehend it; since Amestris is Fidele, and Megabises not happy, in this respect the heart of Aglatidas must needs rejoyce: But alas, the thought that Amestris is Fidele, and must never be mine, this respect makes dead in sorrow; No, no I had rather you were unconstant then faithfull; and since you are never to be mine, Why do you, cruell Amestris, preserve your affection for me, yet deprive me of all the consequences? To deprive me of your sight; your discourse, and your fair self? This is (inhumane Amestris) to conceal a Serpent under Flowers; This is the way to poison your presence; and indeed it is to be barbarous under a colour of being pitifull; Alas, had it not much more availed me not to have justified your self, then to have done it in such a strange, such an extraordinary, and such a cruell way? For in beleieving you to be unconstant, I had none but my own misfortunes to support: I then thought you happy whilst I sighed; and I did not know that your felicity did not cause my greatest punishment: I had not experimentally tried that I should be more sensible of the misfortunes of the party beloved then of my own. What, Amestris? Must you be for ever unhappy, and unhappy for the Love of me? Must you eternally endure the sight of a man whom you hated, and never see another whom you once honoured with your Love? and all this because Aglatidas seem'd to be perfidious unto you, and because he was jealous without reason, though not without some kinde of appearance, and by consequence without any shew that I loved you still; though none are ever jealous of that which they do not love. Alas Amestris (said I) Did you so little know your own Beauty, that you should suffer your self to be deluded by a trick so easie to be discovered? Could you ever think that any heart which once loved you and adored you could offer any Victims unto any other Divinity? As for Aglatidas, he might with reason think himself not beloved by Amestris, his own defects might authorize his suspicion: But as for Amestris, how is it possible, she should so much as conceive, much lesse firmly beleieve, that any one could cease from loving her? and so cease to love her as to love any other? yet she did think it, she beleieved it, and she has revenged her self, and after such a sad manner as must make me eternally sigh: for to say truly, there neither is, nor was, nor I think ever can be any misfortune comparable unto mine: I know not (said Artaban then unto me) whether all those who are not beloved will acknowledge what you say; Those who are not loved (answered I) may hope that one day they may be, and that hope may support them amidst their inquietudes. But as for me, on the contrary, though I confesse I was beloved, I shall never receive any signs of that affection: I must never see Amestris again, never speak to her; she will never write unto me again, but shall be treated as one she hates: No, no Artaban, I am certainly the most unhappy man in all the world: yet those who lament for the death of their Mistresses will dispute with you for the first rank in unhappinesse, although you would have all they would yeeld it unto you: they do dispute with me for it without reason (Replied I) for who hinders them from following those they love unto the grave? There are a hundred waies which leade to death, and the end of their evils is in their own disposition: But it is not so with me, for as long as Amestris lives, this remedy is denied me: I must preserve my life as if she were delighted with it: for indeed I cannot leave Amestris, because I cannot omit any occasion which may serve her, and because after all this I would see, as well as I can, how far the fidelity of this Lady will go: Then confesse, said Artaban, that those who see their Mistresses not only unconstant and married, but married unto those whom they are more indulgent unto then the first they loved, have more cause to complain then you; I staid a while at this before I answered; but presently beginning to speak as if I had seen Amestris: Pardon (Divine Lady) my imbecillity, and do not hate me, if in this accident I do consider my self more then you: Yes yes Artaban (said I in turning towards him) I do confesse that I do contradict my own thoughts: and although I am desperate at the misfortune of Amestris, yet I would not have her happy with Megabises, but I had rather she should be unfortunate with Otanus; I had need to call all my reason and my generosity to assist me, and to keep this criminous joy from entering my heart: I cannot forbear the entertaining it when I know that he who now enjoys Amestris shall never enjoy her love: and when I know she thinks upon me with sorrow, and eternally regrets me: I would have her know my innocency as I know hers, and that I should be justified in her thoughts as she is in mine: I know (said I) this will augment her sorrow, since it may come to passe that despite will choak some part of that affection she bears unto me: But, adorable Amestris (said I) seek out some other remedies for your sorrows, and finde it rather in the sweetness to know, that you are perfectly though improfitably loved: After this I went silently Page 150 to walk: afterwards upon a sudden I began to speak, answering unto what I had thought upon: No Megabises, said I, I will not fight with you: and though you should offend me, yet if you still love Amestris, you are more cruelly punished then any death can inflict: And afterwards to speak the very truth, without that Passion which hath blinded me, I did owe so much respect unto the blood of my Brother which I had let out, as not to think of spilling his: But as for Otanus (said I) how can I suffer him to live? and knowing the vertue of Amestris, how dare I so much as to desire his death? What then (said I to Artaban with more anger then I can now expresse) must I all my life long see Amestris, the incomparable Amestris, subject unto a man unto whom the gods have denied all things except his bare condition and his Riches? and unto whom they have not given any more soul then as much as will render him odious? Why Artaban is it not permitted me to set Amestris at liberty? Ha No No (said I to my self) I dare not attempt it, I dare not propound it unto her; I dare not so much as have a thought of it lest she should forbid it; what shall I then do (said I to Artaban) and what should I think? So it was Sir, that I can well say, that I suffered as much as was possible to be suffered, and not die: the joy which I represented at the innocence of Amestris did doubtless keep in my life, it not being possible without that cordiall to have kept my heart from breaking when I heard she was married: But though I lived, yet surely it was to endure more sorrow: for certainly the obscurity of a grave was much to be preferred before the trouble and misery which I endured: Sometimes Otanus did not seem so odious unto me as he alwaies before did seem; sometimes I thought that Amestris did not apprehend his defects so great, because it was grown habituall unto her to see them: I feared also that the Treasures which Otanus possessed did not really reach his heart, but those fears lasted not long: My greatest Consolation was to think that Amestris could not love him who possessed it: In the mean time the night drawing on, it was time to retire: I passed that night away without sleep, and I complain'd away the two next daies; Upon the third in the morning I received news from Menasta, who sent me word that if I would be in the Garden about the green Border where the Fountain is by six of the clock at night, she would bring Amestris thither, as not knowing that I would be there; but to prevent any discovery of this meeting, it were requisite she went into the thick wood on the right hand of the Fountain: Whosoever should have told me Sir but one minute before that I should have another minute of joy in all my life, I could not have beleieved him: yet I no sooner knew that I should see Amestris again that day, but I abandoned my self entirely: I went thither an hour before, never thinking either of Megabises or Otanus, or of the marriage of Amestris; and never thinking of any thing else but that I should see her, that I should speak to her, and that perhaps she would answer me favourably. And afterwards reviving upon a sudden out of the pleasant Lethargy of thought: Alas! (said I) what can she possibly answer me, which can render me lesse miserable, since the more sweet she is unto me, the more miserable does she make me? yet for all that I desire her to be so, and not incensed against me. I entertained all that day on this manner with Artaban, and I sent unto Menasta that I would not fail to be there: Mean while, this witty Lady did really delude Amestris (as since I came to know) and propounded this solitary walk unto her, as most suteable to her humour and present condition: yet notwithstanding, she thought it convenient, that Amestris should not resent me so culpable as formerly she did, therefore she brought her an hower sooner unto the Walk then she appointed me, to the end that she might have more time to prepare her: As they were then in that little Wood where she led her, the fair afflicted Lady did her self begin to contribute unto the design, and begun a discourse of which my Cozen was very glad: It must be acknowledged Menasta (said she to her) that the misfortune which thus persecutes me, is very rigid against me, since it will not suffer me to have that comfort as to know what Aglatidas does think of my misfortune: He is so taken up with Anatisa, that perhaps they mock at my Melancholy destiny: and perhaps Aglatidas thinks my Marriage rather an effect of my humour then as a misfortune whereof he is the real cause: But (said she) my soul is a little more reasonable, for I cannot forbear wishing two different things at once: I no sooner had wished to know that Aglatidas was sensible of my misfortune, but presently after I desired for my own quietness to understand no more of him; never to meet him as long as I live; nor hear no more spoken of him: but alas, all these designs have but an ill bottom in my heart; and I have more reason to resent my Marriage as a great punishment for any loving such a perfidious man: I wish, said Menasta, that you had never thought him such a cruell man, or that you would no longer think him so; but as I think you are more Page 151 unhappy by resenting him so; What (said Amestris interrupting her,) should I not beleieve that Aglatidas was perfidious? and can I think that he is not so still? Ah No No Menasta. I must not think him otherwise, and for the future I must not persuade my self of any thing that may justify him: I wish only that he would repent of his crime, to the end that he may be a punishment unto himself: But know that as long as I do not think Aglatidas repentant and unhappy, he does not put the stability of my soul unto any dangerous trial: And it would be more cruel unto me to tell me that I was deceived; that Aglatidas was never culpable; that what I have seen was but an illusion; that he hath been always faithful unto me; That he never loved Anatisa, and that he hath ever loved Amestris; I confesse Menasta, that if I could be persuaded of all this, then I should be more unhappy then I am; and though I should not become more criminal, yet doubtless I should become more unfortunate: But this is a thing which can never be, and a thing which I need not fear: I would to God (said Menasta to her) it were possible you never were acquainted with the innocency of Aglatidas: The innocency of Aglatidas (replied Amestris? Ha, I do entreat you not to make merry at my misfortune; it is too great Menasta to be used for your diversion; and I am more your friend then to be treated so. No No, replied she, I speak seriously; Aglatidas it is true was very unwise, but he was ever faithful: What, replied Amestris, did not Aglatidas love Anatisa? Aglatidas, answered Menasta, never loved any but you: O Heavens (cried out this wise Lady) merciless and cruel woman that you are, why do you speak thus unto me? If this you tell me be false, why do you tell it? and if it be true, why did you not either tell it sooner, or eternally conceal it from me? I could tell it no sooner, replied Menasta, because I knew it no sooner; and I could not hide it, because Aglatidas is resolved to tell it you himself: Oh (replied she with a quite altered countenance) whether Aglatidas be culpable or innocent, I will never see him as long as I live; if he be culpable he is not worthy of it; and though he be innocent, yet I shall be criminal to suffer it; therefore Menasta talk no more of him, he does but too much take up my memory; he is but too much in my heart, and I wish to heaven he were less: After these words she was silent; and Menasta seeing her minde was so much troubled, did repent of her promise and was a good while before she durst speak any more unto her: After some minutes had thus passed on, Amestris looking upon her with eyes swimming in tears, and beginning to speak with less violence; But yet, said she, Menasta, what moved you to speak thus unto me? I durst tell you no more, answered Menasta, for seeing the innocence of Aglatidas did torment you as much as if he were criminal, I thought it better to speak no more of him, neither as faithful or as inconstant: Know Menasta, replied she, that I love you so much as to pardon such a fault, and know (said she blushing) that I desire you to tell me all you know concerning Aglatidas, and disguise nothing from me: Menasta, seeing Amestris desired it, told her all she knew concerning my adventure; to wit how I came to be jealous by seeing Megabises with her in the Garden: how that moved me to leave writing unto her: how I did not cease to love her: how Artaban had counselled me to love Anatisa, or at least to seem as if I did; and how I challenged Megabises, and hid my self to no other end but to fight with him; and in conclusion, seeing Amestris hearken favourably unto what she told her; then she told her further what I had told unto her; and confessed she had discovered in me so many signes of absolute despair, that she was not able to deny me one request which I made unto her, which was that I would be a means that I might once more see her: In conclusion, Madam (said she) that you may not be too much surprised at it, be pleased to know, that I induced you hither, only to the end that Aglatidas might present himself unto you: Ah Menasta (said Amestris) what have you done? unto what have you exposed me? how do you think I can endure the sight of a man whom I have made so unfortunate? and how can I deny that unto a man who might have made me all happiness? Yes Menasta, you have done me great wrong, if this meeting should be discovered, would the world not think it was by my consent? What will all the Court say? what may Otanus think? unto how much danger do I hazard my reputation? No no, I must never consent unto what you have promised him: how would you have me speak unto him? what would you have me say? Shall I tell him I love him still? alas I cannot do so without a crime, or at least it is not hansom to do it; Shall I tell him that I hate him? Ha, good Gods, how can I say it? I who did not so, when I thought him perfidious? Speak then Menasta, I conjure you; you have wit and virtue, and discretion, I beseech you advise me, and advise me faithfully: Yet (replied she, not Page 152 giving her leave to answer) it is better to ask no counsel at all, and shun so dangerous an occasion: In saying so, she began to walk, and go away; When Menasta did bid her look where I was coming; she no sooner saw me, but she shed tears; and as she turned from me to hide them, I kneeled down at her feet, before she was well recovered in her sight; I thought Sir that I had such a share in those sorrows which I observed in Amestris, and they did so augment mine, that I had much add to speak; yet after much straining my self, I said unto her, You see at your feet Madam, the most culpable, the most innocent, and the most unfortunate man that breathes, who as criminal comes to ask punishment; who as innocent comes to justify himself before you; and who as unfortunate comes to beg compassion, and some comfort in his misery: Not Madam, that I seek to live, but that I desire to die more cheerfully and gloriously both: And this will be (Divine Amestris) if you will be pleased only to acknowledge that I have not merited my misfortune; and that you would not judge me unworthy of a more happy destiny. I know not Aglatidas (answered she, and raising me up) neither whether I should answer you, nor whether I should hear you, but I know very well that you are the only cause both of your misfortunes and mine; for indeed Amestris is not one of whom one ought to be jealous: Why Madam (said I) should I give the lie unto my own eyes? Should I trust more unto your merit and your goodness, then to their testimony? Do you not know Madam, that except the last time when I had the honour to speak unto you, you never had given me any strong arguments to believe but that I stood upon any good terms in your minde? What then would you have it Madam which should sustain my weakness upon such an occasion? If I had received severall proofs and trials of your affection to me, then it had been a horrid crime to suspect your inconstancy: But what engagements had I from you Madam, which might create in me so great a confidence: It is true indeed that I have had some favourable expressions from you, and was permitted to interpret them in the best sense for my self, and that I have received some civil and obliging Letters from you: but Madam, were all these sufficient to belie my own eyes; and had my passion been worthy of you if I had retained all my reason upon such an accident? No Madam, to love you perfectly is to lose all reason as I have lost it; and to preserve only respect as I have preserved it; for indeed I did not complain it before all the world; I lamented in secret, I sought out solitude to sigh it out there; and when I returned to Ecbatan, I was forced to it: You returned (said Amestris to me interrupting me and changing colour) to wait upon Anatisa before my eyes, and to force me against my will to receive a passion which could not enter into a soul that was not preceded by another. Ah Madam, said I to her, I beseech you do not upbraid me with a fault which indeed I have committed, but I committed it by the counsel of another: 'Tis true I did counterfeit a love unto Anatisa, but it was only because I ever loved you; that open love was but an effect of my true concealed love; and I know not how the adorable Amestris should suffer her self to be deceived by so grosse an artifice, and which I used with so little care: Do not think Madam that I have prophaned the same words which I employed to persuade you of my affection, and that I ever courted Anatisa; No, I never told her that I loved her; I let her interpret my melancholy as she pleased, but I never did say so much as I love you. I do confess that I once did intend it, but my heart and my tongue were, whether I would or no, faithful unto you: Yes Madam, when I fled from you, when you thought I courted Anatisa, even then I gave you convincing testimonies of the greatness of my affection: For to love the fairest Lady in the world as long as she is gracious and favourable, this is a thing most ordinary; but for me to continue loving her, when I thought she had forsaken me, when I believed she had betrayed me and loved another, and I for fear of discovering my weakness seemed to love another; Ah Madam, this is it which makes it evident, that nothing can extinguish my passion but death, and that you will reign eternally in my soul: Amestris all the time of this discourse dejected her eyes, and afterwards upon a sudden lifting up her eye-lids with extream melancholy: Justifie your self no more (said she to me) for you are yet but too much in my minde; and let me employ that little time I have to be with you in telling you ingenuously my real thoughts: I would Madam (said I to her) if it may be without prejudice to that reverence I owe you, beseech you first not to make me despair, but to let me die less violently; I would gladly ask you why when you thought me culpable, you should then be revenged upon your self? Could you not invent a punishment which I alone might have suffered the misery which you thought I deserved? Why did you not rather doom me to die before your eyes? Why Madam did you punish me by making your Page 153 self unhappy? I thought it best (answered she) in my opinion to make you miserable by this course, because I could not otherwise justify my self in your minde, and I thought I could not do it more certainly then by marrying Otanus, whom you knew well I did not love, and of whom I knew most assuredly you were not jealous: Ah Madam (said I to her) what do you tell me? Must Aglatidas hear from your own mouth such cruel words? What Madam, Otanus? that same Otanus who I have seen to be the greatest object of your aversion: Can he ever be the husband of Amestris? Yes, answered she, since Aglatidas would not: I beseech you Madam, said I to her, have not such a thought of me; but on the contrary believe that if you will but let Aglatidas alone, Amestris shall not be long the wife of Otanus; I pronounced these words in a very passionate violence: But oh Heavens, how astonished I was, when I saw Amestris go back and look upon me with an imperious aire, wherein appeared no less anger then sorrow: Know Aglatidas, said she to me, that as I have not changed my opinion of you, so I have not changed my vertue, I am the same you knew me, and ever will be, It is incapable of any injustice; I have loved you, I confess, but I loved you without a crime; Never think then, that although I ever had a great aversion towards Otanus, and had never married him out of such a thought as I cannot my self express, yet I say never think that I can ever desire not to be his Wife: The time was indeed when I did not desire it; but since I am so, it befits me to live with him as my Husband, and not to deceive. You know (said she, with eyes full of tears which she would have restrained) that I will live out all the rest of my daies with Otanus, whom I have ever hated, as if I had ever loved him; and with Aglatidas whom I ever loved, as if I ever hated him: Why Madam, said I to her, will you live with Aglatidas as if you ever hated him? What rigid vertue can impose such a severe law upon you? No, no Madam, said I to her, do not fear that I will use any violence; do not punish me so cruelly for one word pronounced against my will in passion, and without any design to execute it: I would have killed Megabises because I thought you loved him, and I will not attempt against Otanus, because you do not love him, and I will hope that you will never love him: Let then this happy Husband of the fair Amestris live, so I may have so much happiness as sometimes to see her, that I may be put in minde of those glorious hours, wherein by the will of Artambaces I might have possessed the place which Otanus not enjoys; let him enjoy that glorious place in peace, since the fatal Destinies would have it so; but let me also possess in peace that which you have given me; let me Madam enjoy some glimpse of that felicity to the last minute of my life: You may, if you will, bring me to my death, as they use to bring Victims, that is, with Songs of joy and Crowns of flowers: Yes Madam, I should die with joy and honour, if you would only permit me to render you an account of my sorrows: And never fear that I shall ever desire any thing from you which can displease you; No, divine Amestris, I would only have my complaints to be favourably heard, and I would only be comforted by some words of pity: you have hearkned unto Megabises whom you do love, and will you refuse the same favour unto a man whom you have not hated, nor perhaps do yet? That's the reason (replied she) why I ought to deny it; for indeed Aglatidas I did love you, and I cannot hate you, so that for that very reason I ought to mistrust my own thoughts: It is not (said she) and the gods do know it, the affection which I bear unto you can ever cause me to fail in that duty which I owe unto Otanus, nor in that which I owe unto my self, but because I am not in a capacity ever to be yours, therefore I ought not to admit of seeing you or loving you: What then Madam, said I to her, do you intend then to hate me? I cannot do that if I would (answered she) but I can forbear speaking to you: Ah if you can do that (said I to her) then you will not love me any more: And take heed Madam, you do not renew a fresh jealousy in a desperate soul, and persuade me, that perhaps the riches of Otanus did gain your heart: Doe not Madam stir upon such a violent passion in my minde; and to prevent it afford me at the least some small signs of indifference: For indeed Madam, if you should cause me to despair, I should again lose my Reason absolutely, as I did in my first jealousy, and perhaps shall not be able to preserve that respect which I ever have done: Tell me then, adorable Amestris, that you do not hate me, and that you would have me love you: and also permit me sometimes to tell you that I am ready to die for the love of you: I will tell you more then that (said she;) for I will confesse that I esteem Aglatidas, as I ought to esteem him; and that I love him as well as ever I did love him; and that I will love him so untill I die: But after all this; he must see me no more as long as he lives: All that I can do for you is to permit you to think that when you shall hear of my death (which I believe will Page 154 be ere long) that melancholy was the cause, and that my last thoughts would be of Aglatidas; Now (said she) you see all I can do, and perhaps more then I ought to do, and therefore never hope for any more: Who ever saw (said I unto her) the like adventure unto mine? You tell me that you have loved me, and that you love me still; you tell me that you will die in thoughts of me, and why will you not whilst you are alive hear me sometimes? It is because I cannot (answered she) without some offence to vertue, and without too much exposing my reputation: Does not your innocency (said I) suffice to satisfy that? No (answered Amestris) it behoves to appear as well as be vertuous: Appear then (said I to her) to be good and pitifull, if it be true that you are so: Do you (said she) appear reasonable and generous, if you will continue to be always what you are: Would you have Aglatidas Madam, said I, see you no more, and perhaps love you no more? I ought to wish the latter as well as the first (replied she) but I confesse I can not: What would you then have me do, said I? I would (answered she)

have him love Amestris without any hope; that he should comfort himself without seeing me; that he should live with desire of death; and that he never forget me: In saying so, she would have left me, but I took her by the hand whether she would or no, holding her by force, and kneeling down: In the Name of God Madam (said I) either grant me what I desire, or do not forbid my death: I can consent unto no more (said she to me) honour bids me deny what you desire, and my affection bids you live at least as long as I: Have Patience Aglatidas (said she) perhaps the time will not be long: Ah Madam (said I to her) speak not thus of your death; Rather forget Aglatidas then let the Fairest Lady in the world finde a Tomb; you might do better (said she) to phrase her the most unfortunate, and perhaps also the most unjust, and the most inhumane: But in the Name of those gods which I have already invoked Madam (said I to her) let me speak unto you but once more: Aldieu Aglatidas (said she) adieu, I begin to think my heart would betray me if I should hearken to you any longer, and that I ought to trust unto my own vertue no longer: Live (said she) if you can, and if it be possible love none but Amestris, and never see her more; she praises you, and if you will admit of it, she commands you; I pronouncing this sad sentence she left me all in tears; and all that I could do was to kisse her fair hand which she drew away from mine with too much violence: you may judge Sir in what a condition I was when I saw Amestris going away with Menasta, who all the while of our discourse, stood five or six paces from us, to watch lest any came, and understood nothing at all what we said: I will not insist Sir upon repetition of my apprehensions, for it would but too much abuse your patience: Let this serve for all, that there was never any esteemed him|self more undone and unfortunate then I: for indeed I found that I loved and was beloved, but for all that there is not any ingredient of hope left for me: I found that it was not permitted me to force my happinesse from him which enjoyed it: I had no more Rivals to punish, I had no more inconstant Mistresses to complain upon, What comfort could I ever hope for amidst my sorrows? I had no power to forget one which loved me, who had all my heart, my spirits, my soul, my memory, and all, and for whom I forgot all the world besides: There was not any hope for me to speak unto her; She had forbid me to die; Indeed I found nothing but what did extraordinarily afflict me; yet notwithstanding I would try whether by the assistance of Menasta I could speak once more unto Amestris, but Sir it could not possibly be obtained: and from that day this cruell Lady would never walk in any place, lest she meet with me: also she feigned to be sick, to the end she might not go out at all. When I understood by Menasta the full resolution of Amestris, ne|ver to alter, I then determined to remove from that place where I could not see her; *est in consideration of me, I might perhaps have contributed unto her death, by causing her restraint: As for Megabises who was as much vexed at the marriage of Amestris as I was, although he was thought not to love any longer when he came to Ecbatan: yet he found as well as I that it was not such an easie matter to extinguish a violent passion. Astiages ha|ving heard where I was, did reconcile us, without seeing or embracing one another, comman ding me because I had killed his brother to shun meeting him as much as I could possible. The cause of our last querrell was not known unto any, no not unto Megabises himself, who was alwaies ignorant that I had seen him in that fatall garden, near the Fountain in the green border: As concerning Anatisa, I left Ecbatan before she returned out of the Countrey: so that I cannot tell you what she thought of me: I did write a Letter at my departure unto Amestris, which I sent unto Menasta, but I never had any answer unto it. I went wandering a while from Province to Province, not well knowing what I did, nor what course to take Page 155 until such time as the War begun in Assiria; I hoped there to put a period unto my misfortunes, in finding out an honourable death. During all the time I was there, I never recei|ved any news, neither from Menasta nor Amestris; although I used all possible means to engage some or other to enquire of them: And ever since that you have been a witness of my Melancholy, although you knew not the cause: And since that I never heard more of Amestris, unlesse what I knew by Araspes, how that Otanus was yet living, and that yet she was unfortunate, and in all likelihood, since Melancholy did so remain in her face, she yet perhaps loves the unfortunate Aglatidas; Now Sir, you understand what the adventure was which you desired to know, and what were the misfortunes of that man who more then any man in the world wishes a happy end unto yours, and who expects nothing but death to put an end unto his own. After these words Aglatidas was silent; and Artamenes thanked him for the pains which he had taken: asking him pardon for causing him to revive his sorrows, and did seem to be extreemly sensible of them: I confess, said he to him, that you are much to be lamented, and the accident which has made you so unfortunate was a very extraordinary event: But for all that, said he to him sighing, you do know that Amestris is living, and you need not doubt but that yet you are beloved: So that you may hope that Time and Fortune may work a happy change in your affection; But I do know some more unfortunate then you: I know not that Sir, replied Aglatidas, but I do know very well that I did lose an inestimable Jewel in losing Amestris, and that if ambition should join it self unto Love to persecute me, I could not be more Melancholy then I am; yet Sir, it is very generous in you, to interest your self more in the misfortunes of others then your own: You have unjust and heavy fetters of your own to complain of, and need not trouble your self to lament the unhappiness of Aglatidas, who is not worthy of that honour. Aglatidas, answered he, is wor|thy of all that is great in the world, and therefore I hope that one day, the Gods will put a period unto his misfortunes: Although I had all the qualities in the world, replied Aglatidas, those which you do attribute unto me, would not create any hope in me; and as long as Artamenes continues unhappy, I know not why any who have any vertue, should ground their hopes upon that reason which is not alwaies infallible: Thus did Artamenes and Aglatidas discourse away the time untill Andramias told them that it was time to retire: Aglatidas asked Artamenes whether he could do him any service, desiring to let him know that he could contribute something towards his delivery; but Artamenes thanked him, and told him that his prison was not so great a misfortune, but if he could he would never come out, unless by the same hand which put him in.

The End of the First Part.

THE SECOND PART OF ARTAMENES, OR Cyrus the Great. BOOK I.

Though this Illustrious Prisoner was carelesse of his Liberty, yet his friends did contribute all their diligence to procure it: and Hidaspes entertained not a thought of any thing else, ever since he knew Artamenes, to be Cylrus: Not onely Hidaspes, Aducius, Artabases, Chrisan|tes, and Feraulas, who were native subjects unto the King his Father, and hereafter to be his, did all of them in particular, contrive all expedients for his safety: But the King of Hircania, the King of Phrygia, Persodes, Thrasibulus, and many others also, were not lesse solici|tous. So that, to lose no time, Chrisantes went the next morning betimes unto the King of Phrygia, with intentions to relate unto him, in a more concise manner, all <...> t, which the day before, he had related concerning the unhappy life of his dear Ma| <...> r: but since they thought it expedient to keep alwayes some about Ciaxares, to pre| <...> t him from taking any violent resolutions against Artamenes, the King of Phrygia said, thought it fittest for him, to undertake that office, since he was most affectionate, and <...> d most prevalencie with the King of Medes. In that consideration therefore, Chri| <...> tes did in short tell him the story of Artamenes, whereof he himself had seen a great <...> t, and resolved hereafter, at more leasure, to relate the particulars in a more ample <...> nner. Chrisantes did so satisfie the curiosity of this Prince, and did so extreemly <...> me him by his relation, although it was but a bare abridgement of his Life, that he <...> infinitely redouble his esteem of Artamenes: and caused him to go with more diligence <...> o Ciaxares, and observe all his Resentments. In the mean time, Chrisantes and Fe| <...> s went unto the house of Hidaspes, where the King of Hircania, Persodes, Thrasibu|s, <...> bates, Adusius, and all those who heard Chrisantes the day before did Rendez-vous. <...> y no sooner saw Chrisantes and Feraulas, but they did very importunately desire them <...> nish their discourse of the glorious life of Artamenes. The Princes would have sent the King of Phrygi: but Chrisantes told him how he had already satisfied his Curio| <...> , and then they did *it down, whilst Feraulas did pursue that story which Chrisantes began the day before.

THE CONTINVANCE OF THE HISTORY OF Artamenes.

WHen I call to memory all the great Acts, which Chrisantes told you yesterday, I have much ado to think it possible, there should be any thing else to tell you; And when I think upon all which re|mains, that I am to relate unto you, then me thinks Chrisantes hath told you nothing, so full of miracles is the life of my Masters. I know Sir (said Feraulas to the King of Hircania) you have not forgot, how after that combat twixt him and Philidaspes,, wherein he had the advantage, he retired unto that sacrificer whom he saw in the Temple of Mars, when he came first to Sinope, and from thence he sent unto the King and the Princesse, to present his excuses, and beg pardon for the combat which he had made, but I think you know not the sequell of that accident: Ariebeus who did patronize Philidaspes, did all he could to cause the fault to reflect upon Artamenes; but although Ariebeus spoke all that his Genius could suggest in behalf of Philidaspes; yet the eloquence of my Masters great services spoke more effectually for himself. Nothing made a greater noise in the Court then this Combat: every one was inquisitive of the cause, but none could finde it: It was the common discourse of the Court; and every one imagined that Ambition caused the quar|rell: but yet as none did particularly know the originall, so each one took the liberty to think as they would. The King was extreemly angry at the mischance: for as they were men of high service, both of them; so he was afraid to lose them both, or at least one, because their wounds were very great; especially Philidaspes, whose hurts were much more dangerous then those of Artamenes. And though the King did highly prize them both; yet his minde did put a great difference between them: when he begun to consider how he owed his life unto Artamenes, and unto his valour all his illustrious victories, he could not choose but in spite of Ariebeus and all he could say, prefer Artamenes before Phili|daspes. He was extreemly displeased at the matter; but he conceived he ought not to pu|nish them, as well because he loved them and was obliged unto them, as because neither of them were born subjects unto him, and therefore by consequence ought not to treat them rigorously; yet notwithstanding, for formalities sake upon such an occasion, he would have the Princess come to ask their pardon, which by absolute command from the King she did, though not without some repugnancy. After this formall ceremony he sent to know of their healths; and to tell Artamenes, that he had done worse in so exposing himself, then if he had hazarded a Battle: He also sent some obliging complement unto Philidaspes, so that the businesse was better passed over then every one did think it. That which did most vex Philidaspes was to see all the Court take Artamenes part, except some old friends of Ariebeus, who fauned upon his favourite. Now Sir, It is time to tell you what the Prin|cess thought upon the matter: for although by the Kings command she had begged pardon for these two Illustrious offenders, yet she kno|w not, whether for her particular, she could consent unto it: I am now about speaking such secrets concerning her, as you will be inquisitive how I should come to the knowledge of them; therefore it is requisite I should now tell you, that a long time since, one of Mandana's women, called Martesia, with whom I had a great league of friendship, did tell it unto me: for at that time there passed between us onely a bare common civility; and I was then altogether ignorant of what I Page 3 now intend to relate. You may be pleased to remember, that the day before this Combate was fought, the Princess used all her endeavours to contract a league of friendship between Artamenes and Philidaspes; and how she entreated them to live at least, as if they did (though they could not) love one another: So that as soon as she understood of their fighting, she was in a great choler, and thought that they failed in their Respects to her. Martesia, of whom I spoke, was she, whom of all her women she loved most, and in whom she had most confidence; but untill that time Martesia had tasted more of her liberality then her trust: and I beleeve that what the Princess thought of Artamenes upon this oc|casion, was the first great secret which she imparted unto her; nor had she as I think any other, who she pleased to create her confidant. It was now a long time since the Prin|cess looked upon my Master with much esteem; and indeed, I learned from Martesia that she did extreemly commend him, ever since the first time she saw him; and since that time, upon a hundred accidents, she has spoke of him after such a manner as she was not wont to speak of any else; she observed his handsome Garb; she liked his pleasant spi|rit; she commended his wisdom; she admired his valour; she could not comprehend his good fortune; and indeed she said, that Artamenes was every way a miracle, and one whom the Gods had sent as a Protector of her fathers life, and glory of his Raigne; But upon this last accident, her anger had so incensed her minde, as it compelled her to open her heart unto Martesia. I know not (said she to her that night the fight was) whether or no I should, after the example of the King, pardon Artamenes and Philidaspes: for in|deed Martesia, could there be any thing more offensive unto me, then this their procedure? I no sooner desired them to love one another, but they presently quarrell; I wisht them to live, as if they loved at the least, and they immediately fight; even that morrow after I desired them: in truth I cannot think they could have set so slight a value upon my words, neither do I think I can pardon them. I do believe Madam, replied Martesia, that there is some hidden cause in the business, which is not understood, and which perhaps, would justify them if you knew it: for certainly they are men of souls, and high judgment, and men also who much reverence you: But they have afforded me very ill testimonies of it, (replied the Princesse very sharply) and I intend to let them see I am sensible of the injuries: But you are also sensible of their good deeds, and being so, what will welcome of all their brave services (replied Martesia.) But Martesia, I would fain know, (said the Princesse to her) what I ought to think of the boldness of Artamenes and Philidaspes, and know which of them was the first Assaulter: The event of the Combat tells me that Artamenes had the better of it; but nothing tells me which of them was most culpable. I think Madam (replied Martesia, who was alone with her in her closet) that both of them may without injustice be blamed; for did you not entreat them both to love one another? Yes, replied the Princesse, but though neither of them can be innocent, yet it is probable, they are not both of them equally culpable, and that is it which I would precisely know; not but that I think Artamenes is lesse in fault. And why Madam do you think so (answered Martesia) since you have no more proofs for the one than the other? I know not (replied the Princesse) but I do more suspect the hasty violent humour of Philidaspes, has failed in his respects unto me, sooner than the wise temper of Artamenes: moreover, (added she) the victory which Artamenes got over him is an infallible mark of the justness of his cause: Indeed (said she blushing) though I cannot tell for what reasons, yet I cannot chuse but wish Artamenes be found lesse culpable than Philidaspes; and I should be very glad that a man who has so much obliged should give me no cause of complaint. It is very true, (answered Martesia) that Artamenes is a man incomparable, and one whose merits does doubtlesse deserve a higher esteem than any other: But Madam (added she) what should be the reason that a man of such extraordinary virtues should conceal his Quality and place of birth? It is to be believed (said the Princesse blushing) that his Quality is equal to his carriage, for if it were not, he would never conceal it: But (said Martesia) what brought him to this Court? and why stays he here? for I hear say he never asked any thing of the King. Never any thing, (answered the Princesse) but onely leave to fight against enemies: yet (said she) his services have not been small, nor all his actions meanly glorious, and here this great Princesse began to repeat what my Master had done in the first Battell, when he preserved the King her fathers life, out of the hands of his enemies who had environ'd him with danger: The prodigious advantages that he got above all others; The wonderful Combat, wherein he remained the only Conqueror of two hundred enemies: How he erected a glorious Trophe: The Combat Page 4 <1 page duplicate> Page 5 <1 page duplicate> Page 4 which he had with Artanus: The taking of Cerasia: The Battles that he won against the King of Pontus: The remarkable Arms which he wore, to make himself better known unto those who conspired against his life: The poor simple Arms which he made choice of to conceal himself from those who had order to spare his life: His generous behaviour unto those valiant souldiers which would not yeeld their Bucklers, and of his rendring them their money again: And also all his other Gallantries, which she remembered as freshly and precisely, as if they were done but yesterday; and yet after all these (said she to Martesia) there appears not the least Ambition in his minde, and I neither know what brought him hither, what he stays for, nor what he aims at: not but that the King my father would do very much for him; but upon the whole matter, his services are infinitely above all recompences; and this is the reason Martesia, why I wish him more innocent than Philidaspes. And although Philidaspes be a man of a high soul and excellent spirit, also in divers occasions hath done good service, yet there is a great difference between them: The turbulent humour of Philidaspes, does not please me; moreover, I think him more Ambitious, and fuller of self ends than Artamenes. After this manner, Sir, was the first discourse of him: Mean while, as the king did pardon these two illustrious Offenders, the Princesse would not make her resentments of them to appear; so that she sent to know how they did. Philidaspes was a long time very ill, and his life in some doubt: but my Masters wounds were never in any danger: and within three weeks after the fight, he presented himself unto the King and Princesse: to thank the first for his grace towards him, and the second for interceding in his behalf. She was then in her closet, and none but her women with her, so that as Artamenes did address himself to give her thanks, and acknowledge the favour; Think not (said she to him) though I did beg your pardon, that I my self in particular did consent unto it: no Artamenes (said she in a more imperious Tone) It is onely the King hath pardoned you, but Mandana is yet displeased. If to die at your feet (answered Artamenes) would give you that satisfaction, I am most ready to do it. But Madam, what's the crime I have committed? How can that man, who does reverence you, with as much devotion as he does the Gods, possibly offend you? Pray tell me then (said she to him) whether it was not a neglect in your duty, to slight my request as you did, when I desired you to live peaceably with Philidaspes? But Madam, (said he) you also desired Philidaspes to live peaceably with Artamenes: 'Tis true, (said she) and I intend not to justify him by accusing of you: I would onely know which of you is more or lesse culpable than the other: Indeed I know not that my self, (replied Artamenes and changing colour) the ground of our quarrell is so dubious, that we did not explain it one to another, nor perhaps ever shall. Did you know one another, (demanded the Princesse) before you came hither? No Madam, (answered Artamenes) our acquaintance and our aversion began together, at this Court and almost at the very same minute: But Madam, it befits not me to ask what moved you to desire that I should love Philidaspes: It is the duty of Artamenes onely to ask pardon for not obeying you. As I seldom use to make unjust requests (replied she) so I am not used to be denied: and I did not think that Artamenes, and Philidaspes would have been the first. My Master, seeing the Princesse angry, was most extremely sensible of it: Ah Madam, (said he to her) if I had thought I could not revenge my self without incensing you, doubtlesse I had never done it: But Madam, is there no hope to obtain a pardon for that crime which was not voluntary? Is the Princesse Mandana more inexorable than the Gods, who are indulgent to all repentant tears and prayers? The Princesse who did really esteem Artamenes very much, and had already entertained some disposition to love him; she seeing him much troubled, was afraid lest her being more severe than Cixares, should offend him; so that, over-ruling her own self, she resolved to qualify him, and freely pardon him: Well Artamenes (said she to him) the inquietude of your own soul does sufficiently punish you; and I will inflict no other penance upon you, but that you do not any more expose your self unto any more dangers. Ah Madam, said he to her, your goodness is divine in pardoning me; but it is very rigorous, that you should impose it upon me, to be indulgent unto him who opposeth himself against all my desires. I promise you, (said she to him) that if Philidaspes do prefer any thing unto the King, which may be prejudiciall unto you, I will take your part against him. No Madam, (replied Artamenes) there is nothing I can crave of the King; I have received more from him then I can desire, and if Philidaspes do contend with me for nothing but recompenses, we shall never fall out again; and for what else, replied the Princesse, can he dispute with you about? At these words, Artamenes Page 5 being much plunged could not chuse but blush, and looking most passionately upon the Princesse, I think he would have discovered part of his deepest secrets unto her, if the King had not come into the Room: Mandana, who had a most admirable wit, and having exactly observed all the actions of Artamenes, took especial notice of his troubled soul, yet since the King was there, she could not possibly make any long reflection thereupon. Cixares, after much other discourse told her, how it was his absolute pleasure, that Artamenes and Philidaspes, should for the time to come live lovingly together; and to that end, he would have Artamenes accompany him in a walk which he intended to take; and that as they passed by the door of Philidaspes, they would in passing by visit him, because Arabeus desired as much, and then he would cause them to embrace each other: Artamenes would gladly have stayed behind; but Cixares observing his repugnancy, told him that Conquerors ought not to keep at such distances with their enemies conquered: moreover he would have the Princesse take this walk and visit; she should be his Usher, and thereby make the business more handsome and advantageous for him: The Princesse saw the Kings desire, she resisted not, and indeed she thought that she ought not to be any hindrance unto such an Accommodation. As for Artamenes, he seemed much vexed at it, and did obey with much adoe; for, as he resented it, it was a very cross adventure to agree with Philidaspes, and go unto him, and also to be conducted thither by the Princesse her self: yet since he saw there was no remedy, he resolved upon it. The King and the Princesse took their Coaches, and went out of the Town, for Philidaspes was not yet returned into it, by reason of his hurts. After they had took the Air, and ended their walk, they came unto the place where he was: The King discoursed in a low voice privately with Mandana, at the foot of the stairs a long while: Mean time, my Master addressed himself unto Martesia, but so disturbedly, his mind and his countenance so altered, that he was scarce knowable. Martesia who perceived it, could not chuse but chide him, telling him that his hatred was too violent, and that if he knew as well how to love as to hate, his friendship were the most excellent Jewel in the world: Doubt it not Martesia, said he, and if ever I love, I shall love more violently then I hate Philidaspes. You make me very inquisitive, said she to him in a low voice. And I extremely desire to know, whether or no you do love, and who it is you love: I cannot (replied he blushing) satisfy the half of your curiosity; it not being just that I should tell you that which I never told unto any, and perhaps never will: As they were thus discoursing, the King and the Princesse ended theirs: And my Master was obliged, to present his hand unto the Princesse, who easily had observed the turbulence in Artamenes mind. The King found Philidaspes that day in a good condition, but so surprized at the sight of Artamenes in his chamber, that his wounds began to open, and bleed afresh, at the sight of him who made them, such was the violent agitation of his resentments. Cixares, to prevent the like resentments in Artamenes, told him that he would have them embrace each other. The violent disposition of Philidaspes, upon this occasion, had much adoe to contain it self: Yet seeing the King was peremptory and would have it so, and that the Princesse complained of him, also all the Court being present, he recalled himself and obeyed. Mandana then causing Artamenes to come neerer, and telling him that it was the part of him who was most in health to come the greater part of the way, and indeed she did gently push him forward towards Philidaspes, who embracing him by force, told him, that Kings ought to be obeyed in their own Dominions. You have good reason for it, answered my Master; and upon the same ground I do as the King and the Princesse commands me. Whosoever Sir, did well observe the motions of these two gallant strangers, might easily discover, that there was some great secret which did lie at the heart, but none could know what it was. This visit lasted not long, but whilst it continued, Artamenes was alwayes looking upon Mandana, or else upon Philidaspes, who for his part was so quasht that he almost looked upon no body. The King being retired, and the Princesse following, both returned to the Palace, where Mandana was no sooner arrived, but she had no disposition to see any one: As for Artamenes, he stayed yet with the King, but with so much restlesnesse, that he could not stay there long, therefore he also returned vnto his Chamber. He was no sooner there, but ruminating upon all the past passages, he thought it no displeasure, since he could pick some comfort out of it. Why said he sighing, must it not be permitted me to hate my enemy? will Mandana eternally contradict all my inclinations? What hidden interest can she have in this designe, which must oblige me to love Philidaspes, and Philidaspes to love me? Is it onely a bare designe to preserve the lives of Page 6 two men whom she thinks are not unprofitable unto the service of the King her father? or else because having some particular esteem of Philidaspes, she would take off from him an enemy; who by all treatable means would not be reconciled? and under pretence of treating us equally, she has some unequall biassed thoughts of us: But alas, (said he) why should I be so unjust, as to interpret the actions and words of my Princesse in such a sence? she who ever did treat me well? what can I in reason complain of? Can Artamenes, as Artamenes ask any thing of the Princesse of Cappadocia, which he has not already obtained? She has highly commended me; she has treated me with all civility; she freely honours me with her discourse without disdain; she has offered to be his Advocate vnto the King; she has taken care of his life; when he offended, she procured his pardon, and indeed, there is nothing which the illustrious Mandana does not do for Artamenes; But alas, although Artamenes be contented as Artamenes, yet Cyrus is nothing satisfied as Cyrus: This Artamenes, said he, whom the Princesse thus favours, is not he whom I wish she would favour: Artamenes seemes to affect nothing but war; he aims all at honour and glory, but he whom I would have her know and favour loves nothing but Mandana, and seeks for nothing but her affection. Sir, (said I to him, for I was close by him when he thus discoursed with himself aloud and all alone) How can this amorous Artamenes be in any hopes to be favoured as you desire, if Mandana do not know him? Would you Sir have the most vertuous and glorious Princesse of the world to love you, before she knows so much as that you love her? And would you, replied Artamenes, have this most glorious and vertuous Princesse indure that I only as Artamenes should speak unto her upon terms of love? No Sir, (said I) but Artamenes is Cyrus: This is reason (replied he) but is there not as much danger in appearing Cyrus, as Artamenes? As Artamenes, she will perhaps only put me off with a little pitty, but as Cyrus she will punish me with hatred and anger: But however, answered I, if you will ever be beloved, you must some way or other let her know you love her, otherwise you will never bring it to passe; Though you should gain a hundred Battels, and Conquer as many Kingdoms and Empires, after all your Victories and Conquests you will never triumph in the heart of Mandana, unlesse you make Mandana know that she triumphs in yours. Love Sir, can never be gotten without love: The Princesse will commend you; she will esteem you, but never love you: for indeed Sir, all your great acts which you have performed, relates only unto your self; the Conquest of your own heart is that which belongs to her, and which will only please her: If you desire that your Victories should become serviceable un|to you, let her know that she hath vanquished the Conquerour of them all: and that he whom none could resist, is captivated by her charms and beauty. But Teraulas (said he to me) how dare I speak to her of it? and how can I chuse but be affrighted at the anger of a Lady whose modesty is extream? and whose vertue is severe even to the very height of rigour? I do not say Sir, replied I, that it is convenient to speak unto the Princesse down-right and openly of love; but only to give her such an easie taste as that she may guesse at the rest: But if in guessing at it (replied he) she should chance to hate me, what would then become of me? Fear it not (replied I) and know Sir for certain, that love was never the cause of hatred: Mandana may perhaps command you to be silent; and perhaps she may reject you, but she cannot hate you for loving her: The manner, Sir, of making her to understand it may indeed be something dangerous; and therefore in discovering your love unto her, you must not hint a word of your being beloved: you must not ask any thing; nor hope nor pretend unto the least favour; only comfort your self in making your disease known unto her who is the cause of it; and as long as you car|ry it only so Sir, believe me, it is hard for her to hate you, let her vertue be never so selvere: Indeed, said I, as long as Mandana does not know you love her, it is a question whether ever she will love you; yet on the contrary, if you let her guesse at your passion, perhaps in spite of all her rigour she will love you: But Teraulas, said he to me, what if she should banish me? No, no, (said I to him) never fear any such rough treatment: So many great actions as you have done, will plead unto her in your behalf, so that she cannot be so inhumane, and if I be not extremely deceived, the businesse will work better then you imagine. So Sir after this manner, a good part of the night was spent in reasoning upon the matter between Artamenes and me: Artamenes resolved to find some fit opportunity, of making his passion known unto the Princesse, without any point-blank expressions of it: But alas, whilst we were hamering out this resolution, Mandana took a quite contrary course to our expectations, and defeated our plot. I told you Sir, how she retired into her melancholly closet, whither she was no sooner entred, but she called for her confident Page 7 Martesia, and asked her what Artamenes said unto her, whilst she was speaking with the King her father in the entrance into Philidaspes his house? for she had an eye upon them when they discoursed: This Lady was obedient, and told her word for word all the discourse; and adding her own thoughts unto those of my master; for my part Madam (said she to the Princesse) considering the manner how Artamenes answered me, when I desired to know whether or no he was in love, and whom he loved; I do verily think he is in love: Mandana blusht at the word, for she her self began already to suspect some such thing: But she being desirous to pump the thoughts of Martesia without discovering her own: With whom (asked she) do you think it is that he is in love, with me? Madam (answered Martesia) I have thought so ever since; though my own reason could not absolutely con|sent unto it: For truly, Artamenes visits not any solicitously, he does not so much as speak unto any of my companions, but only as far as common civility requires: he passes away all the day with the King or you; and if Artamenes were of any other quality then he is, he might easily be supposed to be in love. For Madam (said she to her, quaking a little) Artamenes looks upon none but you, nor speaks unto any else; he commends you, he esteems you, and it may almost be directly said he adores you. He follows you to the Temple; he walks, he hunts with you, and waits upon you to all publique feasts: when the King your Father comes to you, he is sure to come with him; and though the King comes not, yet he never failes: He blushes as oft as he comes near you, or when you are alone where he is; Indeed said she laughing, If Artamenes were a King, or the Princesse Mandana, Martesia, I should believe he were in love with her: I think (said the Prin|cesse, interrupting her) that Artamenes has done you some ill office or other, for if you should perswade me of the truth of what you tell me, you may well conceive he can never be happy, nor could you ever find out a worse way to be revenged of him. I should be very sorry Madam, (replied Martesia assuming a more serious look) to be a cause of any ill unto Artamenes; But as your interests are more dear unto me Madam, then his; I thought it my duty to tell you, that I knew not whether it were not worth your pains Madam, to observe his actions, some certain days, that my doubts might be made more clear unto you. The Princesse blusht at this discourse more then she did before; and lessening her voice as if she were afraid, that Martesia unto whom she spoke should hear her; As you are wise and discreet (said she to her) I confesse that since this morning, I have had some suspicion of what you say, and I am possessed with such confused thoughts, lest Artamenes should discover any of his folly, as I cannot expresse my self; for truly in one minute I have ob|served a hundred things which before I took no notice of; or to expresse my self better, I look upon them after another manner then I did before. Do you Remember Martesia, the first day he saw me, after he had saved the life of the King my father? Did you not then think that he looked upon me with an extraordinary observant eye, and full of passion, how also he did not so much as look upon any one of those beanties which were then in my company? have you not forgot, after what a fashion he desired me to obtain permission from the King, to fight with his enemies, and after what a manner he took his leave of me? Did you not further observe him when I desired him not to wear those remarkable Arms? Did you not see, I say, after what kind of odd manner he denied me? and with what an amiable air he asked the scarfe which I refused? in what termes he did interpret it, when I told him, I wisht Artamenes would neither be too prudent, nor too rash? It is not possible Madam (said he to me) that I can regulate my thoughts, according to that Madam which you desire. Do you not remember also since the day that Philidaspes and he, came together to bid me adieu? For my part I do now admire that I should at that time interpret the inquietudes which I then saw in his face no better: Do you not yet further remember the joy which appeared in the eyes Artamenes at his return? and also that converse which I had with him and Philidaspes? But above all the rest, (said she) do you remember what were the resentments of Artamenes when I would have obliged him to love Philidaspes? For my part (said Martesia, interrupting her) I think Madam, by all which you have remembred, and by a thousand other trivial passages, which I have particularly observed, and which you could not see, that Artamenes is not only in love, but that he is also jealous of Philidaspes; and that perhaps, Philidaspes is in love with you as well as Artamenes. You are not too wise (said the Princesse to her) to let me hear of too many injuries at once: No Martesia, no, Philidaspes is only ambitious, and for my own quiets sake I would not suspect him of any other humour; That would be too many crimes to punish, especially for one who loves not to inflict any punishments at all; therefore let us not think upon any Page 8 but Artamenes: But for that (said she) some handsome order must be taken; and if it be possible, I must prevent receiving such a sensible displeasure, for indeed I do esteem Artamenes very much; I have many obligations upon me to him, and I should be very sorry to be put unto any necessity of treating him ill: Therefore Martesia, I command you to be continually near me, and cause all the rest of your companions to be so also; and leave me not alone at any time; It cannot now be long before he depart, and the time of drawing into the field comes one, therefore this constraint will not Continue long. After this she dismissed Martesia, and remained alone in her closet; But oh heavens, what vexing and tyrannical thoughts did toss her mind? that smooth tranquillity which heretofore was regent in her mind, did now no more visit her turbulent soul; yet she continued in that resolution which she fixed upon with Martesia. You may judge then Sir, how difficult it was for Artamenes to execute his design of discovering his passion unto the Princesse, since she had obstructed all those ways which formerly were wont to be open. For three weeks together, it was carried so handsomly, that he did not think Mandana to be at all accessory to it; he rather thought it to be unluckie chance which caused it: yet as oft as he be|thought himself of how many favourable opportunities he had let slip, mavgre the assidui|ty of Philidaspes, he was almost in absolute despair; But when he bethought himself again, how that it was not now Philidaspes who prevented the execution of his designe resolved upon, he thought it then onely the malignity of his destiny: But so it was, that he was not long without this obstacle also; for within twenty dayes after, the King and the prin|cesse did visit Philidaspes; he came to present his thanks, and to take up the same room about Mandana as he was accustomed before; therefore Martesia was not so much neces|sitated to attendance; and now Artamenes did quite despair of ever getting an occasion to discourse particularly with his princesse. There passed many general discourses, where|in Mandana did let Artamenes know, how dangerous a designe his was to talk of any love; for though it was but in speeches by the by, addressed unto another, yet she so explained her thoughts, as he could not chuse but think, they related unto him, considering the me|thod and decorum of her words, and therefore he concluded, that to discover his passion unto the Princesse were to expose himself unto danger: The difficulty which he resented, and had not foreseen, caused in him most sensible sorrow; and it night well be said, though his tongue was tied, and did not speak of any love unto the Princesse, yet all his actions spoke plainly for him; so that as I knew since by Martesia; his dumb eloquence was well understood: and the Princesse did interpret his perplexities, his melancholie, his impatience, the alteration in his countenance, and his musings, as they ought to be; so that she doubted not at all but Artamenes was passionately in love with her. Here Sir, may be admired, how fallible is all humane prudence; for if my Master had then spoke unto the Princesse of any love, considering how things then stood, hee had irrecoverably been un|done; for then she would have ever treated him but badly; and doubtlesse would have for ever banished him from her; notwithstanding all the esteem she had of him, and not|withstanding all the great services he had done unto the King her father: But because he spoke not a word of it unto her, yet patiently endured and still had her in amorous reve|rence, the Princesse had pity of him, and whether she would or no, did entertain into her heart, such a tendernes of him, as might perhaps be phrased love; not that this vertuous Princess did think it so, for if she, doubtlesse she had surmounted her self whatso|soever came of it: nor that she did with any heed observe her self; but because love car|ries with it such a blinding quality, as that the clearest judgements cannot look about them, and which hinders them who are possessed with it both from knowing others and themselves also: Sometimes she would ask her self many odd questions, which she her self could not precisely answer: she would oftentimes wonder, that Artamenes whether she would or not should come into her thoughts; and why since she knew of his love, she should not be more angry: Why (said she unto her self) should I permit a man who comes into the Court but as a common ordinary Cavalier to love me, and I endure his sight and company? Ah no, no Mandana, this strict severe vertue, whereof you make profession, must not endure it; And though 'tis true, that love can never be without hope, yet it befits me to punish Artamenes for his rashnesse and folly, for what can he ever hope for, without a wrong unto me? what can he desire without extravagancie? and what can he ask me, without offence? But alas, said she, he has told me nothing that does an|ger me, nor indeed ought to anger me: he asks me nothing which can displease me; I owe unto him the life of the King my father; and the King owes many victories unto Page 9 him; and perhaps I owe unto him, the joy of my dayes, since it is to be beleevied, that the King of Pontus would have been victorious but for him; and then, I should either have been his wife or his prisoner; Let me not therefore hate Artamenes because he loves me; and since he speaks nothing to me of his love, let not me speak any thing unto him of my anger. Alas (said she sometimes unto Martesia) why should Artamenes have any such thoughts in his minde? why does he not keep within the limits of a good esteem? For my part Madam, (said Martesia to her) I think you know not well what you say; nor I cannot imagine what kind of vertue that is, which takes up your soul, and had rather that Artamenes should not love you at all, then that he should love you as he does, as long as he does not speak of it unto you. You put me very much to it Martesia, (replied the Princesse) yet notwithstanding I will tell you, that I do so much esteem Artamenes, as in consideration of himself I ought alwayes for his own tranquillities sake, to wish that he were not in love with me: I know indeed Madam, (replied Martesia) that in consideration of himself, you ought to wish his tranquillity, but I know also very well, that in consideration of your self, the same is in some sort advantagious to you, to see the Gallantest man of the world, and the most accomplished in all things, to esteem and love you, even to the height of adoration. I doubt not (replied Mandana) it is honourable unto me, and I must tell you, that honour is it which I prefer before all the earth; But Martesia I would have him keep within the limits of esteem, and observe such a friendship, as a man of his condition ought to keep unto one of mine; Tell me Madam, I conjure you (said Martesia) whether it would please you, that Artamenes, who loves you so well, should love any other better then he does you? Indeed you put me into a Dilemma (replied the Princesse;) But I alwayes thought, that though Artamenes esteemed me more then any in the world, yet I would not care if he did love me a little lesse. Ha Madam, (replied Mar|tesia) you abuse your self, and one cannot have that indifferency to the affection of those whose esteem they desire: Indeed Madam, it would be a great wrong unto you, that he, who of all men in the world, has most spirit and judgement, should not esteem you most of all the earth. Pray Madam, what does the illustrious Artamenes want? A Crown (replied the Princesse blushing) and let that suffice Martesia, to make me fear the passion of any man who is not a King, and to hold all his future actions in suspi|tion, and indeed to make me more then my self: For truly (said she) I have an enemy, which holds secret intelligence in my heart, and bids me love him, if one invincible Remora were removed; which doubtlesse does forbid me Artamenes and all his high accomplishments, and causes me, maugre his love, his merit, and my own resentments, to keep my own liberty entire. Thus Sir, was the state of things at that time: Artamenes was deep in love, and durst not tell: Philidaspes was no lesse amorous, nor lesse close, being for diverse reasons engaged to disguise his thoughts: Ciaxares loved them both, but Artamenes incomparably more then Philidaspes: And Mandana, though she knew it not, did doubtlesse love my Master a little, and esteem Philidaspes, although his humorous disposition did much lessen it. At this time the Son unto the King of Armenia, called Tygranes, came to the Court of Cappadocia: A great league of friendship sprung between him and Artamenes. Me an time, the spring approaching, certain intelligence was brought, that the confederate Kings had already drawn their Armies into the field: This news hastened on all the new levies, and all requisite orders were given to prepare all things in a readiness to receive the enemy in a short time: One Brigade of the Army was already in the plain of Ceracia, yet in all likelihood, it was not in any condition to resist the King of Pontus, and the King of Phrygia, although they were advantageously entrenched. Now see, Artamenes constrained to depart, and to depart without power to reveal that he loved; this was no small disgust unto him: He went in all haste to take leave of the Princesse, because second intelligence came which assured Ciaxares that this Army was ready to be shut up, between the King of Pontus forces, and a puissant Recrute come out of Phrygia in a few dayes; so that my Master, not having time to stay a minute, lest he should come too late, was forced to depart abruptly, and to lock up all his passion in his heart; yet for all that it appeared plain enough in his eyes, and he signified it sufficiently unto the Princesse by his sorrows. Go Artamenes (said she to him, in bidding him adieu) and be as happy as you have been; if you will oblige the King my father, have not a greater care to vanquish his enemies, then to preserve your own life. Mandana spoke this before all the people, so that Artamenes durst return her no other answer, then as all the rest there did; that was, with much reverence and acknowledgement: then he left her, without any further explaining himself, then by stolen looks, Page 10 and restrained sighes, half cut off in the middle, as soon as they were breathed: As for Philidaspes, his turn was not yet to go, for he was to command those troops which were not yet in readiness: But my Master went, and was followed by all the young Gallantry of the Court, who upon this occasion, which in all appearances was like to be full of danger, did set out themselves in the bravest Equipage; The Prince Tigranes would needs be one, and ranked himself amongst the Volunteers of whom he was chief: We made all possible haste, but since Artamenes was not thoroughly informed concerning the enemies, and how they lay, when we came within fifty furlongs of the Plain of Ceracia, he sent out Chrisantes with a Party of ten or twelve onely, to enquire of news, and to know whether all the Passes were open or shut, and whether the Armie was inclosed between the King of Pontus, and those Auxiliaries from Phrygia: Mean time, he made a halt, at a small uninhabited village, where they might defend themselves, in case the enemies Scouts came upon them: We found hid, amongst the old ruines of the Town some poor Pesants, who told us for certain, that the Confederated Kings had two mighty Armies, and that if our Army were not hemmed in, it would be presently. Artamenes, finding the state of the war, to stand upon as bad termes as the state of his love, was vexed beyond all expression. He could not endure to hear that those enemies which he had formerly conquered, should now be in a likely condition to Conquer. He absolutely resolved to die a thousand deaths, rather then to survive a defeat. No, no (said he in himself) I cannot ever look the Princesse in her fair face after a beating; and if ill fortune will needs have it so, that I must be beaten, then there is no way but to prepare for death: I (I say) who after all my great Victories, durst never approach her presence but with trembling; nor ever had so much confidence, after I had conquered Kings, to let her know I was her slave: But (oh heavens) must I die, and Mandana not know that I die for her? And can I not have so much sad consolation, as to hope, that she shall not be ignorant of all those torments that I have endured since the first time I saw her? Perhaps when she understands my love, by hearing of my death, that the knowledge of it will not then incense her soul, and easily pardon a man, who in losing his life did not lose his devotions to her; Let me tell her then by my death, that I lived not but for her: And to lessen my crime, let me acquaint her with my condition, though not absolutely to know who I am; It will be enough she know that Artamenes is of a Royall extract, without knowing that Cyrus and Artamenes are the same; Let me not be my self the obstacle which shall hinder her from that compassion which I expect from her goodness, nor stop those tears which I hope will flow from the tenderness of her heart: I know well enough (said he) that the delights of the grave are least sensible, but however, if I lose the Battle and my life, I shall more delightfully lose them both, by virtue of this hope, and I shall murmur lesse at the rigour of my Destinie. This thought Sir, did so flatter his despair, that presently he set himself to write unto the Princesse, and to discover that unto her which he had so long, so carefully concealed. After he had writ, and read, and over-read the Letter, he sealed it, and calling me in private, Teraulas (said he to me) you must do me a piece of very important service, and do it with all possible exactnesse. Sir, said I to him, I should esteem my self very happy, if I could find that which I have so long looked for, and would gladly make you know my zeal unto your service: You may doubtlesse (said he) but I fear that the courage of Teraulas will fail and deny me, and I shall have much ado to persuade him, not to fight at this time. I confesse Sir, (said I to him) I cannot easily conceive, what it is you would command me; and it is a hard task for me, not to partake of that danger unto which you expose your self. Yet it must be so, (said he to me) consider me either as your Master, your Prince, or your Friend, and deny me no more; you know (said he with abundance of sweetness) that I am well acquainted with the courageous heart of Teraulas, and I need no more testimonies of his valour; therefore let not that trouble you, and believe it, you can never in all your life so much oblige me, as you may at this time: Though indeed I might perhaps command you to do what I desire, yet upon this occasion I will earnestly intreat you. At these words, I was not able to endure any longer; Sir, (said I to him) you make me wonder extremely, therefore I beseech you defer no longer, but tell me presently what I must do, that I may as presently obey you. You must not fight at all my dear Teraulas, (said he) but always keep in that Quarter which is freest from any danger, and there expect the event of the fight, which we intend shall be presently: If so it chance, that I fall, and die, as certainly I will, if I be vanquished, then go you in all haste, and carry this Letter unto Mandana; and let her say what she will, tell her not that I am Cyrus; you may Page 11 declare my Quality, but not directly the place of my birth; This is all, my dear Teraalas, that I would have you do, and fail me not I conjure you; be as faithful to me in this business as ever you have wont to be. Sir, (said I to him) with tears in eyes, this is most cruel, that I should receive a command, which I must not execute until after your death <...> But I hope Sir, Fortune will ordain it otherwise, I wish it may (answered he) but it is not likely: Yet however do not you fail in that which I desire you, said he embracing him, and testifie unto me, that there is no service so difficult, which you will not performe for me: I promised him Sin, to do all I could, and how could I deny a Prince that was extremely troubled, and in love, and also staggering in his resolutions? Presently after, Chrisantes returned, and brought two prisoners with him which he had taken, and who told Artamenes that the King of Phrygia's Army would not come up until the next day; and that the King of Pontus Army, in which was the King of Phrygia himself, would decline fighting until the other Army was joyned with it, and then they would infallibly surround the Cappadocean Army, and between them both, hem it in: Artamenes was very glad of the news; and to understand from Chrisantes, how he had discovered a Passe which the enemies did not guard, where he might easily convey his men. Chrisantes had no sooner brought this intelligence, but we immediately took horse, and marched with so much haste, and so happily, that night favouring our designe, and concealing our motion, we came unto the Camp undiscovered or meeting any. I will not stand to tell you Sir, how great was the joy of all the Officers and Souldiers when they saw Artamenes; him whom they looked upon as a God, and beleaved invincible: As soon as he arrived he took a view of the Army, which he found not to exceed the number of sixteen thousand men: so that though indeed these Troops were the best of all Cappadocia, yet Artamenes thought himself very hard put to it. For the King of Pontus Army which had quitted their trenches and Garrisons, and whose vanguard was within sight of my Masters Army, consisted of twenty thousand men, and those which were to joyn with them, were fifteen thousand men effectually. Finding himself then brought unto this extremity, and supposing that his enemy would force him to fight, before Ciaxares could be advertized of it, he resolved upon as bold an enterprize as ever any did. Besides those reasons which I have already related, he had one more, which in my opinion was of no small consideration: He knew that Philidaspes, would exasperate the King to make all haste, and would come with all those Regiments which were ready to march, but Artamenes would not suffer him to have so much advantage as to engage himself in so great a danger. After serious consideration of the business, he called a Council of War: But the opinion of Artamenes was always the resolution of every one, and how hard and difficult soever, it found no contradiction: He told all the Commanders, that if they were once surrounded by the King of Pontus, and the King of Phrygia's Armies, there would be no safety for them, but if possible they must fight them severally: That if they should fall upon the King of Pontus Army first, it was to be feared that the enemy would decline it, and delay until the Phrygian Army came up, whilst we were busied with them, and so infallibly defeat us: That if we should stay still in our Trenches, and rely upon Relief, doubtlesse they would be forced out before Ciaxares could come to them: so that considering the state of all things, the best course was to fall upon the Phrygian Army, unperceived by the King of Pontus; and that to be effected according as he had already contrived: That our Army being more in number then theirs, and theirs tired out with a tedious march, they might easily be defeated: after which, perhaps we should be upon even termes to fight the King of Pontus; So Sir, all that Artamenes propounded, was approved of and followed: He sent out a Party to stop that Passe, where the Phrygian Army was to march: And being certainly informed that this very night they would encamp some thirty furlongs off, as soon as night came on, he and his Army began to march silently, without either Trumpet, Drum, or any noise; and left in his own Camp, onely a small guard, some hangers on, and such as could not fight, commanding them that as soon as he was a pretty way off, they should kindle many fires, thereby to deceive the enemy, and take away all suspicion of his enterprize, from the King of Pontus. I staid Sir, in the Camp against my will, with an absolute command from Artamenes, that if I saw him not return the next morning, then to go presently unto Sinope, and acquit my self of my charge: Not Sir, that you should think, a Camp wherein almost none were, was a place of any security; but because Artamenes had hopes his designe would succeed, but if it did not, then I might more easily and safely retire, as soon as I heard of his death: Yet Sir, though I went not with my Page 12 master, I knew all the passages of this dangerous adventure: But not to forget any thing which I saw, let me tell you how Artamenes before his departure did encourage his Officers and Souldiers; how he embraced them, flattered them, commended them, and promised mighty matters to them.

Now is the time, my dear Companions (said he to them) when I must remember you of your Ancient virtues, and bid you fight with as much fury, as if all the world were spectators of your actions: I cannot now look upon your valours, neither will this dark night let me shew you what you should do by my own example: I cannot exasperate you by my voice, since our design is to surprize an enemy in the obscurity of night, and vanquish them before they awake: your selves must be the only witnesses of your own valours and fidelity. Never think that darkness can cover either our valour or our cowardize: It will be known do what we can: The victory of our enemies, if they do get it, will testifie what you do. And on the contrary, when I see your hands full of bloody spoils of dead Phrygians to morrow at the break of day, and all their Ensigns broken, then shall I testifie on your behalfs what you have done: These are the signs, my friends, which must speak your actions; and these are the marks by which you shall know my own valour.

After these words, all the Commanders and Souldiers did lift up their spears and swords to testifie their approbation, and by a silent kind of confused noise, did assure my master that they would punctually obey him. Then they began to march with all alacrity and speed; and after he had put about him a white scarf to be known by in the dark of night, they went upon this expedition, without any other arms then spears and swords, because bows and arrows were uselesse in the dark of night. Artamenes was so fortunate as to find his enemies fast asleep, which did not a little facilitate his enterprize: Since they knew the King of Pontus's army did wait upon ours, they could not dream how it was possible they should be surprized; So that they slept securely without any fear of Quarters being beaten up: Their first Guard did not fail in their duty; but it was so quickly repelled, that before the souldiers were awake, or could rank themselves under their Colours, or get into any posture of defence, they were many of them killed. He who commanded these forces, was called Imbas, and was very valiant; he made it appear upon this occasion that he was so, since notwithstanding this surprize and disorder of his Army, he had rallied a very considerable body together, and did so gallantly entertain Artamenes, that for a while he was in hopes of victory. The like was never heard of, as those who were in the combat did report; for after the first shock was over, wherein Artamenes had commanded all silence to be observed, he began to make himself known by his voice, to the end he might encourage his men; and as all did answer him in a Triumphant and mortal language, they made so great and terrible a din; that the enemy thought themselves very ill informed, and guessed us to be at least thirty thousand men. The night, though dark, because there was no Moon, yet not so obscure by reason of a starry firmament, but one might perceive another. And in this gloomy light, Artamenes failed not to keep good order in that combat which was so full of confusion and disorder. As he found that there was yet a good close body to contend with, and which stoutly resisted him, he doubted whether Imbas whom he knew to be a man of courage, and commanded this Army, could be found or no; but since he could not directly see how to assault him, he bethought himself of a project which took effect: He spoke as loud as ever he could, these words; If the valiant Imbas would be victorious, why does he not come out and fight with Artamenes, and dispute with him for the victory in person? This language caused Imbas to come unto him with a drawn sword; I did not think (said he) I had such an illustrious enemy so near me, nor so lawful an excuse for my defeat if it chance; at these words they fell to work, and fought, and often charged that none should part them; but in conclusion, my master being stronger, and more fortunate, he struck the sword of Imbas out of his hand, and seizing upon his bridle, threatened to kill him if he did not render himself: Imbas being in that condition, without more ado redressed himself; and Artamenes committing him to the guard of four souldiers, went to consummate the conquest which yet remained: The Cavalry of Artamenes trod the Phrygian Page 13 Infantry under their horses feet; And almost all the Cappadocian Infantry were become Cavalry; for in the disorder, as the Phrygians were taking horse, our men killed them, and got into their saddles, riding their horses against their masters friends; some exchanged their natural sleep for an eternal nap: others half armed, defended themselves as well as they could; some again, took the advantage of the nights obscurity and fled for shame; others without any arms did obstinately dispute for their lives, and all in generall was in a mighty confusion. In conclusion, Sir, after two hours dispute Artamenes found none to fight with; and sounding a Retreat, every one repaired to his Colours, and altogether returned to the Camp. This enterprize was so judiciously contrived, and so happily executed, that at break of day I saw Artamenes return in the head of his Troops; who calling unto those who guarded his prisoner, suffered him to march by him: My master held a sword in his hand which he had forced from one of his enemies, and Imbas who knew it, assured him that it was the sword of his Lieutenant General: Never was beheld a more magnificent triumph then this; there was not a Captain nor Souldier which had not some Trophee of Victory in his hand: Some had Phrygian bucklers; others suites of bloody arms; some ensigns half broken; others whole bundles of spears upon their shoulders: Some had the heads of dead souldiers which they carried by the hair, and a great number brought chained prisoners. The Prince Tigranes had two ensigns of his enemies which he had forced from them; and there was not one but could shew an assured mark that he was in combat: when Artamenes saw them all, he was extremely joy'd, & commended and cherished them; and to make his word good, he shewed them the General of their enemies which he had taken prisoner; also the sword of their Lieutenant General which he had forced from him. Artamenes was thus in his Triumphant conceits, when news was brought, that there appeared about fifty men on horses, from Sinope side: he sent out a party to discover who they were; but it was found to be Philidaspes, who being envious at Artamenes honour, was come from Court without leave; and could not endure that his Rival should be in any dangerous adventure wherein he was not: yet I think, Sir, that he repented himself of his forwardnesse, when he understood that he was not to have any share in that victory which was got without him. He came unto Artamenes when all the Commanders and Souldiers held their gallant Trophees in their hands, and when he knew how squares went by that Party which was sent out to meet him, he had a mind to go no further; yet civility would not permit him to return: My master no sooner saw him but he was troubled; yet notwithstanding, there was never man more sweet, and civil after a Victory, then he, and he went to meet him: Judge Philidaspes (said he to him) what we should have done if you had been with us, seeing we have done thus much in your absence: I know not (answered he) whether I should have been partaker of your glory, but I am sure I should have been a partaker of your peril: There is enough of that yet (replied Artamenes) since we have yet an Army of twenty thousand men before us to fight with: The first victory you have got, (answered Philidaspes) is it not a certain omen or a second, and perhaps in participating of the peril with you, I shall be no partaker of the glory? we shall presently see that (answered Artamenes) for I do not think it good to <◇> our enemy fortifie himself before we fight him. We must make the best benefit we can <◇> those favours which fortune affords us; she is a capricious Lady and would not be slighted, and sometimes withdraws her favours for ever, if they be not taken when she presents them; you are better acquainted with her then I am, (answered Philidaspes) who never yet received any good from her: Let us see (replied Artamenes who was a little nettled at this discourse) whether the good or the bad which I have received, hath brought me to that acquaintance: After this, turning towards the Commanders and Souldiers, and speaking unto them with so much boldnesse, and such pleasant eyes, as seemed a happy presage.

Certainly (said he to them) my brave Companions, Conquerours are never weary: Tell me, were ye not more weary before, then since you have vanquished your enemies? But my dear companions, let us not deceive our selves, for we have yet only begun to Conquer, and we must second that good beginning, as long as there is any to oppose us: Let not the number of your enemies affright you, for I can assure you, that we are more terrible to them then they ought to be unto us: It being a more difficult task to fight with souldiers accustomed Page 14 to Conquer, then with those that never fought. The noise of our Victory has animated our Army, and fainted the hearts of our enemies: Fear and Terror has half defeated them before we come at them; and if my conjectures do not much deceive me, this second Victory will come at as easie a rate as the first: The presence of the valiant Philidaspes will render it more facile; and fortune which alwayes favours bold and dangerous enterprises, will not forsake us in this. Come on my brave Companions, let us go, for if you love difficulties, you will never be without honour; and if you expose your selves to ease, you will never be in safety, but put your enemies into a condition to be alwayes as thornes in your sides.

As soon as Artamenes had ended his Oration, all the Officers and Souldiers did applaud the resolution he had taken: In pursuance whereof, he took a Muster of his Army, to see how many he had lost; and he found wanting only five hundred men, though he had defeated sixteen thousand: After this he commanded them all to take a little repose, and within two hours after to prepare for Combate: Mean while he treated Philidaspes with all civility: But as he would have the reports of this first victory animate his Army, and be a foundation for a second; he sent back to the King of Phrygia, Imbas his Lieutenant General whom he had defeated, and took prisoner, as I formerly told you; commanding the Herald which was to conduct him to tell that Prince, how gallantly this valiant man had defended himself; and had given such testimony of a noble soul during his disgrace, that he would not do him the displeasure to keep him Prisoner during the Battle; nor deprive himself of that honour to vanquish him the second time, if good fortune failed not: Philidaspes hearing him say so, could not forbear contradicting him, and told him, that this man might be made use of after the Battle, if the successe should not be fortunate: If we be overcome (replied Artamenes) we shall have no use of prisoners, since then we shall be either dead or prisoners our selves, and those whom we have already taken, will then be released in spite of our teeth: And if we be Conquerours (said he) then all will be in our own power: But it must be acknowledged (replied Philidaspes) that you have given a valiant man unto your enemies: 'Tis true, replied Artamenes, but in giving that one we have released many which otherwise should have guarded him: yet so it was Sir, that my master did what he pleased, and Philidaspes was silent: Mean while the King of Pontus and the King of Phrygia were extremely surprized, when at break of day they were advertised in their Tents of the great shouts of joy which were heard in Artamenes his Army, and that many Phrygian Ensigns were seen there. These Princes having seen the fires in the campos of their enemies all the night long could not imagine how it was possible, they should fight and defeat the forces which they expected: Neither could they believe that Imbas would betray his King & countrie, and take part with the Cappadocians. Soe that in their incertainties they neither knew what to think or say: All the Captaines and Souldiers were no lesse troubled: and all together concluded that things went not well: But as they were sending out to know what the matter was, they saw Imbas arrive, who being moved by his own generosity and intending to excuse his defeate by the valour of his enemies, did so much extol their courage, and magnified Artamenes so highly, that he struck terror into the souls of all who heard him: you have said enough, (answered the King of Pontus) to take away the dishonour of your defeate, in saying it was Artamenes who overcame you: And it is enough (said the King of Phrygia) to oblige us not to flie such an enemy, who if wee be vanquished by him it is no dishonour: Tell then Artamenes (said the King of Phrygia unto the Herald) that we will prepare to receive him as he deserves, and if we can, render him favour for favour, and endeavour to be in that condition as at our return we shall send him prisoners after the Battle. Meane while, Artamenes was resolved to finish this warr at this bout, and neglected nothing which might Conduce to his happinesse, he met not a captaine unto whom he did not promise some recompence from the King: He never saw a common on souldier passe by, whom he did not call by his name; and unto whom he did not bestow some obliging language: He did inspire into them all both by his words and by his actions, such an ardent desire of glory, that he was hard able to restraints them, such was his powerfull art to invite mens hearts, and make himself absolute master of their mindes. After then all the Troopes had solaced themselves with a slight repast, and offered a sacrifice unto the Gods, Page 15 in the head of their Armie: Artamenes marched straight to the enemy in Battalia, with Prince Tigranes and Philidaspes who would not leave him, to the end that Artamenes should doe nothing which he did not doe as well as hee. I Confesse Sir, that when I saw things in that condition; I could not resolve any longer obedience unto the command of Artamenes, but I put in amongst this young gallantrie of the court, which made up a Troop of Voluntiers, and followed my master. But yet I know not how he got a sight of me, and as soone as he spied me, he made a signe with his hand; then I quit my rank; and as he came forward to me some fifteen or twenty paces, Sir (said I coming to him) I beseech you give me leave to fight: No no (answered he) I will not; and your disobedience has angered me: I have done Sir, (said I) since you will not permit it, and I will reit my self. However Terasus (said he) if I die at this time, you may assure the Princesse that the day of my death was a bloody day unto my enemies, & that in one day I was both Conqueror & conquered, after these words my deare & best master, commanded me aloud to observe his orders, to the end that none should think worse of my Courage and my retreat, which otherwise might have been blemished: After this I left him, and he marched to wards the Enemy, who did prepare to receive him. They endeavoured to perswade their Souldiers, that the former defeat of their Troops would be advantageous to them, since they had so wearied their Enemies as they must needs be weak; yet for all that, say what they could, the very name of Artamenes, did more daunt them, then all the good language of the Princes could encourage them: Meane while, both armies seemed to be inspired with the same spirit and the same furie they both advanced, & loyne; the Aire is obscured with Arrows: the breaking of which, as they met, and clast one against another, added a terrible noise to the martiall harmonie: These first blowes on both sides, did redouble their ardent desires of vanquishing in the hearts of both parties: After they had emptied their Quivers, Bowes were uselesse, and they draw nearer; those whose armes were spears did push them with furious violence: swords followed presently after: And both sides coming to handy blowes, all behave themselves like valiant souldiers, lead on by valiant commanders, and now begins the mortall milleanie: Every one fights, every one would vanquish, & every one is both assaulted & assaulter: The left wing of Artamenes his army, did foile the right of the Confederate Kings: And the right of the Princes did much shake the left of Artamenes: as for him, he did not only doe according as he was accustomed, but he did that which never was done: The Prince Tigranes did also signall himself at this time: Philidaspes after their example, did all that could be expected from a man of a great soule: & my master himself, has often told me, notwithstanding his hate of him, that he deserved immortal prayes: It is no wonder therefore if the lesser army get the better of the greater; having three such extraordinary men in it which sustained it. It must be confessed, that the getting of the Battle deserves to be wholly Atributed unto Artamenes. Not only because a hundred times more valiantly then any other: Not onlly because he gave out orders with more excellency of iudgment then any other: Not only because he did extremely animate his Souldiers: whom he often rallied: whom he often Supported; whom he often defended, and was in every place where need was; but also because he did on thing which put more enemies to rout then any thing that all others did: My dear and invincible master who was resolved to vanquish or dy, and to preserve the honour of his first victory, which he knew he should Lose if he lost this Battle, and would be accused for hazarding it too much: Artamenes, I say; who would eyther Trylumph or Perish, did not now study to pick out enemies to fight with, and spare their Blood, as almost alwayes he used, thinking it better to hazard being wounded by endeavouring to take valiant men prisoners, then to kill them, as he easily could have done: But now at this time, he fell upon all that stopt his passage: he wounded all which did not render themselves, and killed all that obstinately resisted him: Meeting then with a body of horse which stood firm, he charged them; he foiled them, and made them fly, not observing that the King of Pontus, that generous Rivall, whom he so much esteemed and loved, was he which made most resistances, But having wounded him in the right arme, and this Prince being out of Combate, and out of hopes to be relieved, since he was so compassed about with the Souldiers of Artamenes: Seeing himself, I say, in this condition, and knowing my Master, he had rather render himself unto him then any other: and in this thought, seeing himself prest on every side, and ready to Perish: I must render my self Artamenes (said this wounded Prince) I must submit and confesse you deserve to conquer: At these words, Artamenes knowing him, came neer, and seeing he could not lift his sword, Page 16 he despersed those who pressed upon him; you yeeld rather unto my fortune then my valour, (replied he) But however, I must make use of by good fortune, and will endeavour to shew you that it is accompanied with some vertue; in saying so, he turned towards Chrisantes, who fought alwayes neer him, and putting the King of Pontus, into his charge, goe Chrilsantes said he, Conduct the King unto our Camp: for he will be better waited upon there then in his own, where all is in confusion; but look to him, (said he) as a Prince who would have been our Conqueror, if al his souldiers were as valiant as himself. Chrisantes obeying my Master, and guarded by two hundred horse, did convey the King of Pontus: to whom Artamenes said in parting with him, with much Civility, Sir, I would goe my self to wait upon you, if the necessity of my office would permit me. But since I see some of your Soul[d]iers with Arms in their hands, your Majestie will pardon me if I leave you, and goe to put my self into such a condition, as I may return with more reverence and leisure to serve you: at these words, stooping as low as the skirt of his saddle, he turned his horse; And this Conquered Prince, Submitting himself to the law of a Conqueror, who treated him with so good a grace, and followed Chrisantes, not at all then King of his liberty: yet the King of Phrygia, coming presently after to know that the King of Pontus was taken pris[o]ner, began to be in a mighty fury, and though he was not now much above the age of a young man, yet was he Master of much vigour, and Generositie; so that apprehending this losse, he doubled his strength in his endeavours to repair it: he mustered together as many men as he could, and went himself into places fullest of danger: Artamenes being informed where this Prince did fight, went thither, and tooke as many of his men with him as he met in the way, and began a fresh combate: Nothing was to be seen in all places, but dead, and dying men, Souldiers throwing away their Armes either to Render them[selves] or fly. And the victory was clearly on Artamenes his side; yet the night drawing on apace it could not be discerned where men fought, and where men fought not: And Philidaspes, whom the Croud had separated from Artamenes, notwithstanding his resolu[tion] not to forsake him; having vanquished all those which Resisted him, and not seeing my Master to give out orders, caused a retreat to be presently sounded: immediately after, every one was rallied under his own Ensigne: The party of Artamenes was absolute Master of the field, and of all the Enemies Baggage which they had forsaken: But as for the Con[qu]eror himself, none could tell any tydings of him: All the Captains asked one another where he was; and all the souldiers were inquisitive what was become of their Generall: one said, I saw him not, since in the head of our company, he rowed a whole squadron which resisted him, another said, I never saw him since he killed a brave gallant man which opposed him: and indeed every one observed him the last time they saw him, by some heroick Act or other: But though all saw him in the Combate, yet none knew now where he was; he was not to be found any where; He was neither in the Camp nor in the Field of Battle; so that it must clearly be concluded, he was either a prisoner or dead: Philidaspes himself was much moved at it, whether it proceeded from his generositie, or from a quite contrary resentment, he was very carefull to enquire him out. For my part Sir, I never was sensible of so great a sorrow: Chrisantes was not a little sad; And it was well said, that that there was not one in all the army, which grieved not more for this losse, then the gaining of two Battles did joyce them: In the meane time since Philidaspes undertooke the Command of the Armie under the notion of the Generall: all the officers did without any difficulty receive orders from him: As for the Prince Tigranes, he was not to stay long in Cappadocia, nor take upon him any employment, only as a voluntier: All the Souldiers had souls so inquisitive of their Generall, that they must be better satisfied concerning his fortune: They spoke unto Philidaspes, to enquire of the King of Pontus into what place they believed the King of Phrygia was retreated, to the end a Herald might be sent thither, to know if Artamenes were there a Prisoner: for indeed there was two Souldiers, who were certain they saw Artamenes a good way off, just at night, pursuing his Enemies on that quarter where the King of Phrygia made his Retreat. It was I Sir, who was employed unto the King of Pontus, who was Lodged in my masters sent. He assured me, that the King of Phrygia was at that Towne nearest Cerasia close upon the River Sangar But Sir, I never in all my life found a Prince more reasonable then he; for when I expressed my fears that Artamenes was taken Prisoner: If that be all (said he to me) never feare him: and calling for pen and paper, though he was wounded in his right arme, yet he writ a letter unto the King of Phrygia, by which he desired, that if Artamenes chanced to be in his power, to treat him with all possible civility: a Herald then was dispatched to the Page 17 King of Phrygia: Chrisantes and I, with an infinite number of others, of all conditions, lighting abundance of Torches, went to search amongst the dead for that which we wished never to finde, though we much feared we should: Alas, (said I to Chrysantes) can the Gods be both so favourable and so averse unto Artamenes? would they permit him to get two glorious Victories in one day, to let him perish thus, and let Philidaspes enjoy the fruits of all his hardship? Though day did break, yet we continued on our fears, and glad we were to see we sought in vain. Since we knew that Quarter where Artamenes was seen the last time, Chrisantes and I went thither, not well knowing why we scattered so from the rest of the company: But the Destinies who conducted us, knew that which we were ignorant of. As we began to be in absolute despair of ever finding our dear Majster, and were resolving to return back, we heard a pitifull weak voyce calling us; we went thither in all hast, and found two souldiers sore wounded, the one in the legg, the other in the thigh, who not being able to rise, lay there all night, hoping for some Pas[sen]ger to help them; having both of them received their wounds in that place, as they pursued the enemy: But though their wounds were great, and weaknesse extream, by reason of their losse of blood, yet the first thing they spoke, was not to ask any help, although they were our own men; but on the contrary, one of them, speaking and looking upon us (for he knew we belonged unto Artamenes,) Go (said he to us) towards the side of that river which you see some two hundred paces off, and look carefully there, whether your Illustrious Master be not in the same condition that we are in. Our Master (said Chrisantes and I both together) Alas, my friends, what can you tell us concerning him? We saw him yesterday very late (answered the souldier which spoke before) pursuing the King of Phrygia, who retreated from fight, but as they passed by us, we saw that Artamenes was wounded, at very parting of day, for we saw his suit of Arms all bloody: We, alas, were as you see us, amongst these bushes, which did interpose betw[ee]n our sight of the adverse Party; but we saw the King of Phrygia before him, and a great company following after him; and we saw him in yonder place, which I point at, maintain a furious fight, and if I be not much deceived, there I saw the Illustrious Art[ame]nes fall, at least, I am certain, there was none stayed there, nor any went off, but some which swam the River, of which I am certain Artamenes was none of them. The souldier had no sooner ended speaking, but Chrisantes and I began to run to the place which he shewed us, with doubled fears which we could not expresse: I think we had left these two poor souldiers without help, had we not accidentally met some of our own men, unto whose care we committed them: Mean while we came to the river side, which is the river Sangar, that parts the Kingdom of Pontus, from the Kingdom of Biithinia: As soon as we came there, we saw all the banks covered with killed men: There was a little wood bridge, which seemed newly broken; and as the stream of this river was not impetuous we saw all along as far as we could look, men killed, and Arms broken; the water it self was changed colour, and all the grasse on the bank-sides was sanguin'd: never was object more mournfull then this: we found many of our own men amongst the dead, and many also of the King of Phrygia's; But oh heavens, how I trembled, when following the ri[ve]r a little lower, I knew my dear Masters-horse, which I, saw dead on the side of the water; two of his feet in the river, as if he would have passed over, when he was shot dead with an arrow which stuck in his flank: Alas, alas Chrisantes (cried I) doubtlesse our Illustrious Master is perished either by steel, or water; which way soever it be, wee have lost, alas we have lost the great Artamenes: It is impossible to tell you Sir, how great was our sorrows and astonishment. We saw his horse, which was very markable; and within two paces further we found his head-peece, and as the river was narrow, we could see his Buckler, which being within lined with wood, did flote in the water, and stop by some rushes which grew there: In conclusion Sir, we absolutely concluded him lost, since we had searched so exactly all along the river, and found him not; and since upon our returne to the Camp, the Herald which we sent to the King of Phrygia, brought no news of him: upon a second reviewing of our sorrows, Chrisantes and I, went again unto the fatal river, and mixed our tears amongst it: We followed the sides, as far as in all probability the waves could convey the Corps of our dear, dead, and honoured Master: and since this river did empty it self into the Sea, not far distant, we imagined it might convey the Corps in that Abisse; at last Sir, we returned again unto the Camp all in de[s]pair, we absolutely thought him dead, and so did all the Army as well as we: Never was Victory so sadly resented as this; and the losse of twenty Battles, had not moved so much Page 18 sorrow as this: Every one sighed, all wept and lamented; the Captaines had much ado to keep in their souldiers from disbanding themselves, and they did publish aloud, that now there was no more hopes of any victories, since Artamenes lived not: Some said that now they would serve no longer, because there was no more recompence to be looked for; others that they would never more expose themselves to any dangers, since never any would be so exemplary as Artamenes was; All said, Let us lament a General who made us to Conquer without almost any danger; who ever did more himself, then he commanded others to do: who did magnificently recompence us for the least services; who took all the dan[ge]r to himself, and left the plunder to us: who by his sweetnesse, and charming familiar[ity] was as well our companion as our general. You may see Sir, what the souldiers said, whilst all the Commanders lamented as much as they, either publicly, or else privately in their Tents: The prisoners we had taken were also very sensibly sad at it; and could find no consolation in their captivity, since they were not now under the power of Art[ame]nes, from whom they hoped for favourable treatment: The King of Pontus particular[ly] was extreemly grieved at it, and seemed to be more sorry for the losse of him who had wounded him, who had vanquished him, and who had taken him prisoner, then he was for the losse of two battles, and his liberty. Philidaspes himself, notwithstanding all their thwartings and aversions, seemed to be much grieved at this pitifull accident; and if he did entertain any joy, he disguised it so well that it appeared not in his face: But whilst all the world was mourning, I departed from the Camp full of despair, and told no body, no not wise Chrisantes, and I went to Sinope, to acquaint my self of that sad com[mi]ssion, which my Master imposed upon me, and to carry his Letter unto the Prin[cesse] of Cappadocia. I made such haste as I arrived there four hours sooner then he who Philidaspes sent to acquaint the King with all passages, and to bring new Orders. But since I desired to see none but Mandana, I went the back way of the Town, and footed it un[ti]l that gate which is next the Castle, and which as you know is not above twenty paces from it; after I had told them who stopt me at the Gate, that I came from Thermicira, they let me passe; so that I came into the Castle unknown unto any, because it was almost night, and going up a pair of back stairs, which conducted unto the Princesse chamber; I came into her outward room unseen by any. I sent first unto Martesia, to tell her that Feraulas had something to impart to her in private: I understood since by this Lady, that the Princesse had been extreemly sad all the day, and that she was much moved when she was told that I desired to speak with her, before any knew what I had to say: What would Feraulas have with me (said she to Martesia?) If Artamenes be Conquerour, it is the King un[ti]l to whom he ought to render an account of his victory; and if he be Conquered (said she sighing) I shall but too soon know his misfortune. Madam (answered Martesia) I can say nothing, for I no sooner saw Feraulas, but without giving almost as much time as to tell me he desired to speak with you, I came to tell you. Let him come (said she) into my closet whither I will go, and do you bring him thither. Martesia having received this order, came to me where she left me, and conducted me to the Princesse, without opening my mouth, so full was I of sorrow; I no sooner saw the fair Mandana, but in spight of my restraint, my cheeks were all tears: The Princesse seeing me in that state, changed colour, and spoke first with much haste; has Artamenes (said she) lost the day? and are our enemies Conquerours? Artamenes Madam (said I) has vanquish[ed] your ene[m]ies; he has brought the King of Pontus to be your prisoner, and has won you two batt[le]s in one day; But Madam (said I doubling my tears, and much ado to speak) at last Artamenes lost his life, and won the day. Is Artamenes (said she in the saddest tone, that she could expresse) lost in this battle? yes Madam (replied I) Artamenes is no more of this world: See (said I in presenting the Letter which my Master writ unto her) what he gave me before he went to fight, and what he enjoyned me to deliver unto your hand after his death, if it should chance in this dismal battle. The Princesse at these words, could not restrain her tears no more then I: she went to a table where there was a light, and did sit so as I could not see her face, purposely to hide her tears; But do what she could, and notwithstanding my own sorrows I observed that her grief was extream. I owe so much unto Artamenes (said she in taking the Letter) that I should be very ungrateful, if I did not sadly resent his losse; and if after his death, I do not whatsoever he desires me; for (said she turning a little towards me) I do imagine that this illustrious man would com[m]end some of his servants unto me, and ask some recompences for them which he never would for himself. I know not Madam (said I to her) what my master has writ: But I Page 19 know that they who had the honour to be his, desire now nothing but death; and neither pretend either unto any fortune or any life: Mean while the Princess, after she had dried her eyes from those tears which she could not keep in, she began to read my Masters Letter, which as Martesia told me afterwards, was thus indited.

ARTAMENES, TO THE Princesse of Cappadocia.

BEfore you read what an unfortunate Prince does write, Think I beseech you, that he which takes this liberty to write unto you, will never write again; and he could not resolve to fail in that reverence which he ows you, until after he had lost his life in your service. But Madam, as he durst not displease you as long as he lived, so he would not deprive himself of so much consolation, as to hope, that you should know after his death, how he lived not but unto you, and how he never loved and adored any else but you; Yes Madam, Artamenes, who by his birth is not absolutely unworthy of the Princess of Cappadocia, is so conscious of deserving the Princess Mandana, that from the first minute he saw her, he never durst tell her that he loved her; and how his love was it which caused all his good fortune in Ames, and all the torment of his life. No, Divine Princess, it was only for your sake, that I was here in this Court disguised, and unknown: it was for you I fought, I vanquish, and refused all the earth; though it is one of the most noble parts of it which if I had lived I had commanded. That which most perplexeth me at present is, that I cannot know whether I shall die Conquerour, or Conquered; if the first, then Majdam receive the Victory as the fruits of my love, which I purchased at the price of my blood; if the later, then pitty an unfortunate man who died in your service, and who died adoring you: since I have nothing to hope for, I believe your virtue will not be offended at my respectful passion; and you shall never find worse then I discover, since the first time that I write unto you is my last of life. There needs no other answer Madam, unto what I desire, but some slight testimonies of sorrow and pitty; refuse them not then I conjure you: And that you may be the easier induced to pardon my boldness, consider if you please Madam, that if I had lived, you had perhaps been for ever ignorant of what I now tell you, when I am entering into my Grave.

ARTAMENES.

As long as the reading of this Letter lasted, tears did so abundantly trickle, that she was forced divers times to break off: But when she had ended, knowing that she was not able to restrain her lamentations more then she could her tears, & being desirous that I should be no witness of her excessive sorrows; Feraulas (said she to me) you see that I have not forgot how the illustrious Artamenes saved the life of the King my Father, since I so condole his losse, that I can take no joy in all those glorious advantages which he hath achieved for us: But (said she sighing) what can be done lesse for him, who in one day hath won two battles; hath taken an enemy King prisoner, and hath bestowed an everlasting peace upon all Caplpadocia, then to make that memorable day, a day of sorrow and tears for his losse? Grief did sad this Princesse, that she could hardly pronounce these last words; so that to be at more liberty of lamentation, Go Feraulas (said she to me) lament your glorious master, and come hither in the morning, for I shall be glad to see you: Then I made a low reverence to depart, and was at the closer door, when she called me back; Feraulas (said she Page 20 to me) tell me before you go, of what Country was the most Famous Artamenes? and exactly tell me, what was his quality? He was a Prince Madam, (said I to her) and had if he had lived been a King of a great Kingdom: But Madam, this is all I have in com|mission to tell you, my Master having expresly forbidden me to tell his name: 'Tis enough, said she, for the glory of Artamenes, and too much for the tranquillity of Mandana: she being more loaden with sorrowes at these words, dismissed me, and staid alone, only with her dear confident Martesia. I was no sooner gone (as she told me afterwards) but giving her my Masters letter to read: See there (said she) alas there you will find the cause of my excessive sorrow. Consider I pray you, if ever any was more lamentable: Martesia, obeying the Princesse, began to read the Letter in a low voice unto her self: but Mandana would not suffer her: No (said she) Martesia, I would understand, what I confusedly beheld, and what perhaps I have read false. Martesia began to read the letter aloud, but, oh heavens, how oft was this reading interrupted, and how happy had Artamenes been, if he had known her resentments of him; whosever should have told me within this hour (said the Princesse to Martesia) that I should receive a declaration of love without anger; and that I should pitty him which made it, and dearly loved his memory; Ah Martesia I should not have believed it. Yet I cannot chuse but confesse my weaknesse unto you, and acknowledge that I do infinitely compassionate the unfortunate Artamenes. I am not angry at him for loving me: yet I know not (added she) whether if he should rise again I should repent of what I say, and all I would doe, should be to hide my resentments: yet Martesia, I doe well find, that Artamenes had a greater share in my heart then ever I thought, and perhaps more then he ought to have, or I to afford him. Indeed Martesia my soul is extremely troubled, I am very sensible of those sorrowes which are in me, and whether I will or no, all these sad passions doe not offend me; I perceive, (added she) that the knowledg of his quality mingles a secret Sentment of loy in my soul: I recall his life, and all his heroick Acts, into my memory; And against my own mind and consent I cannot forbear to be glad when I find all these things and circumstances which have been told unto me, confirm me in the belief of his birth and love. Indeed Martesia, not to dissemble the truth, I do think, that as Artamenes loved me, and I had no certainty of it, so I did love him also, and knew it not: that which I named esteem and acquaintance (said she and blusht) might perhaps have been called something else: Indeed I know that I did oftimes wish a Crown upon the head of Artamenes, and knew not well why I wisht it: and I knew moreover, that though the suspicions which I had of his passions did disturb me, yet I was never absolutly unwilling that he should love me: But, oh Heavens, that which is most considerable, and most vexatious is, that I know I shall resent his death so deeply, as it will molest all the tranquillity and hopes of my life: The sad Mandana stopt at these words: And Martesia, though she was much troubled at the losse of Artamenes, yet to comfort the Princesse told her, that the Gods were ever wont to mix bitters and sweets, goods and bads together, and never the one without the other; and therefore, at this time she must think that all these victories are bought at a dearer rate: Ah Martesia (said she to her) that victory which is at the price of Artamenes life, is infinitely too dear, though it had brought me a Crown with it: For my dear Martesia, it is a hard matter ever to be comforted after the losse of such a Prince as he: A Prince I say, who was owner of all excellent Qualities and no bad ones: also one who loved us. But, (said Martesia to her) if he had lived you had never known as much: or if you had you would have been offended at it. I confesse, (replyed the Princesse hastily) I should have been offended, and that mortally: But Martesia, he never told me of it, but untill he was at the point of death: I knew it not untill he was in such a condition as he could not know what I thought of it; and it is this principally which causeth my most sharp sorrow: All the great acts of Artamenes, and all his high vertues, were things which truly did gain and merit my esteem: but I must confesse unto you, that his reverence and respect of me, has absolutly gained my heart: The Combats which he fought: the battles which he won, and all his other glorious actions, which he did, to merit my approbation, did not so much appertain unto me, but that he and others did share in the glorie with me: But that Artamenes should love me, and out of his profound reverence and respect unto me, should not tell it me untill his death; This Martesia reflects wholly upon Mandana: this it is which makes me plainly see that Artame|nes he did value me: And this is it, which obliges me to love the memory of a man, who had reason in his love, and loved me without offending or displeasing me. Madam, (said Martesia then unto her) I do conceive it just indeed, that you should cherish the memory Page 21 of Artamenes; but yet I know not why you should so much injure your self as to grieve so excessively: I know not (replyed the Princesse) whether it be just, or handsome, but I am sure, I can do no lesse: I should never have finished my relation Sir, if I should tell you all that Mandana said and did upon this occasion: She went to bed and would not eat any meat: she passed away all the melancholy night, without a wink of sleep. The same night that the King knew of the victories and death of Artamenes, by him whom Philidaspes sent to advertise him; he testified an extream sorrow for his losse: All the Court and all the Towne were sad: one would have thought his Battle had been lost, and the whole Kingdom utterly ruined: All were quite deceived, only Aribeus, who was glad in his hart, though he durst not let it appear: since the King thought that the Princesse was yet ignorant of this sad news, he sent to tell her, and went himself the next morning to condole, and also comfort her, for he knew very well that she did very much esteeme Artame|nes: This meeting was condoled on the Kings part very tenderly and sadly; and very wisely and reservedly on the Princesse part; for she discovered no more sorrowes and compassion, then the interest of the state might reasonably cause in her soul, for such a losse: but as soon as the King was gone, she sent to seek me, and as I could not stay any longer at Sinope, so they found me coming to take my leave on her: when I came into her Chamber, Madam (said I coming neer her bed (I come to desire your leave that I may returne to the Camp: what will you doe there (replyed the Princesse) I would goe (replyed I) to see if Chrisantes have since my departure from him, yet found the corps of my deare dead Master, which before we could not finde: what (said the Princesse sighing) has not the unfortunate Artamenes received the honour of a Burial? No Madam, (said I with eyes sweld with tears) unlesse Chrisantes have found him since my departure. Then she enjoyned me to relate unto her all that I have told you; to wit, all that we found along the river of Sangar, and all I knew concerning the death of my dear Master: after I had told her all, and by my sad relation caused her to bedew all her fair face with a deluge of tears, she began to presse me again to tell her his name: For (said she) what good reason could he have to conceal it? I know not Madam (answered I) nor can I, I confesse comprehend it, considering the greatnesse of his birth: But it belongs not to me to examine my Masters reasons; it is my duty only, to execute his last Commands with all punctuall observance: You have reason (said she to me) and I have done you wrong in pressing you unto so unjust and unreasonable a thing; It is sufficient that I know that he was of a Royall extract; and there is not any Prince in the world, let him be as great as he can be, but may desire a Son which shall be like unto him: Mean while, (said she to me) beleieve it Feraulas, and assure Chrisantes of as much, that all they which had relation unto the most glorious Artamenes, may obtain any thing from the Princesse Mandana, and that which she has not done for him, she will do for his. You are too generous Madam (said I to her) but I have already told you, tha <...> ask no more from the Gods, but onely the Corps of our dear Master, and the honour to bring him unto his grave; these words did so extreemly move the Princesse, that putting out her hand unto me, she said, you are worthy servants of such a Master as you have lost: Go and seek out with all diligence these glorious and sad Reliques, untill you have found it out; and when you have found it, let me be acquainted with it, to the end I may move the King my father to pay those ho|nours which are due unto his merit, and unto those services which we have received. After this, she dismissed me with a profound sigh, and would have given me a Jewel, but I refused it, and went from Sinope to the Camp, that I might follow the invincible Artame|nes, if I could do nothing else: Mean while, although the King was much troubled at the losse of my Master, yet I would not lose the fruits of his Victory; and fearing left the King of Phrygia should bring fresh forces into the Field, and relieve the King of Pontus, therefore he sent the next morning that I parted from Sinope, a command unto Philidaspes, to bring the prisoner King to Court, so that the day after I came to the Camp, Philidaspes with six thousand men, went to conduct him: He left the command of the Army, by Order from Ciaxares unto Artaxes, brother of Aribeus, and came unto Sinope with intentions to Triumph, and assume unto himself all the glorious Labours of my most illustrious Master. Neither Chrisantes nor I would return to Court, but both stayed in the Camp, and continued our search all along the fatall river Sangar, and in all places thereabouts for what we had lost, and to lament our misfortune. The Prince Tigranes, who saw there was no more to do in the Army, returned to Sinope, much grieved for the losse of Artame|nes; As for Philidaspes, as generous as he was, I do beleieve that if he was not glad of the Page 22 death of Artamenes, yet he had some resemblances of it, which presently after produced, the same effects in his heart. He departed from the Camp, in such a manner as was not ordinary, but very magnificent: As for the King of Pontus, he had contrary resentments in his soul, for he was extream sad at the losse of the Battel; much grieved at the death of him which won it; angry to follow Philidaspes as his Conqueror who was not so; and in extream confusion, to appear as a conquered prisoner, before that Princesse whom he loved: yet amongst all these bad resentments, he had some secret joy, that he should see her again: Mean time Philidaspes marcht in all hast, and as he went to Sinope, he ordained a petty Triumph, wherein might be seen all signes of mourning, as well as Victory, for the death of their General, not daring to expresse it otherwise. Then, as at the last Battle, all the Baggage of both Kings was all taken; so also they met with many things which the King of Phrygia had formerly taken from Ciaxares, in a war which was betwixt them: Philidaspes made use of all the rich Plunder to make the Pomp more proudly Magnificent: He caused two thousand men of war to march first, in the head of which were carried abundance of Ensignes gained from the Enemy; and the better to set forth the death of their General, they which carried them were in mourning.: Fifty Trumpets followed these Ensignes, in black Mantles and Pennons: afterwards followed forty Coaches, colvered with black, all fill'd with magnificent coats of Arms, Head-pieces, Plumes of divers colours, Bucklers of a hundred several fashions; Swords, Bowes, Quivers, Arrows, and Lances; And all this in so handsome a mixture, and so well set out, with order and with confusion both, that as they who were there told us, nothing could be beheld more beauti|full and Pompous: Six other Chariots followed these forty first, all fill'd with that which Ciaxares had formerly lost, to wit, magnificent Pavilions, great pieces of Plate, both sil|ver and gold, prised at an inestimable rate and value, both for their huge Prodigiousnes, and rich engravings; a Throne of Gold, richly beset with Onyx, Topaz, and other rare Pretious-stones: After these Charets, marcht the King prisoner on horseback, but without a sword, invironed with a hundred for his guard, in mourning Cassocks, and followed with fifteen hundred Prisoners, chained four to four: Immediately after marcht Philidas|pes alone, clothed in mourning, and his horse furniture sutable, with the Baston of a General in his hand; The rest of the Regiments followed, marching in the same order as the first. As this Triumph came into the great Plain within twenty furlongs of Sinope, they of the first Rank saw a Litter, which crossing the way about an hundred paces before them, did stay as if it were to let the Souldiers passe: yet they were no sooner within compasse of looking into the Litter, but presently making a stop, they began to run out of order, and cry out, It is Artamenes, it is Artamenes: This word passing from the first Rank to the second, and from the second to the third, and so thorowout all, the glorious name of Artamenes did in an instant fill the mouthes of friends and enemies; Captains and Souldiers, Conquerors and conquered: all stopt, and in a moment, all would advance to be better certified of the matter: Philidaspes, who was afraid it should be some stratageme of the King of Phrygia, to put his Souldiers in disorder whilst he relieved the King of Pontus, commanded every one to his place, and advanced to the place where the noise began. But oh Heavens, how was he surprized, when looking into the Litter, he saw that it was really Artamenes which was within it, who held his hand out to the Souldiers, and cherished all them which came near him: This sight did doubtlesse astonish Philidaspes, and perhaps made him sad: But as he was one of a great soul, wit, and generosity, so he partly hid it, without expressing much joy, or much sorrow; he lighted from his horse, and came neer my Master. Artamenes (said he in coming to him, and presenting him his Generals Staff) could never rise in fitter time: he who died in the day of Victory, revives again, in the day of Triumph: In the case that I am in (replied Artamenes smiling, and most civilly saluting him) I may more aptly be taken for a vanquished, then a vanquisher: And to tell you truly, I think that I am neither fit to follow a Chariot, nor to go before it. Chariots of triumph (answered Philidaspes) are not difficult to be conducted, for commonly fortune guides them; Artamenes had not leisure to answer this nice complement: for all the Officers, whether Philidaspes, who commanded them, would or no, did quit their places, and acknowledge him no more, but came to salute their General Artamenes; All the Regiments not daring absolutely to quit their Ranks, because of the Prisoners which they guarded, yet they pressed so, that all the Souldiers might at least see the Litter where he was. The King of Pontus, impatient to embrace his glorious Conquerour, sent one of them who was appointed for his guard to ask leave for him to come Page 23 neer: The souldier coming neer, and presenting what the King of Pontus desired, my Master with an unparallelled modesty, making a signe to him with his hand, It is Philidaspes (said he) and not Artamenes, which can grant him that leave, and of whom he must ask it, since he received the last Orders from the King, and commands in Chief Philidaspes being even confounded, and half angry at my Masters sweet civility, said unto him, That his power was nothing since he was present, and therefore the command was in him. I care not for commanding others (answered Artamenes) when I am not in a condition to do that my self which I bid others do: You must at this time (answered Philidaspes) endure this inconveniencie, for I do not think there is any will take your Office out of your hand. Why you may better take it upon you then I (replied Artamenes) Your Souldiers will not consent, replied Philidaspes, and I think they have good reason for it. In conclusion Sir, after this modest contest Artamenes took upon him that Command which belonged unto him, and turning towards the messenger from the King of Pontus: My friend, said he to him, tell the King of Pontus, that if I were able to goe, I would come where he is, and do him that reverence which is his due, and tell him that he may do what ever he pleases. This generous Royal prisoner came then with great joy to salute the man who had captived him: I could not but grieve much (said he in coming to him) at your losse; and I never had any thought of my liberty, untill that minute you were beleived to be dead. Sir, (answered my Master with much sweetnesse) if I were not so wounded, as I could not sustain my self, Artamenes would not receive the King of Pontus after such an uncivil manner; and doubtlesse he would let him know, that he thinks his Victory very unfortunate, that he is not had in more Veneration. Never speak of unfortunate (answered the King of Pontus) my fetters are not base since you did put them on; nor have I need of all my Victories to follow Artamenes as my Conqueror: Such as you, who deserve to Conquer (answered my Master) ought to be but little troubled at being conquered, and it is a greater argument of your valour, then mine, that you find such consolation in your misfortune. The King of Pontus, drawing back a little, to give room unto those who yet had not saluted Artamenes, my Master had a desire to know whether or no the Victory was compleat: he asked of the King and the Princesse: he enquired particularly of most part of all the Officers; and he had the goodnesse to ask where Chrisantes, and where I was: He cheered up those with his eyes unto whom he could not speak; and assured all the Souldiers smiling, that he desired not from them any part of the Plunder or Booty. Every one desired to know what had become of him: But he told them all, that this was not a fit place for it, and desired their patience. After this joyfull tumult was appeased, Artamenes sent to the King to acquaint him with his being alive, and that he was in the head of six thousand men, who brought the King of Pontus unto him, to the end he might acquit himself of his former promise, and to tell that he waited for his Orders; Mean time, they marched gently, and came within sixe furlongs of Sinope. I leave you to imagine Sir, what different thoughts came into my Masters mind: Tis true that he saw he returned to the Court in a most glorious manner, having gained two Battles in one day, and brought a King a prisoner with him: But yet he knew the King of Pontus was his Rivall, and that did make him almost repent the taking him: The sight of Philidaspes also did agitate in his mind, the remembrance of all their ancient differences, and stir'd up no small turbulency in his soul; but of all other inquietudes, the incertainty whether or no I had delivered the letter unto the princesse did most grate in his mind: Sometimes, he desired it were: Sometimes he feared it was: Sometimes he was incertain which he should wish, and could not determine what to think: Philidaspes for his part was not without his turbulencies; he saw the glorious resurrection of his enemy: and looked upon him as more his Conqueror, then the King of Pontus did: and thought it concern, <◇> him as neer as the losse of his libertie. This Prince, though indeed he was the most unfortunate of all at this time, yet he did not think himself so; for he knew not that Philidaspes, and Artamenes, were his Rivalls: but on the contrary he was in hope that my Master would doe good offices to the King and Princesse; so that he loved him with an extreme tendernes. Thus did these three Illustrious lovers of the Princesse of Cappadocia resent the businesse: meane while, the messenger which my Master sent before to carry newes of his happy resurrection, arrived at Sinope: you may Imagine Sir how he was received: The King, resented it more Joyfully then he could expresse, and made him which brought the happy tidings repeat it a hundred times over: The King sent present to acquaint the Princesse, who Page 24 testified an unimaginable satisfaction: The whole Court was ravisht: All the people rejoiced: Aribes himself was compeld to seem so because he must not be singular, and made some counterfet signes of gladnesse as he did before of sorrow: The Prince Tigranes who had designed his departure deferred it, in hopes to see Artamenes, and went not untill the fifth day after his return. The King, desirous to honour my Master, sent him word that he would not have him come into the Towne in a Tumult, and without Ceremonie; and appointed him to encamp his Troops neer the Castle, about six furlongs from thence: and there he would have him lodg, assuring him, that he would come that night to embrace him: He was obeyed, and all things were as he commanded: The King then went and carried Chirurgions, and Physitians with him unto Artamenes: whom he chered up, the like was never seen: He received Philidaspes also very well, but not comparable to my Master, who was constrained to go into his bed: As for the King of Pontus, he appointed unto him the best chamber in the Castle: and as a little before Ciaxares came, this Prince sent unto my Master, desiring him to obtain from the King, that he might not enter into Sinope, amongst the rest of the Prisoners; So my Master, who thought he could never enough acknowledg the generosity of this illustrious Prisoner, was ever forward to render him any good office he could desire, Provided, it did not relate unto his love: For as Ciixares told him it was not Just that he should enter Sinope as if he were not conquered; Artamenes, did desire him as a recompence for all his services, that the King of Pontus might come into the Town in the night, as well as himself. It will be sufficient Sir, (said he) that the people see the plunder of the field, and the other prisoners, without augmenting the misfortunes of this great Prince (unto whom I am obliged) by an unprofitable Pomp; and without making me ashamed of those honours which I deserve not. The King could hardly resolve what to doe, but in conclusion, he must yield unto him who was ever wont to Conquer. Artamenes, beseeched Ciaxares, that he would be pleased to see the the King of Pontus his prisoner, which at the request of my Master he did: The enterveiw of these two enemy Princes passed with all possible Civility between them: meane while the King burned with an ardent impatience, to know where Artamenes had been: how he escaped, and how he came so opportunely to meet the Army, he no sooner knew from the Chirurgions who had searched his wounds whilst he went to visit the King of Pontus, that they were all absolutely without danger, but he pressed him extraordinarily to relate it: Artamenes would have had a dayes dispensation, but the Impatiency of Ciaxares would not permit it: he exactly told them, all that which I am now going to tell you, and which I afterwards had from his own mouth: to let you know then what was becom of my Master, I must returne to the place of Battle, and tell you, that when those two Souldiers of which I spoke did see him passe; it was true, as they believed, that he was wounded in the left shoulder, and yet he did not cease following the King of Phrygia as far as the River Sanlgar. As this Prince in his retreat passed over a little wood bridge, which I already spoke of, the multitude of those which followed, and which would pass all at a time over with him, caused the bridge to break when he had halfe his men on the one side, and half on the other side of the river: But that which seemed to do him an ill office, did him a good one, because by this accident my Master was stayed, and he could not continue his pursuit: yet those which were on this side the broken bridge, redoubling their valour out of despair to save themselves, did obstinately defend themselves: on the other side, Artamenes, all in an lger that this Prince had escaped him, did assault them with unimaginable violence, and so there began a fresh Combate: Those which followed the King of Phrygia on the other side the River, thinking themselves safe, endeavoured to help their own side by shooting abundance of Arrowes, from the other side of the River, and wee could not return the like, because Artamenes had then no Archers with him: In conclusion, almost all they which fought being dead, and day at an end. One of the Arrows from the other side, shot the horse of Artamenes in the flank; the horse perceiving himself wounded began to run with all his speed along the River side, and whether my Master would or no carried him from those few of his men which remained; Afterward falling to Curvett upon a sudden, and Leaping by the water side, as if he would swim the River, he fell dead down, in danger to Drown my Master, because that since he had fought neer the bridge, he had received a wound in the thigh, so that he had much a doe to disengage himself from under his horse, and get out of the water on to Land. Yet notwithstanding all the blood which he had lost, and the heavinesse of his Arms, he recovered himself. But as soon as he had got out of this danger, he was presently engaged in another; for he perceived Page 25 he was much more wounded then he thought to bee, it being absolutely impossible to hold himself up; besides the night came on, and he saw not one about him: yet he heard a noise of men which fled and passed by not far of that place; but because he knew not whether they were friends or enemies, he Paus'd a while to deliberate whether he should call them or no; but presently, he heard no more of them, and there he lay, not knowing what to do or what would become of him, knowing well that he had not strength enough to carry him to the Camp, though in the obscurity of the night he should chance to stumble upon the way: moreover it was so dark that he could not see, nor had he strength if he had had eyes to find his helmet, and Buckler which he had lost in fighting, though he sought them as well as he could: he sate then down at the root of a Tree, resolving to stay there untill the next day: Certainly if any had seen him in that deplorable Condition, it would have been hard for them to beleieve, that he had gained two Battles in one day: Tooke a King a Prisoner, and Chased another. But after he had sate a while in this cold manlner, chance would have it, that a horse which was left without a master in the fight, wandering along the River side, passed by him; as soon as the Animal by favour of the stars espied him, he started back with all speed; but by good fortune his bridle which hung down did entangle his feet, and made him stumble so neer my Master, that he catching hold of the bridle, he seized upon him and held him: The horse being none of the most metled, stopt presently: and Artamenes knowing himself weak with losse of blood, and considering he was far from the Camp, with much ado got up, and resolved to go unto any place, where he could discover any light, or house, thinking it were better to ask help of an enemy, rather then perish at the foot of a Tree, where there was none to help him: he knew that there was one part of Bithyria which was not very affectionate unto the King of Pontus, whose father had usurped it from those which were the legitimate owners. Indeed, because he could do nothing else, he marched straight to the place where he saw light; As he came neer it, he saw it had been a goodly fair Castle, built with Fortifications, and which now had no Towers nor Walls: Artamenes entered it without resistance; but, the feet of his horse made such a noise in the ears of them that were within, that Artamenes heard a great number of women crie, as if two thousand men were coming to take them: but my Master putting them out of fear, by the weaknesse of his voice, he saw appear a woman well on in years, and of a good deportment upon the battlement, whom four other women lighted with torches: Mean while, Artamenes being lighted from his horse, though in great pain, he saw this Lady look upon him with extraordinary observance, and after she had thus well considered him, not giving him time to speak, she cried out upon a sudden; Ah my son; ah Spitridates is it you? ah Spitridates, is it possible I should see you here? At these words, although there were men in the house, she ran to help Artamenes, those which took him by the arms sustained him; all the women came near to look upon him, and this Lady which spoke unto him, desiring to imbrace my Master, he fell into a sound, and remained as dead in her arms, which troubled her much. In a belief he was her son, she commanded they should carry him to a chamber, to disarm him and get him to bed; for since he was all bloody, she knew he was wounded: By good fortune there was a young Chirurgion, which after the rout of the King of Pontus Army came thither: Mean while, though Artamenes had not strength enough to answer that Lady, which called him Spitridates, yet he did remember it, at his coming again to himself; but he was much astonished, when opening his eyes, he found he was in a fair chamber, in a stately bed, and many Ladies about him, amongst which there was one who was admirably fair; he also saw her which called him Spitrida|tes, but he saw all tears for his wounds, and for the Arms she saw him have: My Ma|ster notwithstanding his weaknesse, had no sooner recovered his sight, and his reason, but he saluted the Ladies with much reverence: He intended to present a complement and excuse his surprize, but this aged Lady prevented him, and said unto him sighing; Alas, is it possible I should see you again? and that the Gods amongst all my bitter misfortunes should afford me this good one? to find you after I have so long lamented and bewailed your absence? but alas, I find you wounded, and in Arms for our Enemies, in which, perhaps you have killed your father, or your brother, or both, for we hear no news of them, and they were in the Battle, as it seems by your wounds you were also: Ah Spitri|dates, what cause has the King given you, that after five years travels you should return in Arms against him and your Countrey? My Master hearing this Lady speak thus was much surprized, and though he could not without trouble to himself, yet he would needs un|deceive Page 26 her: If I were he whom you think me to be (answered he unto her) I should not disown my self, but since I am not, I ought not to let you go on in your error, though perhaps it might have been advantageous unto me. What, said the Lady, are you not my son? No Madam, answered my Master, I am so far from being your son, that you have relieved an enemy, but such an enemy, as hath done nothing which might in reason incite you particularly against him, since his designe aims no other, then faithfully to serve that King in whose service he is engaged. I see my son (said she interrupting m) that you are ashamed of what you have done, and will not confesse who you are, since we hear no news of those two are so nearly related unto you, and who perhaps you have fought withall, and knew not; nor will I (said she leaving him) disturb you in that condition you are in. After this, the Lady went out of the Chamber, and left my Ma|ster in much wonder, seeing they would needs take him for one, whom he was not: He passed over that night very quietly, for though he had lost much blood, yet no fever seized on him; and his wearinesse causing him to sleep, he was as well the next morning, as one who had two such great wounds could possibly be hoped for. This Lady, failed not to visit him in the morning, and renewed her complaints: she then saw there was some difference between Artamenes and Spitridates, but no more then she thought five years might alter, it being so long since she saw him: My son, said she to a woman who was there, was not so big when he left us; he had not the same Symmetry of face, so high and so noble; but he was then young, and five years might make a great change in a man of his years: yet Artamenes, who would by no means lie unto her, spoke such things unto her, as she doubted of it: he beseeched her that he might send a letter unto the Lieutenant General of the Cappadocean Army, but she would not consent unto it: No, said she unto him, I can|not be yet resolved of my doubts: My eyes tell me you are my son, but your words assure me you are my enemy, and which of them soever you be, peradventure you have killed my husband: at these words, tears flowing in her eyes; If ye be my son (said she to him) I ought to pardon you, and though you should be an enemy unto the King under whose government we are at present, yet I ought to be compassionate, and pity you, since you are so unfortunate and generous as not to delude me; and for these reasons I will assist you. I know, my son, that since you have forsaken the King of Pontus, I must hide you, as one that is delinquent: But, my son, said she, I am your mother, and moreover we are assured the King of Pontus is taken prisoner, and you know the Princesse his sister will not entertain you in his absence; and we do every day receive a hundred secret assistances, in consideration of you; speak therefore, I conjure you, and tell me exactly the truth; Tell me whether you be Spitridates, and what is your true name, and Countrey: My Master now found himself in a labyrinth: there was no colour of reason to tell he was Artamenes, for that would be to put such a man as he, perhaps into the hands of his enemies; he be|seseched her therefore for the present, to beleieve that he was not Spitridates, and not to presse him any further to tell his name; he assured her, that the King whom he served would not be pleased with it, and that for diverse other reasons, he could not do it. This discourse was long and tedious, and caused my Masters wounds to bleed afresh; a fever seised upon him, and he was eight dayes very ill: During which time, nothing was spoke of but curing him, and during all which time, he was marvellous well treated by this Lady, though eve|ry day, she sometimes thought him an enemy, and sometimes her son, but hearing at last, that her husband, and her other son were escaped the Battle and fled with the King of Phrygia, her soul was more tranquile, and more capable of reason: The next morning when she understood my Master was reasonable well, she would try another way, to dis|cover whether he was her son: She imploied that fair Lady her daughter, whom my Master did principally observe at his first coming; and she came unto him, with two other women, and thus put him to a new triall: Brother (said she to him) Madam (answered he interrupting her) I should be infinitely honour'd in the name, but since I am not Spi|tridates, I must needs undeceive you, and content my self with the title of your most humble servant. Whatsoever you are, replied this fair Lady, you deserve more then that phrase, since, considering the state we are in, there is none more unfortunate then we: yet to clear my doubts, both mine, and others in the house, I desire you to take so much pains, as to open this Box, where perhaps, you may find something which will please you; in saying so, she presented a Box, in which was a very rare Picture, and looked upon him with extream attention: Artamenes, who knew not why she would have him open this Box, obeyed her, and was indeed well pleased with the picture of a Lady admirably fair: but Page 27 since he knew not who it represented, and having in his heart another picture which dark|ned the beauty of this, there appeared no extraordinary surprize in his eyes; he looked upon it as a fair thing indeed, but it moved him neither unto a great joy, nor any inquietude: This fair Lady observing the calmnesse with which he looked upon this picture; Ha generous stranger (said she) I am now certain that you are not Spitridates, for he was never able to look upon this picture with so much coldnesse; after these words she left my master, and went unto her mother: you need no longer doubt (said she to her) but this man is not Spitridates; for he beheld this picture without any joy or turbulency at all: he grew neither pale, nor red at it; his soul was quiet; his eyes ap|peared neither pleasant nor sad, and therefore it is impossible he should be Spitridates: no Madam (said she to her) he is not my brother, since he is not a lover of the Princesse of Pontus; I must conclude he is not in Love, since he can look upon this picture with so much indiffe|rency; he I say, who never heard her named without a blush; nor ever saw her without astonishment: Thus spoke this young fair Lady, and it was her words which did indeed most undeceive the old one. My Master came to know all this which I intend to tell you, from a woman which looked unto him, and who being desirous to oblige him, told him all she knew. So Sir, this Lady being now fully perswaded, that Artamenes was not Spi|tridates, did yet resolve to treat him very well; and his merit having already gained so powerful an influence upon her heart, she came to him the next morning, and found him in a good state: Generous stranger (said she to him) since you have no mind to be Spi|tridates, be therefore what you please; and let me lose a son whom I thought I had found: I beseech you, let not the resemblance he has unto you offend you, for of what condition soever you are, his name cannot be very dishonourable unto you, since his Ancestors in losing the Crown of Bythnia, have not lost their noblenesse of blood. Madam, said Arta|menes then unto her, I most humbly desire your pardon, if I have not rendred unto you that reverence which is your due, and my duty: Excuse not your self (said she) in what you have not failed, since (added this Lady sighing) Princesses which live under the Do|minion of an Usurper, must not exact that, which perhaps their condition might another time require: Although, said she, you be not my son, yet you do much resemble him, and for that reason, I am obliged to render you your liberty. If you be my son, you are in no security within this house; and if you be not my son, yet you can have no more assurance of safety; therefore it were better that you depart, and I will cause you to be con|ducted unto what place you please. My master was ravished with joy, at the generosity of this Lady; he thanked her, and protested that he would serve her all the dayes of his life; and perhaps more effectually then she believed: To which end, he desired her to lend him a Litter which might carry him to the Camp of Cixares: My master was yet far from being well; but love adding new strength unto him, he would depart the next morning; and go thither where he might hear Mandana talked on: He was waited upon with the young Chirurgion who dressed him; and two others who had orders, that if they met any of the King of Pontus party, or the King of Phrygia, to say that Artamenes was a Cousin unto their Mistresse, whom they carried unto her, and who had been wounded in the last battle. My master at departure, did receive a hundred civilities from all these illustrious persons, which he rendred back unto them afterwards with interest, promising them that ere long they should hear from him. As they went the way towards the Camp, he met some stragling souldiers, of whom he enquired where the Army was; who answer|ed that Philidaspes the day before, went from the Camp to conduct the King of Pontus un|to Sinope; So that changing their road, they went to meet Philidaspes, which they doubted not but to do, since Coaches and prisoners marched slower then the Litter did: and he did meet them in the plain, as you have been already informed. See Sir, what my Masters adventure was, when they thought him dead. Since the passage was something extraordi|nary; Artamenes had so much curiosity as to ask the King of Pontus, whether there was a Prince called Spitridates, which resembled him? The King of Pontus told him, that he had thought himself deceived several times, for that it was not possible any two should be more like one another then Spitridates and he, both symmetry of face, composure of parts, and stature. But to return unto my discourse where I left: After Cixares had heard from my masters own mouth, all his adventure; he admired his good fortune, and ex|treemly rejoiced at it; and after a long discourse, he left him and returned to Sinope. Yet notwithstanding, it was resolved that the next morning, all the plunder, and all the prisoners should enter the Town; and that at night, the King of Pontus, and Artamenes Page 20 should be conducted thither. Cixares was no sooner departed, but my Master sent to tell the Prisoner King, he had obtained his desire, which caused him to rejoyce very much: afterwards Artamenes thought of sending back the Litter which was lent him; and in sending it, he made choyce of the Richest and fairest of all his Jewels, and presented it unto that fair young Lady which shewed him the picture, desiring her, she would honour him so much as to receive that poor testimony of his acknowledgment; not daring to speak of any kind of gratuity unto the Princesse her mother, considering her high Genero|sity: he did most noble recompence the Chirurgion which dressed him, and all those of the house which had been serviceable unto him: who were all extremely well satisfied, as well with the richnesse of his presents, as with the knowledge of the manner how Artamenes was treated both by the King and all the Court: They imagined their Mistris did not know the true quality of her prisoner. After that my Master had given out all necessary orders, and night being come, he was all alone, and at Liberty to entertaine his passion: I see my self, (said he unto himself) escaped from abundance of dangers, & few there are which doe not admire my good fortune: But for all this good fortune, which perhaps in|cites others to envie me, I cannot chuse but esteem my self the most unhappy man upon earth; & doubtless shall ever be so untill I shall obtain some testimony of my Princess affection: or at least that she does favourably accept of mine: alas (said he further) if Feraulas have presented that letter which I commanded him, perhaps she has read it with disdain, & was so far from having any compassion, that she was angry: Perhaps also (added he) she has pardoned me, and pity did so tender her heart, that she received my declaration without hate: But admit she did so (said he) and pardoned me when she thought me Dead, who knowes whether she will doe so now I am Living? Perhaps Feraulas has not yet delivered it, and then I shall continue still innocent in her thoughts, as I was at parting: But then also (said this Prince) I shall be unhappy that way: for if she doe not know I love her: how dare I ever tell it? what would I have? (said he yet) and what can I desire? I fear that she should know of my love, and yet I desire she did. I doe entertaine both feares, and hopes: I desire to see Mandana, and am so neer either my suprem felicity or my suprem misfortune, that my soul must needs tremble: and the uncertainty of my good or my bad destiny, that it disturbs my reason. In such thoughts as these Artamenes past away a great part of the night: yet sleep seizing upon his eyes against his will, he was the next morning in a ve|ry good condition: and the Kings Chiurgions assured him, that with in a few dayes he would not only be able to quit his bed, but his chamber also, and be perfectly recovered. He received visits from the Court all the day long; and sent to present a complement unto the Princesse Mandana, who received it with much civility, and returned him the like againe; but it was after such a manner, that though my Master did oftentimes repeat word for word all that she said vnto him, and contemplated upon it, yet he could not pick any thing out of it, which might either fortify his hopes and encrease his fears. The morning was employed in entering into Sinope with all the Booty and Plunder, and Prisoners, conducted by Philidaspes after all the mourning was taken of; And the Princesse out of a window in the Castle, beheld them all with a mind as turbulent as my Masters. Night being Come; the King of Pontus was conducted by guards unto the Town, and put into a place of safty: but in passing under the window of the Princesse, he both saw her and was seen, by Candle light: This moved pitty in Mandana, and shame in the Prisoner: Artamenes followed the King of Pontus. The inhabitants of Sinope knowing that he was to enter the Town in the night, did light Candles in all the streets, hanging Lamps at every window: so that by the shouts of joy, and multitudes of Lights, this night Entry was very Triumphant, and magnificent: Artamenes was accompanied by all the Grandees of the Court, who con|ducted him to the King: my Master was in one thing lesse happy then the King of Pontus: for he saw not the Princesse in passing under her window, because she was gone to bed immediatly and faigned to be ill. Martesia, who from the first minute that her mistris heard Artamenes was alive, had observed much joy in her eyes, was now much amased to observe the disturbances in her soul: therefore seeing none with her, and that she might speak freely: Madam, (said she to her) shall I ask whether it be barely some indisposition in you, which moves you to go to bed; or is there some misfortune hapned unto you which I am ignorant of, and which disturbs that satisfaction which you might take from one of the happiest dayes in all your life? For indeed Madam you see the wars are ended most gloriously: you see that King which you would not marry, in prison, and you see that Prince, whom you thought dead, and so much lamented, to be living. I confesse, my Page 21 Dear Maxtesia (answered the Princesse) that I am very happy in many things but not in all; and I am so sensible of my misfortune, that I take no joy in all those apparent felicities, which those who know not the bottom of my heart, do think I doe; Madam (replied Martesia) what can it be that should trouble you? The King loves you; all Cappadocia Adores you: A Halcion Peace invites you unto all the delights of the Court: and as the Kings Physitians say, Artamenes will be quickly recovered. Artamenes (replied the Princess sighing) will perhaps be but too soone recovered; and though I wish him all manner of good Fortune, yet I would he were in such a condition, as not to leave his chamber untill I were fully resolved how I should live with him: How Madam (replied Martesia in a wonder, & interrupting her) Artamenes whom you wept for so bitterly, doe you say, perhaps he shall be too soon recovered? Ah Madam, certainly I did not rightly understand you: or els you did ill explain your self: No, no, Martesia, (replied she) The Crossness of my destiny is such, as that I desire not to see Artamenes as much as I did desire his Life: For know (said she in changing colour) that I doe love honour and glory, above all other things; but I doe not hate Artamenes so much as to be deprived of his conversation without repugnancy: yet you may well think Martesia, that after he has let me know that he loves me, I ought not to give him that liberty which heretofore he had, and that I live with him, with more restraint, then I did in those times when I had not that tenderness for him, which I sensibly finde to be in my heart, in spite of all my vertue. For indeed Martesia (since I may discover the bottom of my soul unto you) Let me tell you, that if Artamenes had been so bold as to speak unto me of any love, I had then treated him but ill. I should then have excluded him from my company, and perhaps I had lesse esteemed him, because then I should have suspected he had not a true esteem of me; But this way which he takes to let me know his love, (Compassion having softned my heart) I have understood it without anger; and I have believed it without any difficulty: and since I saw he could have no dangerous designe in his affection, I did not oppose and stifle it in the beginning: but I called into my memory all his Services: and I repeated in my mind all his Services, his virtues, and all his rare Qualities a hundred and a hundred times over: all these have told me that he loved me in a most respectfull manner: I have given more Credit unto it then if he had told it: and I have more acknowledged it, then ever he could hope for: indeed Martesia, his death, gave life unto my friendship (not to give it any other phrase) which is an affection unto him most pure and innocent: Judg then, if, after I have given up my soul unto such a harmlesse passion, it will be easie for me to resist, and overcome it. (But Madam, said Martesia to her) is Artamenes more in fault now he is living then he was in his grave? No? Answered the Princesse, but he is more to be feared: Not that I intend absolutly to withdraw my affection from him; All that I can doe, will be to restrain my self from giving him any signes of it: But Madam (replied Martesia) why will you punish him, who is not in any fault? and why will you torment your self in making him unhappy? Stay Madam untill he give you some cause to complaine: and if he speak any thing unto you which shall displease you, then it will be time enough to deprive your self of his sight. But Martesia (said the Princesse interrupting her) how do you think I can look upon him without extreame shame? and how can I banish out of my soul, that affection which I entertained when I thought him dead? For my part Madam (replied Martesia) I doe confess unto you, that I cannot conceive what reason you can have to love Artamenes when he is dead, and hate him when he is alive. Ah Martesia (cried Mandana) how far are my thoughts from any hate? And how happy would Artamenes be if I Lov'd him a little lesse then I did: for indeed, if I did not distrust my own heart I should live with him as I did before: I would stay, as you bid me, untill he gave me iust cause of complaint: and rest in quietnesse. But Madam (replied Martesia) I see no cause why he should so disquiet you, for as he did write unto you, and as Feraulas told you, he is a Prince: neither do I see any cause why he should be so offensive unto you, in coming to tell you himself, what before he did write unto you: Ah my dear Martesia, (replied the Princesse) that which you tell me for my consolation, is that which most torments me: for if Artamenes were not of that quality he saith he is, his boldnesse should not have offended me, and dead as he was, I should only have pitied his folly and misfortune: But now I find nothing which can offend me or anger me: upon the whole matter I must not chuse my self a husband: moreover, that Fatall custome, which the Assyrians when they were lords of Cappadocia did leave upon it, will not permit me any pretence or colour to Iustifie the affection of Artamenes unto me, Page 30 and much lesse Mandana's unto him: So that Martesia he must overcome himself; he must use all extreame violences to do it; he must render Artamenes unhappy, and me unfortunate: Me thinks (said she) that I see him searching in my eyes for the manner of my receiving his Letter: But alas, what do I say? will not Feraulas tell him, that he discovered no signes of anger in my minde? but that he saw me weep, and blush, and indeed tell him that he is sure I love him? and perhaps that I loved him, before he had made me know he loved me? Ah Martesia (said she) this misfortune is befall me, and it is in vain to hide my thoughts from Artamenes: he knows it (said she) he knows it; and perhaps, does imagine it otherwise then it is, which causeth him to conceive some criminal hopes, and to prepare himself for offending me: Alas (said she) whose misfortune ever equal'd mine? I must passe away all my dayes in an unparalleled retirednesse: I must deprive my self of all innocent delights, lest they should render me suspected: I must forbid entrance into my soul any thing that transcends not severest vertue. I must give resistance unto the Merits, the services and all the great Qualities of Artamenes; and my heart must not give it self up unto him, but at his Grave; yet perhaps, at this very hour, when I am speaking of him, Artamenes repents that he spoke unto me so soon: and perhaps he thinks that he had been better entertained if he had spoke unto me the first minuit he saw me; and thinks this rigid vertue whereof I make such strickt profession is but an artificial Cloak. But what shall I do? (said she) Certainly I do accuse him unjustly, and he is innocent doubtlesse: No, no Artamenes will interpret my tears in another sence: he will think that compassion onely caused me to drop them: he knowes that I do owe unto him the life of the King my father; and for that reason onely I owe unto him my sighes and my tears; Let me be therefore more at rest in my self, (said she) let me be satisfied with mine own innocence; let me onely take away from Artamenes all occasions of speaking with him in private; let me hide from him that tendernesse towards him, which I have entertained in my heart, if I cannot overcome my self; and let befall what will, let me resolve rather to die, then to do, say, or think any thing which is not just and vertuous, and which does not give full satisfaction unto that love which I have unto Glory. Thus did the glorious Mandana entertain her self with Martesia, whilst my Master who knew not whether she had received his Letter or no, was more perplexed. Philidaspes all this while almost never appeared: he saw the Princesse at his entrance into Sinope, but that was all, and whilst he went to give orders for those new Levies which he thought to command, and which were mustered neer a Castle, about sixty furlongs from Sinope, whereof he was Governour. The Princesse had more liberty to ruminate upon her resolutions: Mean while, my Masters hurts healed faster then the Chirurgions could hope for. He was in few dayes not onely able to quit his bed, but his chamber also, and in a condition to go and present himself unto the King and Mandana: He wished heartily that I were with him, that he might know what I had done; yet he thought it would be a long time before I came, for though he had sent orders unto me to come unto him, yet it was so far off from Sinope, where we were encamped, that without extraordinary hast I could not come so soon: So that being pressed on by his passion, and in extreame impatience to see the Princesse, after he had been with the King, he presented himself unto Mandana, and went with such agitation of spirit, as the like was never seen until now; he was wont to approach with an ordinary reverent fear: But now, he resented all manner of fears that was possible to be imagined: The Princesse for her part, knowing that Artamenes would come unto her chamber, did often change colours, and sometimes would be angry, that she was not absolute mistress of her own heart: As she sat upon her bed, it was more easie for her to hide the disorders of her minde from Artamenes, who as ill luck to him would have it, did finde much company with the Princesse. He saluted her with all befitting reverence, and she received him with all the civility that a Princesse of Capladocia could pay unto a man who had obtained for her so many glorious Victories, and brought her a King a prisoner; yet notwithstanding, my Master observed, that her civilities were expressed with so much reservednesse, as that he sometimes beleaved she had seen what he had written: Doubtlesse she knows (said he in himself) what I desire she should, and which I fear she does not: Presently after, when the Princesse had given him some obliging language or other; I am deceived (said he) she knows it not, and I dare not tell her of it: The Princesse on the other side, she was very much perplexed; she condemned all her thoughts; she repented of all she said, when she commended Artamenes; she thought he did interpret all her commendations to his prejudice: and then she would Page 31 be all silence, or answer coldly; yet she feared to disoblige him, and against her own inclination did repair that coldnesse with some slight civility. This visit did so passe, and Mandana carried it so handsomely, that Artamenes could not discover her true resentments, and he retired with more love, and more inquietude then before. At his return, there came unto him an old Captain of horse, who desiring to speak in private with him, and told him, that about three or four hours since, he met with a man on horseback coming to the Town as he was. He demanding whither he went, the man did answer him very surlily; afterwards falling into discourse of diverse matters, they quarrelled and fought; that there were certain men came in, and parted them: But during this Combat the man dropt a Letter, which I took up after he was gone, in which there might perhaps be something worth his notice. Artamenes thanked the Captain, and taking the Letter, it contained these words:

DO not fail in any thing which you have promised; and be assured, that for my part, I will not neglect to do what I ought: make sure of the Guards, which have engaged their faith unto you, as I will of the Souldiers which I shall bring unto you: Prepare men which shall observe respect unto that Person who most of all the world deserves it, and promise them such recompenses, as are worthy of their services. Moreover, though you have told me, and though I have promised you, that my passion cannot endure it should be you onely that should work out all my good fortune, so stay for me, before you begin to execute your designe: for peradventure it may so fall out, that when the Princesse shall see the Prince of Assyria at her feet, she will forgive his violencies, or at least excuse them: And as she is equally ignorant that Philidaspes is in love with her, and that Philidaspes is sonne to the Queen Nitocris. So it is fit it should be I which should acquaint her with both, as soon as we have carried her away, to the end that we may lessen her displeasure, by acquainting her with my condition and quality. He which brings this Letter is faithful: Trust him freely with your answer; and make haste, if you will oblige the most amorous Prince upon the earth and the most thankful.

After Artamenes had read this Letter, he was extreame surprized: he commended the fidelity of the Captain; promised him recompence, and that he would make it known unto the King: and after he had caused him to stay a while, he gave him a very good horse, and a fair suit of Arms; then he dismissed him, appointing him not to be out of the way, in case he should have any need of him: After this Officer was departed, Artamenes did read over the Letter again: Oh heavens, said he, Philidaspes is the Prince of Assyria, and Philidaspes is in love with Mandana; and Philidaspes would carry her away: I know his hand, and I know by it, that he is not more happy then my self, the Princesse is yet ignorant both of his Quality and his Love: Let me gather some benefit out of this ignorance; let me be faithful unto my enemy, and not discover him, lest in the discovery I should prejudice my self; his conspiracy must be defeated some other way: I must Put the Princesse into safety by taking away his life. He presently sent to know where Philidaspes was: But notwithstanding all his care and diligence it was not possible for him to finde him out. Some said he was in that Castle of which he had the Command: others assured, he was not; some said, he was rid out of Town for five dayes; and most said, they knew not where he was. Mean time, as Artamenes did not know the time when this conspiracy should be acted, he found the matter required quicknesse; yet it was a long while before he could resolve to acquaint Mandana that Philidaspes was one day to be the King of Assyria: He remembered that when he came to Babylon, this Prince was departed thence two dayes before; and he also remembered that he saw him in the Temple of Mars, the first day he came to Sinope: What shall I do (said he) against this dangerous Rival? shall I acquaint the King with this plot, without imparting it to the Princesse? Or shall I go to the Princesse before the King? Since the matter relates directly unto her, perhaps she will be offended if I do not make my first addresses unto her. Go then, Artamenes, and discover the whole truth unto her, and disguise it not at all. But what do I say? am I certain that I can be as good as my word? No, no, it is impossible? Can I tell my Princesse, that my Rival loves her? and that he is one of the greatest Princes of the world? and that he wants nothing to compleat his good fortune, but the consent of the fair Mandana? I that dare not speak for my self, must I speak for my Rival and my enemy? Must I stifle my own sighes, and conceal my own tears, and go to acquaint my Princesse with Page 32 the raptures and passions of my Rival? A Rival that is handsom, who has a heart and a soul, and whom I have often heard the fair Mandana commend. Ah No, no; I had far better die: But on the otherside (said he) the conspiracy is ready to break out, if I do not shew that which Philidaspes hath written, but content my self only to say that there is a perlicious design on foot; and that he is the contriver, who knows whether I shall be believed? every one knows that we two are not very good friends; and this conspiracy has so little probability in it, that before I can persuade them it is true, and endeavour to prevent it, it will be executed, the Town will be surprized, the Princesse carried away, and this haplie Rival will carry with her all that can induce me to love my life: Speak then Artamenes speak for thy Rival to the end thou mayest transact against him: If he were in a plate where I could find him, I would acquaint him with my passion, and not discover his unto the Princesse; and after that endeavour to leave him in a condition unlikely to carry any one away: Indeed I would do that which I am bound to do; he should die, or I would die, and so all our differences would be terminated. But, alas, he hides himself; he keeps out of my violence: I know no more of his enterprize, but as much as causes jealousies, fears, hatred and despair: I am ignorant who are his complices; I know neither when nor how they must act, I only know that they are designing my ruine. What shall I do unfortunate man? I lose time, whilst mine enemy is advancing his design: Go then, go to the Princesse; Tell her that which never any lover but my self did or would do, to the party loved: Peradventure (said he) I may draw some advantage out of my misfortune by it; I may chance discover in her fair eyes, the motion of her soul, and see the secrets of her heart; and perhaps also, that after I have spoke for another, I may find opportunity to speak for my self: Go then unhappy lover; follow as thy destiny leads thee, and defer it no longer: Hope still, that in declaring the love of Philidaspes unto Mandana, thou mayest cause her to hate him; and make all haste possible lest he execute his design, and carry her away, else he will get her into his power, and there he'll keep her: perhaps he will win her heart, obtain his pardon, and for ever enjoy her. This last thought moved him to resolve, not to lose one minute more of time, but to go presently unto Mandana; and did so in all haste, desiring so much favour as to speak with her in private. The Princesse did imagine that his drift was to speak unto her concerning his love, and therefore was offended at him; sending him word she was busie and he could not see her. Artamenes even desperate at this answer, sent her word the second time, that he desired to speak but one minute with her concerning something which related unto the service of the King and her, and which would not admit of any delay; Mandana wondering at this urgency of Artamenes, did think to deny the sight of him; but fearing that his business might indeed concern the service of the King, she commanded he should enter, and commanded Martesia with another of her women, not to stir out of her closet. My master then entred, and not being able with his own mouth to relate the passion of Philidaspes unto the Princesse; Madam, said he to her (after he had saluted her with much reverence, and presenting the Letter which Philidaspes had writ unto her) you will there find the justification of my importunity: Artamenes pronounced these words with such a troubled minde, that Mandana fearing it was some new device to speak unto her concerning his love, was in a mind to refuse it; but taking it afterwards with a trembling hand, and opening it with a blush, she was cleared of all her doubts, and she learned that from Artamenes, which she never did think to learn: Immediately there appeared much anger in her eyes, and my master received so much satisfaction, as to know assuredly, that Philidaspes had no deep share in the heart of Mandana: I am much beholding to you (said she to him) for giving me notice of so important a business; but tell me, I pray you, all that you know concerning the design. Artamenes then told her how he came by the Letter, and told her further, that if he could have found Philidaspes, he would have defeated the conspiracy, and never acquainted her with it. The Princesse then thanked him as civilly, as the trouble wherein she was would permit her; and wondering extremely at this adventure; what (said she) will Philidaspes Usurpe a Crown by violence & Treason, as I do imagine his design is? But that a lover should manifest his love by a raping way, is a thing without example, and above my patience: Mine I say (added she all in disorder) who could not indure a declaration of love from one of the greatest Princes upon earth, after ten years services, respects, sighs, and submissions. Artamenes heard these words with much sorrow; and fearing to find the like, he interrupted her, and asked her what was her pleasure he should do in this business? I would have you (said she) go with me to the King, and Page 33 acquaint him with it, and not to forsake me when I shall stand in need of your valour: As long as I live (replied my master) you shall not need to fear Philidaspes; and be confident Madam, if you please, that I will be no lesse solicitous to defeat his wicked design, then you your self are: I am obliged unto you (replied the Princesse) but let us lose no time, but presently go to the King: I know not Madam (said my master) whether my zeal to you will not seem a neglect of duty unto him, and whether he will not take it ill, that I have told you the rash enterprize of Philidaspes, before I advertized him; what you say (answered the Princesse) is not without some colour, therefore he must be told you met with me accidentally, as you were coming with the Letter unto him, and so you told it unto me: Sovereign power (said she) is a thing so nice, so delicate, and sensible, that how good soever your intentions were, yet perhaps the King will not like your proceeding; so that it is not a misse, if you tell him a handsome little innocent lye, to colour the matter. Then they went to Cixares his chamber, and told him what they knew, and the manner how they came to know it: Artamenes sent to seek the Captain who gave him the Letter, to the end the King might understand from the mouth of that officer, the whole matter. Cixares knowing the hand of Philidaspes, did certainly conclude it to be a dangerous conspiracy; He himself remembered, and knew that the Prince of Assyria was not at Babylon, nor had been a long time; therefore that confirmed him in his opinion, that Philidaspes was he: But since the complices were not mentioned in the Letter they could not guess at them. The Princesse and my master suspected Arieus to be one, yet since they knew the King loved him, they durst not openly declare their thoughts; Mean time, Artamenes having Orders to do whatsoever he should think fit for the safety of the Princesse; caused all the guards of the Castle and Town to be changed: and having caused all the Inhabitants of the Town to take Armes; he placed Courts of guard in every street: afterwards, he asked leave of the King, that he might go and chastise Philidaspes, but Cixares would not permit him to go out of the Town; and the Princesse did so strongly oppose it, that he thought no more of it, since indeed, they knew not very well where he was. The six thousand men which conducted the King of Pontus, were disposed of unto several Gates and Avenues about Sinope; for it was not doubted but Philidaspes would make use of those four thousand men which were about the Castle, whereof he was Governour, to execute his design. Arieus carried it extream craftily, and after the King told him of it, he seemed to be very zealous against it, and blamed Philidaspes very much, and did seemingly most endeavour to apprehend him; since it was not known whether he was lying hid in the Town, or in his Castle, they were much confused: yet notwithstanding the next morning, Artamenes was so urgent, that he was permitted to take the six thousand men, and go to summon the Castle, to be surrendered up unto him, and also to fight the four thousand men which were there, in case he found any opposition: But he was mightily amazed when he came there, and found none in the Castle, and not a man of the four thousand Quartered about it: all he found was, that indeed Philidaspes had been there, but went out the last night, and that about thirty furlongs from thence, he disbanded all his Troops, and went with a small Company unto a Forrest which was not far off: Artamenes went thither, and searched all about, sending many small Parties unto several quarters of the Forrest to hear of news, yet none was to be met with, only some Souldiers which fled and knew nothing, but that long since Philidaspes endeavoured to get the love of the Souldiers; and that ere long he did intend to employ them upon some important design. Artamenes then seeing he could hear no more of him, returned to Sinope, to render an account to the King and Princesse of what he had done: Mean while they kept up their Guards, and held an observant eye upon all those who had any Command of Forces in the Town. After all this Tumult and trouble, Artamenes being alone in his Closet, did recall into his memory, his last adventures, and to grieve at that extream violence, which he had observed in the Princesse mind, when she was told of the love of Philidaspes; what shall I do (said he) and what can I hope for from her, who speaks of the most puissant Prince of all Asia, with so much pride and disdain? yet (said he) should I have been more happy if she had spoke with lesse rigour then she did? for as she has exprest her self, I have no cause of jealousy, and therefore need not to fear the greatest torment of love: But alas, although she lessens my jealousy, yet she augments my despair; for since one of the greatest Princes of the world, hath declared his love unto her, and done ten years services, respects, sighs and submissions, yet all this passe for a crime in her mind; what can I hope for, who has not a Crown to present unto her? I who perhaps shall not be very well entertained Page 34 by the King my Father, when I shall return into Persia: I (I say) who am such a one as I dare not tell her, nor cannot tell her unlesse I incur her hatred? Oh heavens! what will the prevention of this dangerous Conspiracy avail me? and why should I wish my Rival removed, since the heart of Mandana is inflexible, and so hard that nothing can move it? As he was thus entertaining himself with these thoughts, Chrisantes and I arrived, and told him all our adventures: After our first welcomes, and after Chrisantes who was more weary with the haste we made, then I was, went to rest himself; My master embracing me with a most obliging tendernes: What Feraulas (said he to me) is become of the Letter which I gave you? is it yet in your hands? or did you deliver it the Princesse, when you came to Sinope, as I was told you did? Sir, (replied I) this demand, does call in question the fidelity of Feraulas; and you cannot doubt of my exact obedience, but doubt also of my affection to you: what Feraulas (said he unto me) then you have delivered it? yes Sir, said I, and she has received it: Ah Feraulas (said he) do not make me despair; and if Mandana told you then any thing which displeased her, I think it were good that you did not acquaint me with it; yet notwithstanding (said he, not giving me leave to speak) it is better that I knew the whole truth, that I may no longer trouble my self with an unfortunate life, and preserve an unprofitable hope. Sir (said I) you are far more happy then you think you are: No, no Feraulas (answered he) do not flatter me, and do as I did at first bid you. No Sir (said I to him) I do not disguise the matter; and then I exactly told him all that the Princesse said unto me. I represented unto him her sorrows; I told him of her sighes, and that I saw a deluge of tears flow from her eyes; that she spoke unto me with extream tendernes; that for his sake she would have me serve her; that she was fully informed of his quality; that I told her nothing but what was his pleasure she should know: and that if any judgement were to be given of esteem and friendship, by the sorrows which she testified; I assured him, he was then at a very high rate in her fancy: Ah Feraulas (said he to me) all that you have told me, relates onely unto poor dead Artamenes: But who knows whether Artamenes living, or if Artamenes were changed into Cyrus, he should be so happy? He must hope well (said I) and I assure you, that I see great appearances he will. My master hearkened unto all I said, as if a God were speaking unto him: and I got my self so much credit in his opinion by this welcome news which I told him, that from that time he did me so much honour as to acquaint me with all his thoughts: He caused me to repeat a hundred times over what I told him before; and he was so inquisitive, as he would almost have me tell him what the Princesse thought, and what she said after I was gone out of her Closet, but I could not tell him that; for as yet there was no such amity betwixt Martesia and me, although truly it was not long after that I professed my self her servant, and became her confident. Artamenes then finding himself much more happy then he hoped, could not leave putting further questions unto me: sometimes concerning things past, and sometimes what I thought of future events: yet notwithstanding all this joy which I had brought him, sometimes his soul was not serene, but feared that Artamenes would not be so happy living as he was dead. And certainly his fears were not without foundation; for at that very time when I was thus with him, Martesia who accidentally did meet Chrisantes and me, as we arrived, went to advertise her mistrisse of it: Ah Martesia (said she to her) what do you tell me? and what is Feraulas going to tell Artamenes? I suppose (said this wise Princesse) that to gain the love of his master, he will tell a hundred things which I never said unto him. He can tell nothing (replied Martesia) but that he heard you sigh often, and that he saw you weep, for the death of a man, who perhaps you would weep for again if he were really dead; I confess it (answered Mandana) but if he were dead he could never come to know my weakness; no (replied Martesia) nor ever acknowledge it by his services and respects: But (said the Princesse) Artamenes will now know it by Feraulas, that I have done such things as are never used to be done but unto such as we love: 'Tis true Madam (said Martesia) but would you have Artamenes believe you hate him? he who has a thousand, and a thousand times exposed his life in your service; who has preserved the Kings, your Father; who has gained so many battles; who has brought a King a Prisoner, and who at this very time prevents a conspiracy which aims at your person: No Martesia (answered the Princesse) I would not have Artamenes think I am stupid, ungrateful, and insensible, as I should be if I should hate him: But as I would not have him think I hate him, so I should be very glad if he would not think I love him: I wish that he should desire it without hope, and content himself with a great esteem and much acknowledgement. These distinctions are too delicate, Page 35 and nice (replied Martesia) and it is not an easie matter to keep within that just mediocrity which you propose, nor do I think you can do it your self: mock not at my weakness (answered Mandana) but help me to hide it in not forsaking me when Artamenes is with me; for I do confesse I should be very sorry he should urge me to banish him: See Sir, how the Princesse and my Master did both of them reason the matter in private: indeed the matter was carried, as she resolved it should, for during fifteen dayes it was absolutely impossible for Artamenes to speak with the Princesse privately: she carried it so handsomly and with so much Civility to my Master, as he could not except against it: yet notwithstanding, he thought himself very unhappy, and not daring to complain of Mandana, did yet perpetually complain of his rigorous destiny: he knew very well, that the Princesse was the true cause of his distempers, but he had ever so great a respect unto her that he would never accuse her, but when he could find no excuse, nor no other cause of his misfortunes: yet after these Fifteen dayes, though Mandana did very obstinately avoid all manner of occasions to be alone with Artamenes: yet fortune for all her severity brought it so about, that my Master found an opportunity to talk in privat with her. The Princesse, since the Prince of Assyria attempted against her (for we will no longer call him Philidaspes) never went out of the towne to take the Aire; all her walks were Confined unto Gardens within the walls, which were of no great Circumference. Thither she ordinarily went when the sun grew low; she was alwaies waited upon by very many, so that it was impossible for my Master to speak unto her in any language but that of eyes: yet it was a language which she would not understand nor answer, for since the returne of Artamenes she was very weary of her looks. So it happened, that the King would discourse in private with the Princesse, in that Garden: every one, out of reverence retired to the other side: and as this discourse continued long so those who were not absolutely tyed to wait upon the King did by degrees depart: so that when the King went out there were no more men left in the Garden, then were to wait upon him: my Master offering to follow him, and Ciaxares seeing the Princesse alone with her women: no Artamenes (said the King to him) I will leave you to entertaine my daughter, and to divert her from that Solitude which she is apt unto: This Prince was ravish at this Command, and obeyed it with joy; and the Princesse who was extremely Surprised at the accident, Could not find any pretence to prevent it: she looked all about for Martesia, but saw her not: for she seeing all the Court in the Garden could not imagine the Princesse would be in any need of her to prevent Artamenes from speaking unto her: So that she went to dispatch other businesse: There were yet four or five other of her women with her: yet they having received no particular command to keep neer her as long as Artamenes was with her; my Master no sooner began to lead her in her walk, but all they stayed some ten or twelve paces behind: The Princesse was then in that Arbour which is directly opposite to the garden dore: so that though she had a desire to retire her self, yet she must of necessity walk that out: she would all waies begin to discourse, to the end she might prevent my Master in his intention, who being transport[ed with passion, and invited unto it by this favorable opportunity, interrupted her, and with much reverence said unto her. If the poor services, which I had the happinesse to doe unto the King, hath any thing obliged you, (as you have divers times done me so much honor as to say they have) then, I most humbly entreat you Madam doe not go away so soone: but do me that honour, and give me so much liberty, as to discourse one hour in private with me. If it be, (answered the Princesse) to discourse concerning any thing which relates unto the King my father, I shall most gladly consent unto it: but if it be not, I cannot believe you have any such business with me as must be discourt of in private. The Princesse blusht as she pronounced these last words, and my master continued speaking unto her very low; that which I desire of you (said he) is more easie then you imagine, since it is absolutely in your owne dispose, without implying the Kings consent: But Madam (said he) why doe you feare Artamenes? and why will you not harken unto him? I fear, (replyed she, that he does not know me well; and I fear least he should desire such things as I could not consent unto; Therefore, if he will take my Counsell, he shall not expose himself to be denied. No Madam (replied Artamenes) my soul cannot be satisfied with that: I must either absolutely leave the court: I must fly away for ever; I must die in despair, or else the Illustrious Fair Mandana must hear me: I desire but this one only favour, I ask no more, and if you will be pleased to grant it, Artamenes will esteem himself most happy: as often as you desire, (replyed the Princesse) to speak in [Page 36 private, I doe alwaies imagine you come to tell me of some new Conspiracie; and that there is some other Philidaspes, whose ill designe I must know, and punish if it be possible. Tis true (replyed my Master) that which I have to tell you, is not so far unlike that of Philidaspes, but you may guess at it, since that same cause which moves him to act, moves me to speak: But Madam, far from my thoughts be it to do you any violence: My thoughts are only to die: & I desire nothing from you, but that it may be permitted me to hope from your goodness, for some testimonies of Compassion when you shall hear your Rigour has caus'd my death: such as you were pleased to afford me when last you thought me dead by the hands of your enemies: This Madam is all the Favour that I ask, and all that I will present unto the illustrious, and most Faire Mandana: The Princesse being much surpris'd at this discourse, would not give any suddain or tumultuous answer, but designing to satisfie her own virtue, without giving a check unto that Amitie which she bore unto my Master, she tooke a little longer time for it; therefore seeing a green seat neer her she sat down, and my Master stood by her, bending himself down the better to understand her, whilst the Princesse women leaning against a Raile some seven or eight paces off, did talk together. As the Princesse did fit, and Artamenes assumed again his discourse, she prevented him, and told him thus: I see Feraulas thought my tears very pretious, since he would not hide them from you: and the compassion which I had for dead Artamenes, has made living Artamenes very bold: Therefore since I my self did contribute unto your fault, I will not treat you so severely as if you had not this excuse: And I think those obligations which I have to you, do require that I should not banish you upon a light occasion, but Artamenes, after this tendernes which I had towards you, and yet still have, you must repent your self of it, and correct your self for it: If I should repent that I loved you (answered my Master) you have pronounced the sentence of death upon me; and I will not deferre the execution: but Madam this is a thing which I never did, nor ever can doe; Repent at least replied the Princesse that you ever told me of it: and resolve with your self never to speak of it any more: Since I have spoke of it once (answered my Master) if you forbid me to speak of it any more, I doubt I shall not obey you, and my death within a few dayes will tell you of my passion: But Madam, I must tell you once, I must acquaint you with my love, since else perhaps you will never know it: I conjure you Madam not to refuse me this favour: Remember Madam, that you told me, he who has the honour to speak unto you, had the good fortune to be lamented by you, after he took upon him the boldnesse to write unto you, that he loved you: Tis true (replyed the Princesse much disordered) but it was principally because you having never told me of it, I pittied you: Continue then in the same bounds and limits wherein you lived before; and I will keep the same dispositions which I had: But Madam, (answered Artamenes) I cannot recall whats past and I can do no lesse then I have writ: Tis true (replyed Mandana) but you may forbear telling me of it any more: Though that were possible Madam (replied Artamenes) yet my eyes and all my actions would speak it for me, and my death would presently after more strongly confirm it unto you, then all my words can doe. Moreover Madam, do not think that I have rendred my self your slave without a Combate: I have resisted you as much as I could: and perhaps I had stronger reasons then you think I had to do so: I saw you Madam, and I loved you, though I used the utmost of my endeavours to the contrary: yet for all that, I could not break my Chains nor shake off my Fetters: and I have ever worn them with as much patience as respect: more then this Madam I have served the King, or rather you, since I never thought upon any but you: and since the Armes of Cappadocia have been fortunate in my hands, it must be attributed unto that ambition which swe'l'd my soul to render my self worthy of your love: you know Madam, how I have Lived: you know that I never spoke one word unto you which could displease you: and I had not spoke unto you of my Love, but when I thought I should never speak more: I concealed my Love till, death, and certainly if I had not told you of it when I was thought to be in my grave, I had never told it with my tongue: But Madam, since your tears revived me: since the gods did cease those sorrowes which you resented at my loss, by giving me life: why will you so cruelly push me into my Coffin? and why will you not afford some pity upon an unfortunate Prince, since you had some compassion on him when he was thought to be dead? it is because (replied Mandana) that the dead Prince did expiate his fault in Dying, and the Living Prince did revive his crime with his resurrection: indeed Artamenes (said she with a very serious look) I do confess that I much esteem you; that I have many obligations upon me towards you; & that your supposed death did much grieve me: but at that very same [Page 37 time I also declare, that I loved my own honour and glory much more then I esteem Artamenes, though I esteem him very much, and though I am infinitely tender of you, yet I would resist and overcome it rather then consent you should entertain me with a passion which will render me suspected: Ha Madam, (said Artamenes) how ill instructed are you with that love which you have procured in my heart? and how little doe you know with what zeal I love you? Know Madam, that the purity of my passion does equal the purity of your own glorious Soul: yes Divine Princesse, I do love you after such a Reverential manner, that I would for ever disclaim my own heart, if it should entertaine any unjust desire. I love and prefer the Glory of Mandana before my own; and if I did find in my self the least vitious thought, I durst never be so bold as to speak unto her of love: moreover Madam, if my birth and quality had rendred me unworthy to carry your fetters, I should break them in giving my self a death: and I should never have suffered the fair and illustrious Mandana to have a slave unworthy of her: Oh, I wish to the Gods, that Artamenes did me it that glorious title by his own virtues, as he merits it by his quality; yet Divine Mandana, it is for the love of you that Artamenes is only Artamenes: and is so far from being taken for the Son of a Great King, that he passes only for a man whom fortune favours: But Madam, in dedicating himself unto your service, he ceaseth not to be what he is, to wit, one that ever had a great soul, and alwayes incapable of any unjust thought: Do not think, I beseech you, that I have known you so ill, that my heart can suspect you of any weaknesse; No Madam, I never could think the Princesse Mandana was ever capable of any violent passion, yet I hoped that she would tolerate me and my passion, since it was not opposite unto her vertue; for indeed Madam, I dare sue for nothing else but onely permission to love you; and to tell you so. You ask too much by half (answered the Princesse blushing) and I should be unworthy of that innocent passion, which you do assure me, you bear unto me, if I should consent unto what you desire, and if I suffered you to tell me that more then once, which all others, except you, never told me without being hated. This exception is most glorious unto me Madam (replied Artamenes) but this prohibition is also most rigorous; I would gladly know, what crime I have committed since my returne? You have told me that (answered Mandana) which you ought not to have told me; thats your crime. Then Madam I must have lost my life; (said Artamenes) for indeed it is come to that passe, as I could not live, and not love you, nor love you without telling you, nor be silent without dying. The Princesse then was silent a good while; afterwards, beginning to speak, I must needs tell you Artamenes (said she to him) that you do extremely anger me: I do esteem you; I am much obliged to you, and yet I have much ado to forbear banishing you. Apply your self I conjure you to regulate your thoughts if it be possible: esteem Mandana as she ought to be, then she will not be offended; but on the contrary, as she is satisfied by the secret testimony of her souls purity, so she does ingeniously confesse unto you, that she is joyed Artamenes does value her, and perhaps that Artamenes loves her; but she would have this affection limited, and keep within its bounds: Then she would have that which is not possible (answered my Master) but that which is most equitable and fit (replyed the Princesse) for in[deed vertue does prescribe limits unto all things. I have already told you Madam (replied Artamenes) that my passion does not contradict vertue: Time and your silence will manifest that (answered Mandana in rising) and by these two, I shall know whether the affection of Artamenes to me, be as pure as he saith it is: Why Madam, replied my Master, do you forbid me to speak? Yes (answered the Princesse blushing) unlesse it be to tell me the true name of Artamenes. My Master stood amazed at this answer; yet notwithstanding after he had been a while silent: If I should tell you, replied he, you would not preserve me in your good opinion: and if I must die by your severity; it were better that you do blame your self for the death of a poor simple Cavalier, then for the death of a great King. This was their discourse, when a great deal of company came in, and interrupted their conversation: and since the Princesse was moved in her minde she retired, and was no sooner come into the Castle, but she went into her closet, and called for Martesia; she being come, the Princesse chid her, because contrary to her order she had left her, and afterwards, related unto her what my Master had said, and her answers; but with so much inquietude, that it was easie to judge there was a great combat in her heart; and that how innocent soever the passion of Artamenes was, yet her scrupulous vertue was not satisfied with that discourse she had with him. She said that she should have spoke more roughly unto him, and that she should have banished him. My Master, for his part, did complain [Page 38 both of Mandana, and himself: he found himself nothing satisfied in his love; he could not perceive that she did receive his love very well, and though she had not banished him, yet he found no great concordance, between the relation of Feraulas, and what he did finde himself; and yet he preserved some hopes, and lived at a little more quiet then he did before: he never saw the Princesse, but she blushed; he never spoke unto her, but she received his discourse; and though all their talk was but general, and as it were interruptions, yet she alwayes gave him some light satisfaction. But indeed (not to keep you too long with my relation) Artamenes behaved himself with so much reverence towards Mandana; and she did so perfectly see, that he had no thoughts but such as were full of innocence and vertue, that she began not to shun his converse so much as before, but sometimes to give him the liberty to tell her how much he esteemed her, yet not to dare openly to professe his passion. One day then when he was in her chamber, being transported with the violence of his love, and seeing none but Martesia with her, he did beseech her with tears in his eyes, that she would be pleased to tell him her true apprehensions of him. That which you ask (answered she, very obligingly, and with much spirit) is not perhaps of so small importance as you think, and I conceive I am not bound to satisfie that man so far, who thinks me not discreet enough to be told the true place of his birth, and his right name. Ha Madam (replied my Master) what do you ask me? and what would you know? Ha Artamenes (answered she) what do you also ask me? and what is it you would know? That which I desire Madam (replied he) is but of a small importance, for indeed, I would onely know whether you hate me; whether you be indifferent, or whether, by good fortune, you have any disposition to admit of my love without repugnance. That which I would know of you (replied the Princesse) does not less concern me: for indeed, since you are not Artamenes, I ought not to consider you as such a one; and I may tell such things unto a Medean, which I ought not to tell unto a Scythian: How would you have me speak unto you, since I do not know you? Does it not suffice Madam (answered he) that you know my heart, and that you know I adore you? Not at all, answered she, and though I do know these things which you tell me of, yet that is not enough to instruct me, how to regulate my behaviour with you. So then Madam (said my Master) according to what I am, you will behave your self more or less obliging to me; Doubtlesse I shall, replied she. But Madam (said my Master) of what Country soever I am, I shall be the very same you see me: So that, will it not be some injustice in you to hate me, because perhaps I shall be of that Country which does not please you? I do not say I will, replied the Princesse, and I do promise you, that I shall always esteem Artamenes in my heart, of what Country soever he be: yet if you be (said she) of that Quality as you say, and as I believe you are, how is it possible there can be any such great mystery in concealing it: Speak then (said she to him) and tell me what you are, if you would have me tell you any thing. My Master being extremely put to it, did not think to reveal himself, yet upon second consideration, he resolved to discover himself: for conceiving that what good thoughts soever the Princesse had of him, she would never manifest them until she knew it, therefore he resolved upon it to tell her the truth: I know Madam (said he to her) that in telling you who I am, I do run a hazard to be hated; but I do know also, that it ought to persuade you of the greatness of my passion, and will do more than all my words and services can do, since it is most certain, that if it had not been extremely violent, from the very first minute it began, Cyrus would never have loved you. Cyrus? (replied the Princesse in a mighty amazement) what Artamenes, was not Cyrus drowned? No Madam, replied he, he never was in danger of it. But is it possible (said she in wonder) that you are Cyrus? Yes Divine Princesse (said he, kneeling to her) you see at your feet, the same Cyrus, whose life has caused so many turbulencies in the King of Medes, and whose death caused an universal joy thorough all Asia, when the fair and famous Mandana did thank the Gods for it, as pitiful as she is, and offered a sacrifice unto them: yes Divine Mandana, the first time that my eyes had the honour to see you, was in the Temple of Mars, and it was there where my passion first took resolution never to rise up Cyrus, until Artamenes had obtain'd permission from Mandana: It is therefore in you to dispose absolutely of my Destiny: He will stay in his Tomb, if you please; and he will come out if you permit him: for indeed, since you have done him the favour and honour not to hate him, it does not much import whether he be Cyrus or Artamenes, and passe as a common Knight, or as a great Prince, since most certainly he has no higher Ambition but to be loved by you. Mandana hearkened unto this discourse with much attention Page 39 and astonishment. At the first, she knew not what thoughts to entertain concerning my Master, or whether she should believe him; but that doubt did quickly vanish, and she was so well acquainted with his high generosity, that she believed every word he spoke, and made no question but that he was really Cyrus: She considered with her self, that it was no harder matter that the world should falsely believe Cyrus to be drown'd, then to believe that Artamenes was killed, as all Cappadocia thought not long since; and that it was no more impossible that Artamenes should be Cyrus, then that Philidaspes should be the Prince of Assyria: Reasoning all these things in secret with her self, she was a long time looking upon my master before she would give any answer; which did so much trouble my master, as not being able to conceal it; I see Madam (said he to her) you cannot keep your word with me, not to change thoughts of Artamenes: I perceive by your silence, that Cyrus hath disturbed you: Cyrus (replied the Princesse) has indeed a little troubled the calmness of my mind; yet I will assure you he has done no ill office unto Artamenes; but on the contrary (said she sighing) but as I find Artamenes to be much more unfortunate than I thought him, so also I find more disposition in my self to lament him: But I pray, said she, tell unto me all your past adventures, and do not conceal any thing from me, which concerns the beginning of that life, whose after years has rendred him so glorious: My master to satisfy her, did punctually relate unto her all that had chanced unto him: He told her what Harpagus told him concerning the ill intentions of Astiages towards him; afterwards what offers Harpagus did propound unto him, how he would cause the whole Province of Paratecenes to rise against the King of Medea; he told her also how he refused his offers, and how he commanded him to make no more such propositions: He told her also how desires of Travel to see the wars had caused him to leave Persia, and change his name: In few words, he told her of all his Travels; how a Tempest drove him into Sinope, and how he was in the Temple of Mars where he saw her thank the gods for his death. It is true indeed, said the Princesse, that I was with the Sacrificers to render thanks unto the gods for the losse of Cyrus, but it is as true also that I did never rejoyce at his death: And that it did ever seem unto me much rashness in those who dare undertake to explain the Oracles, and the meaning of the Star so precisely: Can I believe Madam (said my master interrupting her) that the fair Mandana did not rejoyce at the death of Cyrus? Cyrus, I say, whom Astiages would have smothered in his Cradle: Cyrus whom all the Magi were certain, should possess the Throne of the King of Medes, and command all Asia. And Cyrus who from his infancy has disturbed the tranquillity of a King, who has such near relation unto you. It need not seem strange unto you (replied the Princesse) that I should not rejoyce at the death of a Prince whom I knew not, and who never did me any hurt, since you had so much generosity as not to take revenge upon that King who would have put you to death: and (as you have done) to serve that Prince who had his life from him, who would have taken yours away. But Artamenes (said she unto him) for I dare not yet call you Cyrus, since you have told me what you are, I have not lessened that esteem which I had of you; and on the contrary, seeing I am more obliged unto you than I thought, I think my self engaged to acknowledge it: yet notwithstanding, I confesse that I do not well know how I ought to deal with you. If I look upon you as a Prince who would not take revenge of his enemy, by reason of relations in consanguinity; As a Prince, I say, who in spite of all those reasons which might have absolutely diverted him, yet hath not ceased to love me: A Prince who hath saved the life of the King my Father; who hath a thousand and a thousand times exposed his own for him; who hath received so many wounds; Conquered so many Provinces; won so many Battles; took a King a Prisoner; prevented a dangerous Conspiracy; and who has long loved me, without telling me of it, or displeasing me: If I look upon you, in these respects I do confesse Artamenes, that without any prejudice to virtue or decency, I could wish, that by the consent of the King my father, I might give you some testimonies of that extraordinary esteem which I have of you. But if I also look upon you as a Prince whose birth began with so many prodigies, so many eclipses which dimmed the splendor and heat of the Sun, who shook the foundations of the Temple; of whom the Stars have foretold so much; and all the Magi assures us he will be the overthrow of all Asia: I confesse, I say, that then I cannot well resolve my self; for though 'tis true my heart tells me that they who did interpret the meaning of those things, have but ill understood them; and that if the Stars did foretell your birth, it was because the gods did prelsage unto men by them, that you should be a Prince whose virtues should be extraordinary: Page 38 <1 page duplicate> Page 39 <1 page duplicate> Page 40 Though, I say, I should resent it so, yet this is not enough: Doubtlesse Astiages and Cixares will never allow that Mandana should dispose of her affection unto Cyrus: But Mandana (said Artamenes interrupting her) this same Cyrus who is so terrible unto all Asia, is now prostrate at your feet, and you may dispose of his fate as you please; To what end Madam (said he) to what end are all his Conquests which he hath made? Can it be imagined that he aimed at any universal usurpation, since he hath refused all that the King would give him? though I have fought, an vanquished, and conquered, yet doubtlesse he hath enjoyed the fruits of all my combates, my victories and my conquests; I am not so much as master of my own sword; but since you do reign in the heart of him whose hand doth guide it, you need not fear I shall commence any unjust war: It belongs unto you, Divine Princesse, to order the destinies of people and Kings; and the life of Artamenes depends wholly upon your will: yet Madam (said he in a most submissive manner) if it be your pleasure that Cyrus shall not revive, he is ready to obey you: yes adored Princesse, Cyrus who can disturbe the tranquility of all Asia, and has hopes to reign of a great and glorious Kingdom, is ready to renounce all his rights that he hath unto the Crown of Persia, and passe away all the rest of his dayes under the cloud of Artamenes, if he find any hopes that Mandana will not lesse esteem him. And if it be so that he must wear a Scepter to merit you, chuse you Madam, in what place of the world you would have him expose his life to get one, and certainly he will go: Things that are most impossible would appear unto me most easie, provided you will not take from me my hopes of your love; Say then, Divine Princesse, would you have Cyrus revive? or would you have Artamenes live? or would you have them both die? I give you the choice of these three wayes: Speak, I beseech you, and conceal not your true resentment from me. First, would you have Cyrus come out of his Tomb? I dare not advise him to that (replied the Princesse) fearing if he should, he should enter it for ever. Will you then have Artamenes live, only as Artamenes? That would not be just (answered the Princesse) nor advantageous for him. Will you then Madam, (replied he) have them both die together? By no means (answered she) for I have had too much sorrow for the death of Artamenes, to hope I should find any consolation in the death of Cyrus and his both. What then is your pleasure I shall do (replied he?) I know not (answered she) but I desire to take some time to resolve my self. But however Madam (replied my master) will you be pleased that I should hope I am not hated, whether you consider me either as Artamenes or as Cyrus? I do permit it (said she, and did rise) since it is not just I should be lesse generous then you are. Thus Sir, the discourse ended, which my master, as soon as he was retired, did me the honour to relate exactly unto me. Feraulas (said he unto me) <◇> did foresee that Artamenes would not be so happy living as dead; and it was only compassion which moved the fair Mandana to weep. Sir (said I to him, after he had told me all that I have told you) I do not see that you have any great cause of complaint, nor why you should not hope for more indulgency from that severity which the Princesse hath used towards you; for she has not banished you, nor absolutely forbidden you to speak, she has only took time to resolve her self: hope Sir, hope well, and believe that it is very hard for her, after so many great acts as you have done, not to resent them well; and certainly they will plead very powerfully for you in the heart of illustrious Mandana. Ha Feraulas (said he) it is not good to be flattered with hopes, but better to resent some little despair; If you knew (said he unto me) how my heart trembled when I expected the sentence of death from the mouth of Mandana, the first time she spoke unto me, you would have pittied me. As the state of things is now, I do not know whether I should still continue Artamenes, or whether I may appear as Cyrus; whether I should die, or whether they would have me live: I am absolutely ignorant whether I should be the most unhappy Prince upon earth, or the most happy: this cruel ambiguity must needs put my soul into great disorder; for indeed, it is brought unto that passe, that I must expect nothing else but either a most inhumane death, or a life full of all felicities: Artamenes added unto these, a hundred other contemplations, which moved me unto much compassion, and which did clearly let me see, that he did love, as much as it was possible for any one in the world to love. But whilst he was thus speaking of it unto me, the Princesse was in discourse with Martesia, and told her all her resentments: Did ever any see the like adventure unto mine (said she) whilst I am praying and offering Sacrifices of thanks unto the gods for the death of Cyrus, that very same Cyrus is a witness of all my Sacrifices and Prayers, and yet for all this he loves me, and follows me, and is continually with the King my Father? He hath performed a hundred glorious Page 41 acts which I dare not almost remember, fearing they should make Cyrus more predominate in my heart. Alas! Oh ye just gods (said she) why have you suffered men to explain your intentions so badly? and that they should believe Cyrus would overthrow all Asia, and sit in the Throne of the King of the Medes? He, I say, who does not employ his valour unto any other end, but the advantage of him who must one day have the Scepter of Astyages? But Madam, (said Martesia to her) who knows whether the gods have not intended that Cyrus shall reign in Medea by Marrying a Princesse, who, in all likelihood, if things do not change faces, shall be the Queen of it? If the Gods had pleased to have had it so (replied she) they would not have moved the heart of Astyages to hate Cyrus as he doth: And my dear Martesia (said she) that which you imagine hath no foundation, or likelihood in it; and I must absolutely forbid it, notwithstanding all the Merits, the Quality, the Services and all the Vertues of Artamenes, and not dispose of my self, but according to reason. But yet Madam (said Martesia to her) what do you resolve upon? and what shall Artamenes resolve upon? Shall he be still Artamenes? or shall he become Cyrus? I would have him (replied Mandana) seek out handsome expedients to appear Cyrus; not to be distastfull unto Astyages, to be protected by the King my Father, and to obtain their permissions to marry me; which if he can do, I shall not be any hindrance of his good fortune, and perhaps (if I durst say it without blushing) I would share with him in it: But if he cannot do as I say, within a time that I shall limit him, and which shall not be long; I must, my dear Martesia, banish him for ever; and perhaps, deprive my self for ever of all tranquillity and delights. Me thinks, Madam (answered Martesia) that this resolution is too violent; and knowing the virtue of Artamenes, and your own innocency as you do, you ought not to drive that Prince into despair, unto whom you are so much obliged. Time, Madam, begets alterations every day: you know that Astyages is extremely old, so that this remora will quickly be removed. No, no, Martesia, said she to her, I neither can nor ought to suffer Artamenes, after he has discovered his passion and his Quality to stay any longer amongst us: If the King should chance to discover it, had he not good reason to taxe me with a Crime? and might he not imagine, that I have conspired with Cyrus to partake with him in the dominion of all Asia, which the Magi have foretold? What better way can you finde Madam (replied Martesia) to prevent the too ambitious designes of Cyrus, then to keep him alwayes neer you? as long as he shall be onely Artamenes, and as long as he is in love with the Princesse Manjdana, he will never make war upon Astyages; he will never assault Ciaxares. But who knows Madam, whether if you banish him, this Great and Heroick soul will endure your Rigour with Patience? Who can tell whether or no he will bring a war upon all Cappadocia, and upon all Medea? you are acquainted with his good fortune: you know his courage; fear then, fear I say to incense it, and do not you your self contribute unto the desolation of all Asia: Take heed Madam, take heed what you do, and do not too rashly banish Artamenes. Martesia, replied the Princesse, all that you say is very considerable; yet notwithstanding, that which I think is no lesse, and I had rather expose all Asia unto danger, then my own glory: For if this revolution chance to come, doubtlesse it is the determinate resolution of the Gods to have it so; but Mandana neither can nor ought bring her self into suspition of a criminall intelligence, in suffering a disguised Prince to be in the Court; One who is well proportioned, of a great heart and soul, and moreover one that is in love with her. Ah Martesia, this ought not to be: Not but that if I do banish Artamenes (said she and blusht) I shall banish him with much repugnancy and sorrow; yet notwithstanding, in consideration of my own Glory, it is very requisite that Artamenes do not suspect me of any weaknesse. I have told him of such obliging things, that I do fear he will think more then I would have him, and indeed I had rather he should suffer, and that I my self should suffer, then expose my self to be lesse esteemed. But Madam (replied Martesia) can you pronounce this sad sentence? I know not (answered she) and I dare not assure you; yet I will strive with my self, as much as possible to hide from him that tendernes which I have of him. Thus did the illustrious Mandana resolve upon that cruel sentence which she was to pronounce against my dear Master; but since he did not yet know it, he still lived betwixt hope and fear: Mean time, the King of Pontus, although he was very well treated in his Prison, yet was he most unhappy; for since he saw the Princesse out of a window, at his entrance into Sinope, that sight did renew in his heart fresh resentments of love, as violent as he was capable of: The remembrance of all those pleasant dayes wherein he had formerly seen her in Page 42 that Town, did extreemly torment him. Alas (said he, as afterwards he told) what good fortune can I ever hope for? I, who during the time I was in this Court, and at liberty, never could obtain one favourable look from Mandana? what can I pretend unto who am vanquished, and clog'd with fetters as I am? I do acquaint you Sir, with a few of the King of Pontus thoughts, that you may not be ignorant of any thing which passed at Sinope. As for Ciaxares, he lived at ease and peaceably, enjoyed the pleasant fruits of Artamenes his Victories. Aribeus for his part, he transacted with much subtilty, and seemed to regard nothing but the managing of State affairs, wherein Artamenes would not meddle, limittin his employments altogether unto Martial matters. At this time there came news, from the Camp, that the King of Phrygia had not yet got any considerable Body together since his defeat: And there ran a report that Bithynia would rise, and relieve the King of Pontus; but this last news was not certain, nor had the prisoner King heard it, when he sent in the morning to desire my Master that he would come unto him. Artamenes who was naturally most civil, and who esteemed this Prince very much, though he was his Rival, did not fail to do as he desired him, after he had asked the Kings leave to see him. When he was come into his chamber, and the Guards retired, the King of Pontus said unto him: Generous Artamenes, you have so nobly obliged me with Arms in your hand, that I cannot beleieve you will do it with lesse joy now I am in your fetters, therefore I took so much liberty as to desire my Conqueror, he would be pleased to come unto me, that I my self might desire him, that he would be pleased to be my friend, my protector, and my confident, altogether. Since fortune onely (answered Artamenes) caused you to lose your liberty, you have given me a Title which I ought not to abuse, and you offer unto me three Qualities, which I dare not accept of, since I am not worthy to be your friend, and since I have not power enough to be your Protector, and since I have not perhaps, all those necessary Qualities which might deserve the honour of being your confident: But Sir, without any further search what attributes you should give me, I do sincerely assure you, that any thing which Artamenes can do to serve you, he will do it with much gladnesse; for indeed you have obliged me to it, and perhaps over obliged me. The King of Pontus not apprehending the mysterious sence of these last words, did answer nothing unto them, but began to commend him afresh, and extoll his generosity. Then when he thought he had said enough, to prepare his minde not to refuse him: Noble Artamenes (said he) doubtlesse you are not ignorant, that the Prince whom you see, is fettered with more chains then one; and those which heretofore he received from the Princesse Mandana, are yet neither united nor broken, but much more strong and heavy, then those which your valour causes me to wear. Artamenes was much surprised at this discourse; but since the King of Pontus minde was taken up with what he had to say, he did not observe it, but continued his speech: I know very well you are not ignorant, that I having been heretofore sent unto Ciaxares as a Hostage, during the Treaty of Peace, betwixt the late King my father and him, I remained in this Court six Moneths; That I fell in love with the Princesse Mandana; that I durst not discover my passion otherwise then by sighes; that I departed with much grief: you know also, that at my return, I understood not onely that my Father was dead, but my elder Brother also, so that as soon as my tears for them were dried up, and being then a King of two Kingdoms, I thought that I might without offence, pretend unto the Princesse of Cappadocia: I sent Embassadors unto Ciaxares to demand her in Marriage; you have doubtlesse also heard, how that Prince did deny her, because I was a stranger; he I say, who did not need to insist so rigorously upon that Law of the State nor observed it so precisely upon that occasion, since there was not a Prince in all Cappadocia, who was capable of marrying her. Since you know all these, Generous Artamenes, I will not trouble you with a more exact relation of them: I will onely beseech you will be pleased to assist me with your advice, what I shall do in this unhappy condition which I am in: But that ye may the better do it, I will open my heart unto you, and tell you that I do most passionately love the Princesse Manjdana; and though I am vanquished, yet I cannot chuse but desire to Reign in her heart. Tell me then, I beseech you, what I should do, and what I should hope for; and wheth• the illustrious Artamenes, can by his favour, his generosity, and his addresses finde an <...> means to mollifie Ciaxares, and bend the inflexible minde of Mandana, and whether h <...> can make me a Conquerour in my fetters. I do know very well (added he) that I d <...> speak without ground, and without reason: But what would you have a passionate amo <...> rous man do? who can have no liberty without Mandana; who cares not for his life without Page 43 leave to love her: who cannot think of any peace having such an inveterat war in his heart; nor speak of any Ransom unto a Prince, with whom he can have no treaty without Mandana; I do know also very well that I am unist to speak thus unto you, But generous Artamenes, if you ever have loved, you will lament me as much as your self, and you will comfort me in my misery, though you cannot cure it. My master harkned unto this discourse with extreame sadnesse and displeasure: He had a good mind to tell the King of Pontus, that he could never have made choice of a more unfit man then himself, to do him this office, and indeed to have told him the true cause, and by that means denyed his assistance: yet not knowing whether the Princesse would think well of it, therefore he would not take that course, and therefore against his inclination he was forced to dissemble the truth. The condition which you are in (answered Artamenes unto the King of Pontus, after he had a little thought upon it) doubtless is worthy of compassion, and I do pity you more in respect of the fetters which Mandana hath caused, then in respect of those which fortune hath brought upon you by my hand: yet since it is the Princesse who gave them unto you, it must be she only who can comfort you: and you demand that of Artamenes which he neither can or ought to serve you in: Think not Sir, added he, that it is for want of Generosity which causeth me to do this; and believe, that if you did know me well, you would not suspect any such thing, but would acknowledg, that I do but what I ought to doe: yet to testifie, that I have a designe to acknowledg those obligations which I have towards you, I do promise that I will endeavour to obtain an advantageous peace for you from Ciaxares, which shall be more advantageous then if you were not a Prisoner: and I will not neglect any thing which may obtain your liberty: But as for the Princesse (said he) dispench with me I beseech you from doing you that office or speaking unto her of your passion: she is a Princesse who makes profession of so much austere vertue; and there appears so much majesty and modesty in her looks; that though I were the greatest Prince upon Earth and sate triumphant upon a throne, and she before me in fetters: yet I think that I could not without trembling speak unto her concerning love either for my self or for another: so Sir, in that condition which fortune hath put you, I do not think it is a service which I either can or ought to perform for you. I know very well replied the King of Pontus, that I have done you wrong to move it: But illustrious Artamenes, what will become of me? shall I die in my fetters without complaint? and can I not at least obtain of you, a permission once to see the fair Mandana? Artamenes was then much perplexed: for notwithstanding the high vertue of the Princesse, yet Jalousie did seise upon his soul: he saw that the King of Pontus was a Prince, of a good Symetry, and of much spirit: he imagined that this interview could not, but cause him much displeasure. Yet this first thought was presently corrected by a second which told him there was no fear of that: he told then the King of Pontus, that if he would obtain this favour he must send unto Ciaxares, who perhaps would not deny it. But Sir (said he to him) if you would take my advice you should not doe it: for indeed, what will the sight of her advantage you? you will see her so fair, that perhaps you will return more unhappily then before. Ah Artamenes (said the King of Pontus) you know not how to love, or to say better, you were never loved? for know assuredly, that what all vsage soever can be, how much severity soever appears in the eyes of the party loved: and how much crueltie soever she can have in her heart: what course Language soever she can give, yet the sight of her has some such kind of sweetness in it which moves delight: And I do not know, whether an ill treated Lover who sees the party which so treats him, has not some more happy minuits, then a beloved Lover who is absent from the party beloved. So generous Artamenes, if I can but obtain so much happinesse as only to see Mandana, I shall be much comforted, although she give me not one obliging word: endeavour so, I conjure you, that Ciaxares do not deny me when I send unto him concerning it. I have told you Sir already, replied Artamenes, that I know not how to meddle with any thing which relates unto the Princesse: all that I can do is to endeavour your liberty; and that, I will so ardently solicit, as you shall know by that how Artamenes would acquit himself of that duty and service which he owes you: and if he do refuse any thing els which you desire of him, it is because he has invincible reasons which prevents him; do you not consider Sir, (said he further unto him) that I am a meer stranger in Cappadocia? that I have no more power then what my sword gives me? and that this which you desire of me is a business which I neither can nor ought to serve you in? The King of Pontus, though he was most ignorant of the true reason, which moved Artamenes to deny him, yet did very well receive Page 44 his excuses; and knowing that he desired such things as were apparently impossible, excepting the sight of the Princesse which he hoped to obtain, he asked pardon of Artamenes for moving him with unreasonable desires, and as my Master told him, that he should ere long know by his endeavouring his liberty, that he would do all which was fit for him to do; this Amorous Prince desired him not to make so much hast; for (said he to him) I make it a question, whether it is better to be a prisoner in Sinope, or to be free upon the throne of Pontus, and Bithynia. After this Artamenes left the King of Pontus with much perplexity, and almost as much troubled as if Mandana had understood all that the King of Pontus had told him, and as if she had seemed to be much moved at it: As he went from thence, he went to the King, who bad him very welcom, and held him long in privat discourse: the King told him, that he did owe unto him all the glory of his Kingdom, and did attribute unto him all the favours which he received from heaven. He discoursed concerning his own marriage with the Queen of Cappadocia: of all his intanglings which he ever had with the Princes his neighbours, and what happy issues he had from them all: of his good fortune to have the Princesse his daughter, so rarely accomplished as Mandana was: then he exactly related all that the Magi had said concerning the birth of the son to the King of Persia: the menaces unto all Asia, particularly to the King of Medes: How Astiages was perplexed: how great was his joy when he was credibly informed Cyrus was drowned. But Artamenes (said he then unto him) you ought also to rejoyce at his loss, and go into the Temple to offer sacrifice of thanks unto the gods for his death as well as wee: for indeed since he had the stars on his side, if he had lived he would have disputed with you for a share in your victories, since he could not make himself master of all Asia, without being your conqueror. Artamenes blusht at this discourse, but Ciaxares believed it was out of modesty because of the praises which he had given him, therefore went on with his discourse, and repeated all the obligations in which he was bound unto him: I leave you to Judge Sir, whether my Master had not enough wherewith to entertain his thoughts withall when he returned from him. He saw the King of Pontus was extreemly in love: but although one cannot love a Rival, yet this Rivall moved him to compassion, though it was with much vexation. That which did most trouble him, was the maner wherewith Ciaxares expressed himself: and from thence he concluded, that Cyrus was not in a condition, to rise out of his Tomb, though the Princesse her self should consent unto it: so that he was extreemly perplexed at it. The next morning Ciaxares sent to seek him, and carried him to the Temple, where he saw the second time, thanks given unto the Gods for his death: But in lieu of giving thanks (like the rest) so unnecessary and ill grounded, he rendred thanks because that same sacrifice for his death, was the original of his love: Imagin Sir, if any thing could be more strangely odd, then to see true Cyrus under the fals name of Artamenes present at this ceremony. He told me afterwards, that he was often moved, to cast himself at the feet of Ciaxares in the middle of the Temple, and to make himself known who he was: but fearing the displeasure of the Princesse he forbore, and stood dumb all the time of the ceremony: it was some Joy unto him, that Man|dana sighing her self not well, would not be present and assist, she not having power to hear them speak of a dead Prince whom she knew was living. This feigned excuse of Mandana's did furnish my Master with a pretence to visit her: he went thither as soon as he returned from the Temple: and finding her upon her bed, having none with her but her women, who could not hear what he said, they keeping at a respective distance: I come Madam (said he to her in a low voice) to give you thanks, because you came not to thank the Gods for the death of Cyrus; and I come also to ask you, how long I must be ignorant, whether I must Live or whether I must Die? without all question, (replied the Princess) I would have you live, and I would have you live happily: but to tell you truth I do not see any appearance of it. Why Madam (replied Artamenes) am I worse in your favour then I was? No, (replied she) but I do not see that you are more in favour with fortune: for indeed, the sacrifice from whence you came, does hint unto you, that the Kings resentments continue as they were; so that you may very well doubt, whether, maugre all your services you can without danger discover what you are, not that I ever observed those violent motions in the mind of the King which they say the mind of Astiages was possessed with: But my fears are lest, if you should discover your self, the King of Medes should demand you of his son; and that Ciaxares should not have power to refuse you unto a Prince who gave him life: Let then unhappy Cyrus remain in his grave (then answered my Master) and let happy Artamenes live with you. The Princesse hearing him Page 45 speak so, leaned upon her right arm, and looking upon him, with a most obliging eye, though most modestly; The Gods are my witness (said she unto him) if I have not a greater esteem of your virtue then I have for any other; and if I do not retain in my heart, such an acknowledgement and tenderness of you, as cannot be but it must be accompanied with much good will: But indeed Artamenes, Reason must be predominate, and we must not consider so much those things which do please us, as those which ought to please us; and therefore although your conversation be most delighting unto me, and the manner of your loving me does give full satisfaction to my virtue, yet notwithstanding, I am forced to tell you, that if within the compass of three moneths, (and I doubt this terme is too long) you cannot contrive a course which will be apparent unto me, you may revive Cyrus out of his grave without danger unto him, then you must return into Persia, and live there happily if you can, and strive to forget Mandana, lest she should disturb your tranquillity: But Artamenes (said she unto him, without giving him leave to interrupt her) to remove all causes of complaint, know that during this three moneths time which I allot you, I will contribute unto your good fortune as much as I can, and as much as ever handsomenesse will permit me. I will assist you with my best advice; I will endeavour to discover the Kings minde; I will informe you by what expedients you may perhaps, gain Aribeus, who hath a great prevalence with him; and I will not neglect any thing which I can possibly and reasonably do for your satisfaction; if notwithstanding all this, the Law of Cappadocia be not an invincible obstacle unto your designe, and that the quality of a stranger be not incompatible with the Kings resentment: But when all is done, if both your endeavours and mine become frustrate, then you must (said she, and changed colour) resolve your self for an eternal separation; and reason must absolutely triumph over all which would resist it. What Madam (replied Artamenes) will you banish me? and banish me for ever? Forbear your complaints (said she to him) until the time come, that there be cause, and think not your self unhappy till you be so. To see (replied my Master) that you can resolve to make me so, is to be so already: for indeed Madam, if I were as much in your minde as I might be, you would have more indulgence towards my love, and you could not resolve to destroy for ever a Prince who adores you with an unequalled reverence, and who will infallibly die, as soon as he is separated from you. I desire you once more (said the Princesse to him) not to vex your self unprofitably; and do not mollifie my heart untill there be some need of it: be contented, that I am constrained to banish you, and that I do it not with much sorrow; and that I was not more displeased at the report of your death, then I shall be at your absence: But however Artamenes, Glory is to be preferred before all things, and as long as I do not strive against you, but rather to give you all satisfaction, you have not just cause to complain of me. Artamenes knew well that he neither could nor ought to hope for any more from such a one as Mandana; and though he ought to prepare his minde for it, yet he could not chuse but be very much grieved at it: She knew how to comfort him so sweetly in his sorrows, by the heavenly charms of her conversation; that he preferred the evils which he suffered as a servant unto Mandana, before all felicity he could enjoy without her. He began then to follow Ciaxares more closely then before: He courted Aribeus, contrary to his own inclination, with more diligence, and neglected nothing which might get him a good esteem in the Court, so that though he should discover himself, they would not think of destroying him: And so it was, that he was universally beloved, and so much, that the extraordinary care he took did not create him any new servants, nor augment the zeal of those he had before, so great was their zeal already. In the mean time, the man who Artamenes sent to carry the Jewels unto the daughter of that Lady who mistook him for Spitridates, and who had so charitably entertained him, returned unto Sinope, who informed Artamenes that there was like to be a new war in Bithynia: he further told him, that he found the Castle invironed with many Souldiers; and that when he had spoken unto that Lady, she was extremely surprized to see the Jewels which he had to present unto her daughter: That at the first she doubted whether she should suffer her to accept of them; but in conclusion she did permit her; That at his taking leave of her, she bestowed a very rich present upon him, and charged him to tell Artamenes, after she did with astonishment understand it was he, that the King her husband was endeavouring to put himself into such a condition, as that hereafter he might be able to retaliate his liberality; and to make Spitridates his son, who had the honour to resemble him: worthy of that resemblance: This man told Artamenes further; that in his returne, he saw all the Countrey full of Souldiers, and that some of Page 46 them had stayed him for some certain dayes, which was the reason he did return no sooner. Two hours after his arrival, there came certain news from Artaxes, that all Bithynia was in rebellion, and Pontus about to be the like; and that the King of Phrygia was compelled to retreat, because that Croesus King of Lydia was entred with an Army into his Dominions, and that a great part of his Forces did change Masters, and sided with those who moved the people to revolt, and who in truth had much right unto the Crown of Bithynia. In conclusion, they knew Arsamones, husband unto that Lady who had treated Artamenes so well when he was wounded, and who took him for Spitridates her son, was in the head of a very considerable Army; and that if the King of Pontus were not soon set at liberty, and to take some course to oppose his Conquests, not onely Bithynia, which his father had usurped, would be lost, but Pontus also which was legitimately his, would be in the same condition. It was reported that the King of Phrygia was about new Levies in his Countrey: but yet the reports went also that he would have his hands full of war against the King of Lydia: Inasmuch as it was apparent that there would fall an infallible revolution upon the Kingdoms of Pontus and Bithynia, if they were not presently remedied. Artamenes, finding a good opportunity to oblige the King of Pontus, and acquit himself of his promise to him, and also to procure his departure from Sinope, where he was not very glad to see him, did beseech the King that he would not onely give him his liberty, but also that he would lend him some Forces wherewith to reduce his Subjects unto their obedience. He represented unto the King, that it would be much more glorious for him, and advantageous also to do so, then to detain him a Prisoner: Since if it should so fall out, that he should lose his two Kingdoms, as very likely he was, then he would not be able to pay his Ransom; but would be either forced to keep him always, or else cruelly to deliver him, in a time when it was too late, and when there was no hopes to get into the Throne. Moreover, he told him that the King of Pontus was generous, and that obliging him thus gallantly, he could run no hazard of danger. In conclusion, as Artamenes was always very prevalent with Ciaxares, and could perswade him unto any thing he pleased; so, the King descended unto his desire, upon condition, notwithstanding, that the King of Pontus should deliver into his hands, two considerable places, which yet held unto his side; and that he should solemnly promise, never to make any war against Cappadocia. Artamenes having obtained his suit, went presently to the King of Pontus, who was already informed of his misfortunes, but knew no remedy: He no sooner saw my Master, but going to him, with much constancy, though with much melancholy; Generous Artamenes (said he to him) if in losing the Crown of Bithynia, you had conquered it, I should not be so sad as I am; but that my most mortall enemies should triumph over my misfortunes, I confesse that I have not patience to endure it without complaint, nor can I chuse but much desire that liberty, which I have desired you to obtain for me. Sir (answered Artamenes) as it is my use to do what I ought, so I have effected your demands, and perhaps above your desires, for I do not know, whether I have not gone further then you desired. My Master then told him what he had done with Ciaxares, and how by this Article not to make any more war upon Cappadocia, it was to be tacitely understood, not to pretend any more unto the Princesse: As this was reasonable, so he did not murmur; he grieved in secret without complaint, and thanked Artamenes very civilly for his Generosity: he extremely extolled this great Act, and thanked him who brought it to passe. If ever I come unto my Throne again, generous Artamenes (said he to him) I shall owe unto you all my glory, and all my good fortune: and I do protest unto you, that if I can conquer again the Kingdom of Bithynia, it shall be your fault onely, if you do not as absolutely command it as my self: you are no more a Cappadocian (said he to him) then you are a Pontean, so that without offence unto Ciaxares, I may well hope for the same happinesse and advantage which he hath: he hath nothing now to do, but to live in peace, and I am in a way of war, and for this reason, I believe, that my wish is not unjust, nor will displease you. Sir (answered Artamenes) I am much obliged unto you for these advantageous resentments you have of me: But Sir, if you knew me more particularly, you would quickly change your minde; and therefore since you know me no better, I will not abuse you in your error, nor receive those favours from you, which doubtlesse you would repent of afterwards: And though, it is true, I am not born a Subject unto Ciaxares, yet I am so tied unto his service by many strong reasons and obligations, that I can never be disengaged from him. After the first apprehensions of joy in the King of Pontus mind were passed over; joy I say, for the liberty which he had obtained, and for those Auxiliaries Page 47 which were offered him, Love then began to take a place in his heart; and he could not forbear some expressions and signes of his weakness, and in the presence of Artamenes, grieved at those great necessities which oppressed him: for (said he) as long as I am in prison, I do know very well, that I ought not to pretend unto the Princesse Mandana; and that if I remain in them, I shall be still in the kingdom so by consequence, far off from any pretensions to her: But (generous Artamenes) in casting off these fetters wherein you have enchained me, I must also cast off those which I received from the faire Mandana, at least weare them in secret: and alas in hiding them they are not less heavey, nor shall I be less her slave: Artamenes did know well how to answer this discourse: all he could do was handsomly to divert it, and to speak of war in lieu of love: yet since things did very vrgently require it, he gave orders for the King of Pontus departure within a few dayes: and this Prince not being able to depart, till he had spoke with the Princesse, and took his leave of her, sent to beseech Ciaxares, that he would not deny him that favour: Artamenes, who was present with the King when this permission was desired, had a good mind to oppose it, yet durst not: Yet he was much puzzled to resolve, whether he should be present at this interview or not: yet notwithstanding all the indisposition he had to it, yet he would be a witness of it: he was in much fear that he should not be able to restrain himself; yet at the last could not chuse but go: The permission of the Princesse, concerning this visit was asked; she had no great fancy unto it; yet Ciaxares having promised it, there was no remedy; but remembering his gallant deportment unto Artamenes, she resolved therefore to treat him civilly. The day of this Princes departure being come, all the Ladies, and all the court, who were appointed so to do, did then wait upon the Princesse: Artamenes was as diligent as any to be there, and doubtless as observant of all the passages in this interview as any. Since this Treatie between these two Kings was signed by both parties, the King of Phrygia if he so pleased being comprised; and all the prisoners released, also the two Kings sworn in the Temple to observe the Articles, and to live in peace with each other; the King of Pontus did not then address himself as a prisoner unto the princesse, but as a free Prince: and waited upon by the officers of Ciaxares, as he himself was: this Prince was one of an admirable presence, and then very sumptuous in Apparell: The Princesse, who perhaps would not have been so indulgent to him but in respect of Artamenes, was but very ordinarily dressed, nor did she need to be better, for she appeared that day so admirably fair, as that she quite darkned the fairest and most glorious in all the company; the King of Pontus, saluted her with much reverence, and she received him with as much civility, she would have given him the precedencie, but he would not receive it? he took that place which was next the Princesse, saying with a handsom grace, that it was not fit a prisoner of Artamenes (in looking upon my Master and smiling) to sit in the place of the Princesse Man|dana. Do not think Sir, (said she to him) that your Conqueror desires to change either Rank or Condition with you; he is too generous to desire that the King of Pontus should not enjoy all those honours which his birth hath Confer'd upon him. I wish to the Gods Madam, (replied this Prince smiling,) that every one whose fetters I weare, would treat me as well as Artamenes doth, for if they did, I should not be in that condition I am, to wit perpetually a slave, and unfortunate. I do not wonder (said the Princesse) that all they which goe to war, do not all take prisoners, since then every one must have great courage, and all be fortunate; But I do confesse I think it very strange, that all they who do take them do not use them well: For my part I assure you Sir, that by my consent, they should not wear their fetters long, but should presently enjoy their Liberty. I doubt not Madam (replied the King of Pontus) but you are full of pitty; but Madam, there are a sort of captives whose liberty does not depend upon the wills of their conquerors, and who are ever prisoners in a prison with out any gates, grates or guards. Those who are of that humour (replied the Princesse) must patiently suffer that misfortune for which there is no remedy, & complain of none but themselves. I know some Madam, (replied the King of Pontus) which have been used to what you say, & without accusing you of those evils which they endure, & do prepare themselves to suffer them as long as they live: I should be very sorry said she, that so great a Prince as you, should have any just cause to complain of me, but if my memory do not much fail me, I behaved my self all the while you were in the court of Cappadocia, with as much Civility as was due unto a son of the King of Pontus. I do acknowledg it Madam (replied this Prince) but yet I make a doubt whether you have treated me as well since I came unto the Crown, as before, I would have you think (replied the Princesse) [Page 48 that you have some cause to complain of your self, since you have declared war against us; but I have much a doe to perswade my self, that you had any reason for doing so. If I did commit a fault (replied this Prince) I have been sufficiently punished for it: I have lost severall Battels; I have lost my liberty: and I am in a way to lose both my kingdomes: yet Madam, I should think all these but small, if I could but be so happy as to gain any room in your esteem: I know very well Madam, that since I have lost these Battles and appear but as a slave before you, are such things as seem not to merit that honour: But yet consider Madam, that the glory of my conqueror, does lessen the shame for my de[feat, and though conquered and prisoner as I am, let me not offend the Princess Mandana; if I begg a little room in her esteem, since I must never pretend more unto her affection. Be not Madam lesse generous then the King your father, and the Illustrious Artamenes. The last of these did ask my liberty, and the other granted it: Refuse not then the favour which I beg of you, and do me so much honour to believe, that ever since the first minuite I saw you, I have as much esteem and all the veneration of you than can be imagined: Indeed Madam, I adored you before I was a King: I did the same when I was owner of two Kingdomes; and I continued it also in declaring war against the King of Cappadocia: I did not repent of it when I was all wounds, and swam in my own blood; and I retained the same thoughts whilst I was in those fetters, which the clemency of the King your father has freed me from; and I shall ever keep them, whether my sword do win me my Scepter again, or whether it cause me to lose my Crowns: and as long as life is in me I must love you Ma[dam with a most respectfull and violent passion: now you know that, Madam, which I had a most earnest desire once in my life to tell you: and which since told will make me die something lesse unhappy: since my love is well known throughout all Asia, though I never told it you but in the Language of my eyes; I do not fear that this speaking thus boldly unto you, and before so great a company, will offend you; and since I know that my Pro[tector (said he in looking upon Artamenes) has som credit with you, I shall hope that in con[sideration of him, and after his example you will not insult over my misfortunes, nor speak harsh things unto him concerning me, since it is the last time that perhaps I shall ever have the honour to speak unto you. Artamenes harkened unto this discourse with as much vex[ation in his mind as was imaginable: he looked upon the Princess; he looked upon his Rivall; and though he could not perfectly know the thoughts of Mandana, yet he thought them something too favourable to the King of Pontus, and was often in a mind to mingle converse with them, although the quality in which he did appear did not permit him so to doe: yet he was very glad to hear it from the mouth of his Rivall, that he had never spoke of his love unto Mandana: But he was in some disorder to hear those high Commendations which he gave her, and knew very well that his love did render their friendship impossible. In conclusion, after the King of Pontus had done speaking, the Princess, who rose at the same time he did, lifting up her eyes and blushing a little: I do not know (said she) whether it be the fashion of all young Princes to colour their Ambition with a more gallant passion, or whether it be only a simple desire of glory, but I am certain that you do give me a great subject for my vanity, and a great cause to complain of you: For Sir, I cannot deny, but that it is very advantageous for me to be esteemed by a Prince who is accomplished with so many excellent qualities: and I must also tell you, that I have some reason to accuse you, and perhaps to punish you too, for speaking unto me as you have done: But Sir, (said she to him) I will take all that you have told me as I ought to do, and will be so far from using you ill, that I do protest it shall not be long of me, if you do not depart from this court, as free in your mind as in your body, and if my prayers would conduce any thing, to set you in your throne again, (notwithstanding all that is passed) you should not want them: Madam (answered the King of Pontus) I had rather you had harkened unto my prayers, then to inploy yours in my behalf, but that is not a thing to be thought upon, further then to punish me for my rashness in daring to love the most glo[rious Princesse upon earth: After this, the Princess answered and he replied again, then he took his leave and went out: Artamenes knew not whether he should stay with the Prin[cess or follow this Prince: he feared lest the King of Pontus, should observe his vexation, and he was apprehensive lest Mandana should perceive his Jealousie and be offended at it: So that to expose himself unto neither of these hazards, he went first unto Ciaxares, and and presently after, the King of Pontus returned to bid adieu. This word adieu, put the mind of Artamenes into its accustomed tranquillity, out of his apprehensions of Joy to see his Rivall packing, so that he began to behave himself with much civility towards him: Ci[axares[Page 49 did treat him very well at parting, & gave him a hundred horse for his convoy unto the campe; & sent orders unto Artaxes, commanding the army to obey this prince, & to put a garrison into those two places, which the King of Pontus was to deliver up unto the King of Cappadocia. Artamenes, waited upon by all the Court, did conduct the King of Pontus a good way out of the Town; and although he was his Rival, and entertained some sparks of jealousy of him; yet this Prince, did testifie so much friendship unto my Master at parting, that he could not forbear being much moved with him: Yet after his departure, Artamenes was in a much happier condition, then he could have beleaved: For since the Princesse knew his Quality and his affection, and suffered him to see her often: since he had no Philidaspes to torment him; since the King of Pontus was gone, never to return again, he thought himself sometimes in the height of happinesse; and sometimes also he was not without his vexations of minde: For when all was done, he must discover himself what he was, and expose himself unto the violent humours of Astyages, and perhaps unto the anger of Ciaxares: Yet notwithstanding, since the one of them was far off, and the other seemed to love him very well, the hopes of his heart were above his fears, and he seemed never to be so well satisfied. Now since peace brought joy thorowout all Cappadocia, there was nothing to be seen in all the Court, but diversions, and entertainments; and my Master was no lesse frolick and gallant among the Ladies, then he was courageous in warre, and prudent in Councils. The King went at that time unto the pleasant Town of Ama[isia, which as you know is seated upon the river of Iris, and afterwards went unto the stately Town of Themiscira, where he stayed, as well because he had some businesse there, as because indeed the Princesse did love that place. For as the river Thormodon, which walshes the feet of the walls, is one of the most pleasant Rivers of the World, she took great delight in walking upon the Banks; and my Master had the honour oftentimes to wait up[on her, and found fit opportunities to give her a hundred testimonies of his amorous and respectfull passion. Thus did he live in much sweetnesse of minde, during all the three moneths which was allotted him; during which time he had gained him such a powerfull esteem in the heart of Ciaxares, that he was in some hopes he might discover himself without any danger. He asked counsel of his dearest Princesse, who hardly durst give it unto him, since she feared to expose him unto any danger that was so dear unto her: yet she forced him to take that resolution, by her often remembering him, how the time she gave him drew on, and that he must either try some course, or resolve to depart. There needed no more to move Artamenes to hazard all, rather then leave his Princesse; Therefore after he had took his leave of her, as if she were going to die (being uncertain how Ciaxares would receive him) he went straight to the King, with intention to tell him he was Cyrus: and also to tell him, that the love which he bore unto the Princesse, though she did not know it, had forced him to stay in this disguise within this Court. As he went un[to Ciaxares, one of his Officers told him that the King had received some news from Astyages which troubled him very much, and that he had orders to go seek the Princesse, to tell her she must come unto the King: Artamenes hearing this, beleaved that it was some people that were in rebellion, not imagining it could be any thing else: But how[ever, he thought that day not a fit time to discover himself; and that it were more fit the Princesse were advertized of this, lest being sent for by the King, she should be too much surprized, and imagine that it was because he had discovered himself, and so she might perhaps speak something which might prejudice themselves; he turned then presently, and told the Kings Officer, that he should be very glad to conduct the Princesse unto Ciaxares, since she must come, and desired him, that it might be his Commission to bring her. This man knowing what favour my Master was in, consented unto his desire, and told him him he would stay in the outer Chamber, and not shew himself unto Ciaxares untill he brought the Princesse. Artamenes went then to her Chamber, and told her his businesse, letting her understand, by the way as they went, that he must needs defer the execution of his designe untill he knew what was the cause of the Kings perplexity. When they came into his closet, they found him walking alone; yet he no sooner saw them but stopt; and addressing his speech unto the Princesse. You had reason daughter (said he with an al[tered countenance) to absent your self from the last sacrifice of thanks unto the Gods for the death of Cyrus, since all was unprofitably rendred; and if I had known then, what I know now, I should have changed the intention of the Sacrifice. The Princesse and Art[amenes both, were mightily surprized at this discourse, and thought verily that Ciaxares did not onely know how Cyrus was in his Court, but also in his Closet. Mandana repen[ted [Page 50 of those favours she had dispensed unto my Master, and prepared to justifie her self unto Ciaxares. Artamenes for his part, he was desperate to observe by the Princesse countenance, how much she was troubled, and out of his excesse of love, he took more thought for her sorrow, then for all the danger whereunto he thought himself exposed. But seeing that Mandana had not power to speak, and that the King began to walk again, as if he understood that he had told them enough. Sir (replied my Master) have those who have told you that Cyrus is living, told you that he hath any ill designs against Me[idea, or Cappadocia? There needs no more (replied Ciaxares) but the knowledge of what the Magi (who are the most knowing men of all Asia) have presaged and told us concerning Cyrus: We must therefore (said he) endeavour to finde a remedy against an evil, which is yet not gone so far but it may be prevented; and since the good or bad Fate of all Asia, depends upon the life or the death of one man, we must do all we can, to bring him into such a condition, as that we may be able to dispose of his life or of his death without any danger. Cyrus, as I understand from the King my father (added he, in stopping, and looking upon the Princesse) is not at this present in the Head of an Army of a hundred thousand men: therefore daughter (said he to her) I am not much troubled at him; and unlesse I be very much misstaken, he will not do us so much hurt as is threat[ned. At these words Artamenes verily beleaving that Ciaxares knew all the truth of the businesse, was upon the point of assuring him, that he would answer for the fidelity of Cyrus, when the Princesse interrupting him; Sir (said she to the King) let us hope that the Gods, who are the Authors of all goodnesse, will not suffer all Asia to be overthrown; but perhaps they will be so indulgent to us, that at a lesse rate then at the life of Cyrus, they will suffer us to enjoy the felicity of your Reign, in quietnesse. I will beleieve it Daughter (replied the King) for as long as Cyrus does not appear with Arms in his hands, he will conquer no Provinces nor Kingdoms: and though we should see him in the head of an Army, yet look upon him here, (said he, and embraced my Master) who we will turn loose unto him, and who I am certain will prevent his Conquest of all Asia. The Prin[cesse and Artamenes were yet surprized at what the King said, as much as they were at the beginning of his discourse, but yet they were much better pleased. Mandana who durst never lift up her eyes till now, looked upon my Master, who to confirme the King in that opinion which he had of him, Yes Sir, (said he unto Ciaxares) as long as Artamenes is Artamenes, you never need to fear Cyrus, although he were in the Head of an Army of a hundred thousand men; and I am infinitely obliged unto your Majesty, for that good opinion which you conceive of me. I cannot have too great a one (replied Ciaxares) and if the Gods had not sent you unto my Assistance, I should be much more then I am troubled at what the King my father hath sent unto me. Then he began to tell the Prin[cesse and Artamenes, how Astyages had sent him word, that Cyrus was seen in Persia, and a little after he passed into Medea, and that he went towards Bithynia and Pontus: How Astyages had again consulted with the Magi, who assured him more confidently then ever, that the subversion of all Asia would happen most infallibly, if they did not some way or other appease the Gods: Moreover, Astyages had sent him word, how he had proclaimed a Command in all places within his obedience, to arrest Cyrus if they could finde him, and to bring him unto him either alive or dead; promising great recompenses unto any that could either take him or kill him: To effect which, he had caused to be published, the easi[er to know him, that he wore black Arms, that upon his Buckler was represented a slave, who seemed to chuse chains, and refuse a Crown; breaking the last, and assuming the first, with these words; Most Heavie, but most Glorious.

Ciaxares added further, that he had already given order unto Aribeus to publish the same in Themiscira, and thorowout all Cappadocia and Galatia, and to be very diligent in a businesse of that importance: You may judge Sir, in what a condition Mandana and Artamenes were in, and what different thoughts did possesse their souls. The Princesse was so impatient while the discourse lasted, that she was once in a minde to go out, and say nothing: She had no minde to discover that Artamenes was Cyrus; and it was so much against her disposition to contribute any thing unto this innocent fallacie, wherein for the security of my Master they were like to continue, that she was not able to answer a [Page 51 word unto any thing the King said unto her: But by good fortune Aribeus coming in to speak with the King upon some important businesse; She went out, and Artamenes conlducted her unto her closet, unto which she entered without any company but Martesia: She was no sooner there, but looking upon my master with a most melancholly aspect; well Artamenes, (said she to him) Cyrus need not revive, but it is time that Artalmenes were gone. This Prince hearing her say so, desired to settle her mind as well as he could, and to make her think that there was not so much danger as she apprehended: That according to all likelihood, he which was thus taken for him in Persia, must needs be the same Spitridates, for whom he was taken in Bithynia; and therefore he need not be so much affrighted at it, because very few Persians use to come into Cappadocia, especially any such as can know him; and it does more apparently seem he should not be known, since they take another for him: Although all this should be so (said the Princesse) yet this is not enough: for Artamenes, I have thus long suffered, in hopes that you would find some expedient or other, to discover your self without danger; and that I might be assured I should not be lesse innocent in permitting the society of Cyrus, then I have been in suffering the conversation of Artamenes. But now, since I see both Cyrus and my own honour in imminent danger, I must not long be indulgent unto you: Though I had but one of these two interests upon me, yet were I obliged to do so; but having both of them at once, Artamenes must, he must be gone, Tell me rather Madam, (said Artamenes and interrupted her) that he must go and die; for indeed, I cannot live unlesse I look upon you: Yes, yes Madam (said he) you have sound out an infallible way to deliver all Asia, from that unhappy Prince, whom the Magi say must Conquer it; and you could never have pitcht upon a more certain course, to procure the tranquillity of Astyages: But Madam, I beseech you, be not you more inhumane, then he is cruel, in pronouncing thus the sentence of my death; he it is true, would have taken away my life, but it was in an age when I knew not the sweetnesse of it: Moreover I had neither served no• loved him; whereas you with your own hand do thrust me into my grave, after you had done me the honour to allow me a little room in your soul: you know well that I have served you, and have adored you, and do adore you still, and also must adore you, as long as I have any breath. Does the menaces of the Magi move me? and do you look upon me as that terrible Prince who must make all Asia desolate? But if it must be so Madam, that I must die, I do consent unto it; I shall make no doubt to execute your will: There needs neither any Irons nor poysons, to make you obeyed, incensable Princesse: the resolution to bid you adieu, is enough to put a Period unto my sad dayes: No, no, my Princesse, (said he and kneeled) this fatal word adieu, can never come out of my mouth without my life; and do not, I conjure you, pronounce that dismal sentence your self, untill you have considered upon it. Artamenes spoke all this I am telling you in such a passionate manner, and with so much violence and respect together, that the Princesse was something more qualified: do not think Artamenes (said she to him, in raising him up, and causing him to sit down) but that sorrow which I resent in banishing you, will be a comfort to you in your misfortunes; What Madam, (said he interrupting her) do you think any thing can comfort me, after the losse of Mandana? No, no, Madam, it is impossible. You lose only the sight of her, (answered she) but does not lose her esteem and friendship, unlesse you will render your self unworthy of it, by too obstinate a disobedience. But Madam (said he to her) though I should disobey you, you could not punish me any otherwise, then to let Ciaxares know that I am Cyrus: and though he did know it, they could but put me into prison, and perhaps sacrifice my life, for the tranquillity of Astyages. But Madam, be not deceived in this, for I had rather be fettered in Cappadocia, then Crowned in any other place of the world where you are not: And I chuse rather to die by the hand of Astyages then the hand of Mandana: Mandana (answered the Princesse) would do none of this you speak of; But perhaps she would withdraw her affection, if you should fail in your respects of her: Ah Madam, (replied my Master) is it a failing in respect, to desire the being near you that I might more adore you? Indeed Artamenes (said she to him, with looks full of much sorrow and Majesty) It concerns my own honour, and therefore cannot prevent my resolution: If it be so Madam (replied he) I confesse you have reason, and the life of Artamenes is too inconsiderable, in comparison of so precious a jewel: I will die then Madam, but be not so inhumane as to hasten my death: Let me expire gently, and refuse me not the consolation, to enjoy the sight of you a while: you know Madam that there remains yet fifteen dayes of the three moneths which you allotted Page 52 me; and take not the benefit of them from me, unlesse you would have me grow impatient, and perhaps disobey you. Artamenes pronounced these sad syllables so feelingly, that it was impossible Mandana could refuse his desire: but allowed him all his full time, the better to colour his departure unto Ciaxares. I do not relate all Sir, that these two illustrious persons did speak, during this discourse, not what they said afterwards during those dayes prefixed, for it would be too tedious, nor what my master said when he was in his chamber by himself. But let me tell you thus much, that never was melancholly comparable unto his; and perhaps the same in Mandana, though she conceal'd it better. Sometimes she would desire him to promise her, that he would never make any war upon either Cappadocia or Medea; and he would alwayes answer her, that the most infallible way to assure her self of that, was to keep him with her. In conclusion, she wished him to love her for her own satisfaction, and she wished him to forget her for his tranquillities sake: but however, she was still resolved he should depart. The businesse depending thus, (and whilst Artamenes was with the Princesse, Ciaxares sent to seek him. At the first, she had some fears that the truth of the businesse was discovered; and that the Kings sending for him was to no other end but to arrest him; for even that very morning Araspes arrived at Themiscira, and came from Astyages; but she understood presently after, that the King did send for him, to communicate some important businesse unto him. For Sir, be pleased to know, that Astyages sent Araspes unto Ciaxares to tell him, That it was absolutely his determinate desire, that he should marrie again; because (said he) thereupon depends the safetie of Medea. This Prince added further, that he knew very well the Cappadocians did not much care for having a King; and that they loved the Princesse Mandana so very well, as that they were desirous she should be their Queen: But yet it was not so convenient for the Medes; for it was to be doubted that if ever Cyrus should attempt any thing against them, and shew himself unto the people; the Medeans might perhaps submit unto him, and not think themselves unjust in so doing, since there was only a woman to reign over them: That he should therefore provide for a successor; and that it was very considerable, that doubtlesse they would never be so forward to steal away the Princesse Mandana, but because she is a heir apparent, to be Queen of many Kingdoms; that therefore he had better lose one Crown, then be exposed by such accidents to lose two: That the Laws of the Cappadocians and Medeans are different: That the Cappadocians will not admit of a strange Prince; and that on the contrary, the Medeans will never admit a subject unto the Queen of Cappadocia to be their King. Moreover, upon serious considerations of all his allies, and with whom he should match, he conceived that Thomiris Queen of Massagetes, was she which was most convenient for him: That she was a Princesse of an admirable beautie, of a great spirit and heart: That since she had a son of about fifteen years old, she must ere long invest him into the government of his Dominions; at that it might be supposed, that this great Queen who had been accustomed unto Rule, would be glad to find such an opportunity of seating her self in a Throne again: That her age was such, as children might well be hoped for, and such as might afford him a very happy life: That there was not amongst all the Princes his neighbours, one Princesse whom he could marry: That some of them were his enemies, and the rest had no daughters. Moreover, although Thomiris had a son which was fifteen years old, yet she her self was not above nine and twentie: That the alliance contracted with that people, would be alwayes very advantagious to him; because, although they be far off his Dominions, yet it may well be said that the Scythians are neighbours unto all the world, since having no Towns nor houses, but living alwayes in Tents, they passe from one Kingdom unto another in an instant, as they have sufficijently demonstrated, when heretofore they invaded all Asia. So that to contract alliance with them, would be a way to make himself powerful friends, and rid himself from terrible enemies. That if, notwithstanding all this, he did not like of it, then he would have him find out some other way, that the Scepter and Crowns might not descend unto a daughter.

This Sir, was the effect of what Araspes told unto Ciaxares from Astyages. Aribeus who was present at this discourse, and in whom the King did confide; having secret designs in his thoughts (as afterwards was known) was very much amazed at it. Yet seeming to be in a profound study what he should advise Ciaxares unto, being thereunto required, he did approve of all that Ciaxares mentioned; fortified it with fresh reasons, and did aggravate those which Araspes had but slightly touched, and did indeed cause the King to resolve of doing as he was before advised unto. Not but that his extraordinary tendernes over Mandana, did cause him to contend with himself concerning this design: But since two Crowns stood in competition, and that if ever he would have the Crown of Page 53 Medea he must do as he was desired, therefore he consented unto it. Then since Aribeus did for severall reasons wish Artamenes further from Court, he told Ciaxares that Artalmenes was the only man which could transact his negotiation of marriage with the Queen Massagettes, and bring it unto a happy conclusion: That he was furnished with all requisite qualities for it: That he was one of an excellent spirit, and great reputation. So that if he sent Artamenes unto Thomiris, there was almost no question, but he would bring about this match, which was so glorious for him, & important to the State: Cyaxares seeing much probability in what Aribeus did say, did approve of his counsel, and presently after sent unto my Master as I have formerly told you; and seeming more then ordinarily indullgent, said thus unto him; the Gods have not furnished you with so many different qualities, to imploy them one way: and therefore because those excellent gifts which you have received from heaven shall not be idle; After all those illustrious subjects to make your valour appear, I will give you one which will try your prudence: my Master accordjng unto his accustomed way, answered unto the civilities of Ciaxares with as much modesty as submission, seeming very impatient to know wherein he might do him any service; Ciaxares then told all the matter wherein Astyages had employed Araspes, and all that which Aribeus advised him unto, and at last, what he resolved upon: moreover he further desired him, that it might be his business to acquaint the Princess his daughter with the business, and so to endeavour with her, as she should not love her father the worse for it: for Artamenes (said he to him) I know that she esteems you very much, and would receive the matter much better from you, then from Aribeus unto whom she has no great phansie. I leave you to Judg Sir, how much my Master was surpris'd at such a proposition: he knew not whether he should contradict the Kings designe or approve of it, whether he should undertake the commission of speaking unto the Princess, or absolutely refuse it, and he was in such fear to offend either the King or Mandana, to blast either his duty or his love in so nice a conjuncture, that he knew not what answer to returne: But since Ciaxares had done him the honour to ask his advice in a business which was already resolv'd upon, he said thus unto him: That as concerning his marriage, it did not become him, to meddle, or speak, or give any councill unto a King which was so prudent as he: that as concerning his telling the Princesse, he would do it, since he had so Commanded him; but as concerning his voyage to the Queen of Massagetes, that was a business which did not sute with his Genius: If I were to goe and conquer her by force of Armes, (said he to him) I should then perhaps be proud of the employment as soon as any other; but since I must use only perswasive Arguments, dispenche with me Sir I beseech you, from such a negotiation as I am less fit for then you think I am. Ciaxares hearing this his answer, thought that it did only proceed from his usual modesty; therefore without any more adoe, he told him that he must prepare himself for it, as soon as possible. My Master not being able absolutly to resolve upon it, did not punctually answer Ciaxares, but without either refusing or accepting this office which was put upon him, he left him and went immediatly to Mandana, with orders from the King, to prepare her mind so handsomly, as that she should not complaine against him. As soon as the Princesse saw Artamenes, she easily found by him, he was come about some new and unpleasing business: well Artamenes (said she to him) is Cyrus yet discovered? No Madam (replied he) but I may on the contrary very well say that he is but too much concealed, since they will needs put him upon a commission which is most unfit for him: The Princesse being more inquisitive upon this answer, did press him to explain the Riddle; which he exactly did, and told her word for word, all the discourse of Ciaxares; he did aggravate the tenderness of the Kings disposition unto it, in regard of her: But after he had told her, concerning the designe of marriage with Thomiris, and the commands he had received to go unto the Queen of Massagetes, and transact the business, he set himself to observe the Princesse, and to discover by her eyes, what she thought of such an extraordinary accident. But, as she perceived his drift, No, no, Artame|nes, (said she to him) the loss of a Crown does not at all disturb my mind; and though the King my father should take from me, both the Crownes of Cappadocia and Gullation, as well as that of Medea, yet you should not see me murmur: I have a soul more firm and settled then you think I have, and they shall take more Scepters then one from me, before I would alter Countenance. This, Artamenes, is not that true glory which I am sensible of: I value not those transient and vanishing honours which depend only upon Capricious fortune, and have no relation unto my own peculiar vertues, so that I can assure you, I do find nothing in my fathers designe, which troubles me, or which is not most Just: and I think Page 54 my self extreemly obliged unto him, that he should speak of any such thing unto me. All that you say Madam (answered my Master) is extremely Generous, but though you do carry your self in the matter, as a most heroic Ladie ought to do, yet I have great cause to complain of my own Rigorous destinies: I can see no cause you have (said the Princesse) to complain so of your misfortune. Why Madam, (answered he) shall they imploy Artamenes in taking the Crown of Medea from you, and shall he not lament it? he I say, who had rather give you all the crowns and Scepters in the universe. I have already told you (answered she) that my chief felicity is not inseparably linked unto a Crown, therefore never fear that you displease me by obeying the King. But peradventure Artamenes (said she to him with half a smile) we are not both of one humour, perhaps I say, that Mandana having one Crown fewer than she had before, she will not seem the same in your eye, as she did before: Oh Madam (cried out my master, and interrupting her) do you know well what you say? is it possible that the Princesse Mandana can so innocently descant upon so nice a matter? or can you so easily part from a Crown? yes Madam, (said he) it seems you can; but certainly they can never do it without injustice: yet Madam, since you have pronounced those cruel words, I will obey the King and negotiate with as much care to take the Crown from you, as I ought in all reason to endeavour the conquest of it for you: yet, Madam, you have done me wrong in saying so unto me: to me, I say, who has built all my considerations upon your fairest Face and divinest Soul, and who never regarded your Crowns but only as ornaments much inferior to your virtue. Yes Divinest Princesse (added he further) although you were as far off from a throne, as you are near it, yet I should be the very same unto you: I care not at all, for knowing that you are to command Scepters, it suffices me to know that you deserve them, and leave the rest unto my valour: If I have said any thing, which expresseth an unwillingness to take the Crown of Medea from you, it is because I cannot transact against you: my own resentments would certainly rise up against me, if I should entertain such a thought; and on the contrary, all the motions and faculties of my heart with a full consent of my reason and my will, are dedicated unto your service. The Princesse, seeing that Artamenes was so apprehensive of a small injury, did repent, she did it, and to appease him, Artamenes (said she to him) if it be so (as I do believe it is) that the virtue of Mandana is it which you do love best in her, this voyage which they impose upon you ought rather to Joy then Displease you: for indeed, to speak sincerely unto you, it was rather the hopes of my being Queen of Medea, then of being Queen of Cappadocia which causeth them to deny me unto those who pretend unto me: for although that the law which they insist so much upon to Authorize their deniall, be really the custom of the country; yet since there is not at this present any Prince in all Cappadocia, fit to marry me, that law may perhaps admit of some exposition, to the contrary, and so in taking the Crown of Medea from me, they have removed from you one great Remora; and since I shall, nor can be, but only Queen of Cappadocia, it will not be so difficult for you to obtain the Kings consent unto your desires, provided he can suffer you to be Cyrus. But Madam (said my Master then) when is it your pleasure I should put it to the hazard? At your return (replied she) and I suppose the Queen of Massagettes, will not deny you her assistance, after you have brought her into the Throne of Medea: Also, (said she to him) you have the advantage to depart without my banishment: and I shall have that comfort, that in leaving me, you will not grieve for me: Oh Madam (replied he) I shall not be the happier, for absence is so great an evil unto those who know truly how to love, that what occasion soever it be which separates them from the party beloved, they are all one unhappy: And Madam how can I be certain, that the King of Assyria will not attempt any thing against you? you know he has secret intelligence in the Court which we cannot discover: you know what he has already attempted; How then Madam, would you have me to expose my self against this great danger which may and does threaten my life? It may be hoped (answered she) that the bad successe of his first designe, will repulse the second: I must take care to prevent them if he have any such designs: and I do assure you they shall be all in vaine; And since staying or departing is not in your choice nor mine, though this accident of absence had not happened you must be contented; and you know I alwayes told you, that it was my resolution you should be gone: Therefore Artamenes, obey the King, and leave the future successe unto the Gods. In conclusion Sir, Artamenes resolved to depart: Ciaxares did press it and prepared for him the greatest and most magnificent equipage, that ever was heard of before in Cappadocia: He received orders not to propound the businesse which he was to negotiate at the Page 55 first addresse unto Thomiris, for Ciaxares would not expose himself unto a deniall: But since there was some Pirates, which had seized upon many merchants ships which appertained unto Cappadocia in the Caspian Sea, and that there was a kinde of a little maritime warre, betwixt the Cappadocians and these Pirates who belonged unto the Countrey of Massagettes, this was to be the pretence of his negotiation, though really it was indeed to treat secretly of a marriage between Thomiris and Ciaxares. I will not stand to relate unto you all the farewells which the King and all the Court did give unto my Master. Arieus himself seemed to be more a friend unto him then ordinary: and Artamenes had all outward incitements to be well satisfied with him; yet for all this, Artamenes had such turbulent vexations in the secret of his heart, as did much disturb him; for ever since Philidaspes (or to say better, the king of Assyria) vanished, there was no news heard of him: They did understand that he was not yet returned unto Babylon, & that the queen Nicrocris was much perplexed at his long absence: Sometimes Artamenes could hardly perswade himself that Philidaspes was the same he said he was; and sometimes again he did not doubt it at all. But at the last, all his Equipage and Retinue, being ready, depart he must, and bid adieu unto the Princesse. I was never more strongly perswaded, then upon this occasion, that the Gods do sometimes impart unto men, such resentments of things which shall succeed unto them in the future: For my Master was so sunk with sorrows to leave Mandana, and the Princesse though very well versed in overcoming her own passions, seemed to be so troubled, that if they had certainly known they should never have seen one another again, they could not have been more sad. This farewell, as you may well think, was taken without any other witnesses then the faithful Martesia, with whom I had already contracted a great league of friendship. The complement was not long, and their discourse was rather silence then words. That sorrow which appeared in the eyes of Artamenes, was all the eloquence he used to desire the Princesse not to forget him: and that grief which he saw set in the eyes of Mandana, was almost all the favour that he received from her at parting: Shall I Madam (said he to her) beleve my own eyes? will you permit me to think that I have some share in that melancholy which I see in yours? Yes Artamenes (answered she) I do permit it; and I should be sorry if you do not think that there is more in my heart then you can see in my face. There needed no more then this to revive my Master, if he had been dead: and I think also Sir, that there needed no more then his apprehension of sorrow and joy, to make him die. These two opposite resentments caused so much disorder in his soul, that he was dumb, and almost lost his reason. He left the Princesse, and spoke not a word unto her, but looking as long as he could after her, he went out and took horse, not knowing who was with him, nor what way he took, nor indeed what he did himself think upon: Thus did the first dayes journey passe on; the second was not lesse melancholy, and all the rest were like them; and from the Town of Themiscira, until he came to the banks of Araxes (that famous River which borders the Kingdom of Massagettes) I verily beleve my Master knew not which way he took. He knew not, I say, whether we went thorow the Province of Aspires, or thorow Colchides, or went over the high Mountains: In short, I verily think, he knew not whether he was upon Sea or Land, or whether he went over drie Forrests, or marish Rivers: he was so entirely taken up with his passion and melancholy, all the whole voyage, which was very long, that he observed not at all any of these pleasant objects. Being at length come to the side of the River Araxes, we passed over a bridge of Boats, which were placed there for the conveniency of Passengers; and we began (if I may so terme it) to enter into a new world: For Sir, we saw no more Towns, nor Villages, nor Houses, nor Temples: And all that vast Countrey, from the banks of Araxes unto that part which adjoyns unto the Issedonians, is nothing but a great huge Plain, entermixed with little Hills, which are extremely delightful. This so new an object did a little expel the melancholy of Artamenes, and moved him to observe with much delight, that all these plains, and all these hills, were adorned with a hundred thousand several sents, differing in their forms, in their bignes, and in their colour: Two or three hundred of them might be seen in one place; thirty or forty in another; and some standing by themselves, separated from all the rest: there also might be seen abundance of selded up Pavilions, which the people used principally in their wars. There were also Chariots loaded with magnificent Canopies, under which they might shield themselves from violent Rains, and Windes, and also be an Umbrage unto them, from the over-heat of the Sun: An infinite number of Troops might be seen passing thorow these plains, and added much delight unto so wonderfull a spectacle. Artamenes then Page 56 after he had much admired their variety of customes, passed on towards the Tent Royal, for so in that Countrey do they use to call the place where the Court resides. These Tents do often change and remove from place to place, according to the seasons of the year; although they do most commonly pitch them near the banks of Araxes, by reason of the commodities which that great and pleasant River does bring unto them. When we came thither, we had two whole dayes journey through the Countrey of the Massagetes, before we could come unto the place where the Queen was. But Sir, to tell you truth, this voyage did afford us abundance of diversions; and the sight of so many uncouth things would not suffer us to be weary: Moreover, the people though mixed with many which were not native Scythians, were not mean and poor in their habit; but on the contrary, they are all very rich, stately, and magnificent: for their Countrey does abound in Gold and Copper, and they make great use of those two mettals; but very seldom or never any Iron or Silver, because indeed they have them not: So that their Lances, Spears, their Quivers, their Bowes, their Arrows, their suites of Arms, their Belts, their Swords, their Bridles, their Bits, and all furniture belonging to Horses; and a thousand other things which would be too tedious to relate, are all of pure gold, or at the least gilt with gold: So that every thing did make a very magnificent shew. We understood in our passage that the Queens Son, called Spargapises, was not then with her, but that he was gone with Ariantus, brother unto Thomiris, towards those Provinces which lie towards the Mountain Imaus, which as you know does divide the two Scythians. Yet notwithstanding this absence, we found the Court extremely full: for since Spargapises was but fifteen years old, and Ariantus was not popular in that Countrey, all did adhere unto the Queen, who for a long time had the government of all, and who truly was a woman of very great qualities, though she had some, which it were to be wished she had not: we also understood that there were two stranger Princes within that Court: One of them was Prince of the Tauroscites, called Indathirses, and Nephew unto a famous Scythian whose name was Anacharsis, who was then in travel: The other was called Aripithes, Prince of the Sauromates; So that, as we understood, these two Princes did render the Court more illustrious then ordinary. At last Sir, we discovered the Tents Royal a far off, or to phrase it more rightly, The goodliest Town in the world; being most certain that never eye beheld one more magnificent: It was in extent above five and twenty furlongs square, full of large streets, of orderly erected Tents in an even proportion: The mixture of colours was judiciously observed: Purple, gilt, white and blew, were mingled in such a confusion, out of which one might find a rare regularity: Every Tent had upon the top, great bosses of Gold or Copper, with waving flags in them: In divers places of the Town (if I may term it so) one might see some Pavilions, much higher then the rest, which looked like our magnificent Temples and Pallaces in our Towns: In the midst of all was the Pavilion of Thomiris; very remarkable for its beauty, prodigious for its largnesse, and admirable for the Royal Ensigns which spired upon the top of this stately Tent: When we were come within fifteen or sixteen furlongs of it, there appeared a great body of Cavalry, in the head of which was one of the most considerable men of all the Massagetes, who came from the Queen to receive my Master: for as soon as we were passed over the River Araxes, she was advertised, that an Ambassador from Ciaxares, called Artameines was entred in her Dominions: So that at the name of Ciaxares, and Artamenes, she sent one of the best quality, waited upon by many others to receive him: The first complements being performed, we continued on our way, and when we came near it, we perceived this great square of Tents, was inclosed with painted and gilded Railes, and guarded by Souldiers of a very handsome garb: We perceived also, that there was a little River, which did divide it self into two arms; the one where of passed all along the outside of this movable Town, and the other ran through the midst, joyning again a little below this Town as before: We perceived that the Queens Pavilion, was in the midst of a great quadrangle, unto which four great streets did open, with guards on every side this Angle. In conclusion, they conducted my master into a very stately Tent, which was appointed for the Embassadors of all strange Kings. Since the Train an Equipage of Artamenes was very great and magnificent, the people had no lesse curiosity to guard us, then we had to behold them. For the Medean habit is much more glorious then any other part of Asia: And Ciaxares was pleased that our garments should be after the Medean fashion, all imbroidered with Gold, and Artamenes with Pearl: We arived about noon time, and rested our selves all the rest of the day; It was the next morning before Thomiris admitted Page 57 Audience unto my Master. I had forgot to tell you, that, in sending to meet Artamenes, Thomiris sent an Interpreter, who was well versed in all the Asiaticque Languages: But my Master had no need of him, for she understood the Assyrian Language, which of all others is the most universal, and which Artamenes also understood very well, because it much resembled that of Cappadocia: So that my Master being advertised that she understood this Language, he prepared himself to addresse himself to her in it; although he presented his first complement in the Cappadocian tongue, because he would observe ceremonies, and render the due respect unto the King who sent him. The hour of Audience being come, many of the Queens officers came to wait upon my Master, and conduct him unto her, where both the Princes which I named unto you, and all that had any grandure or beauty either in men or women, did rendezvouze to see this Embassador, of whom such brave reports was divulged; though in that place they could not judge of his hand[s]omnesse. They carried us through three severall chambers very richly hanged, before we came unto the place where she was: But when we entered into that, I do confesse I was a little amazed; and I had much ado to perswade my self, but that I was rather at Babylon, at Ecbatan, at Themiscira, at Amasia, or at Sinope, then in a Camp of the Massagetes; such magnificence and grandure did I behold. All the Chamber was hanged with Tyrian Purple, richly imbroidered with massie gold, in which was represented divers stories of their preceding Kings: There we beheld at the top of the Chamber, a hundred Lamps of gold, beset with precious stones: The Queen was upon a Throne which was raised three steps higher, hung with cloth of gold, and a Canopie of the same, both of them adorned with massie gold plate: There was at the foot of the Throne, a little Rail and balister of gold, which did distinguish & separate the Queen from all the rest which waited upon her: All the Ladies richly dressed, did sit on both sides this Throne upon Cushions of purple, Laced with gold, and all the men stood behind them: Thomiris did wear that day a Robe and Mantle after the Egyptian mode, which seemed to be negligently cast about her, yet was very Majestical, both of them were of gold Tissue, sewed with silkes of divers colours: For the mourning of widows amongst the Massagetes never last above the first year: her dresse upon her head was high behind, from whence hung down a Cypress which reached down as low as the earth, and then turned up again to her shoulders, and there was fastened: waving loosly with a great plume of feathers on her head. Her hair was flaxen, and half negligently loose: her neck was smooth and white, half covered with a transparent Tiffany, which was very ornamental unto the rest of her habit: I forgot to tell you, that her gown was tacked up on the right side with a clasp of pretious stones, which caused to be seen that it was lined with Tigers fur, much spotted and admirably handsome; her Buskins were of cloth of gold, lined with the same fur, and tacked up by the head of a Lion, whose eyes were Rubies: Indeed it may well be said that the dresse of Thomiris was an ornament unto her beauty, as her beauty was an ornament unto her dresse: This Princesse who indeed was nine and twenty years old, seemed not to exceed twenty: she was of a good stature, and a little above the ordinary size; her garb was high, but proud withall, her eyes fair but full of fire: her colour so pure, so lively, and so fresh, as if she were in the spring of youth: In a word, she had a handsome mouth, white teeth fair hands good arms and a handsome plumpnesse. I saw Thomiris then to be a fair Princesse; and my Master as prepossessed as he was, did afterwards confesse, that except Mandana (who without all question was infinitely more accomplished) he had never seen a more sprightly beauty then her. This Queen did rise as soon as she saw my Master, and descended unto the first step of her Throne: That Rail of gold which they opened in the midst, caused my Master to advance to the foot of the Throne, and setting his foot upon the first step, and kissing her robe, he presented unto her a box, all covered with Diamonds, in which the Letter from Ciaxares was inclosed: Telling her in few words, and those in the Cappadocian Language, the cause of his Embassie: She answered him in the same tongue, but very little; and taking the box, she gave it unto the Interpreter: After this, she sat down in her Throne, and my master did sit in that place which was appointed for him on the right hand of the Throne, without the rail: You know Sir, that these kind of dispatches, are only Letters of Credence, and serve only to authorize him who brings them: And that at the first Audience they never use to speak concerning the depth of their business. After then the Letters of Credence were read, and interpreted unto the Queen, and that every one began to speak in the Language of his own Country; Artamenes much Page 58 wondered to hear Thomiris say unto him in the Assyrian Tongue, I am not a little obliged unto the King of Cappadocia, for making me acquainted with a man, whose reputation has begot in me so great a curiosity: do not think (said she to him) but fame can fly over Araxes, and tell us of your Acts done in all places where you came: you must know that she travels over the seas, and belevee it she is welcome when she reports your honour, yes renowned Artamenes, (added she) we knew you before we saw you: your name came before you, and our esteem of you preceded your Arivall. I fear Madam (answered my Master unto her in the same language which she spoke) least I my self should destroy that glorious esteem, and do but an ill office unto that Renown and Fame which flatters me, since perhaps you will believe it no more, and hereafter take all those truths which she shall tell you, for Lies: But Madam, although she has done me this Favour, yet sometimes she renders justice, therefore I most humbly beseech your majestie, to believe her when she tels you, that the Prince whom I serve, is one of the greatest Kings in the world. I know very well replied Thomiris, that Ciaxares is indeed a great Prince, and that he is owner of excellent qualities; moreover I know that the Princesse his Daughter, is as admirable in beauty as Artamenes is in valour: And I know also (added she) that your hand has made the greatest part of all Asia to tremble; and that you have won as many Battles as you have lived years: my Master was so much amazed and confounded to hear Thomiris speak after that manner, as he could not chuse but expresse his astonishment; Madam, (said he to her) you do extreemly amaze me, for I do not remember that I ever saw any of this country of Massagetes, neither in the Cappadocian Court, and in the Army of Ciaxares: I cannot Imagine which way you should come so well acquainted with any of our passages; yet notwithstanding, it appears that your Majesty is not very well informed, since all that glory which is attributed unto me, does all of it belong unto the King my Master: whose Armes, it is true, has been prosperous in my hands, but they have been so in all others as well as mine: I will not stand to relate all this discourse, which was much longer then was accustomed at any first audience. The Queen did assure my master in his taking leave of her, that he should have all the satisfaction concerning his voyage which could be holped for: and that she would please Ciaxares in all things which reason would admit her: Artamenes retired then, much satisfied with Thomiris, and much astonished to find so neer the Scythians such magnificent people, so civilized and full of spirit. We afterwards came to know, that it was the custom of Thomiris to send out severall men unto all the Courts of stranger Princes, who unknown, did from time to time give her an account, of all the passages throughout all Asia; and moreover, it was the policy of both the Scythians and of the Massagetes who in that did imitate them, to make invasions when they were least thought upon, and to that end, they endeavoured to know exactly all passages in every nation, that thereby they might prevent themselves from being surprised, and surprise others. In the mean time, the two strange Princes who were in this Court, the one, as I have already told you, was called Indathirses, and the other Aripithes, and who were both of them in love with Thomiris, seeing with what extraordinary civility, she received my Master, came to see him the next morning: He returned them a visit, a few dayes after, and found those two Scythians to be very compleat men, principally Indathirses Prince of Taurosclithes, and nephew unto Famous Anacharsis. Aripithes also had spirit enough, but he was a little too suspitious, and violent; whereas Indathirses had a perfect resemblance of the Asiatique sweetness, and not at all Salvage or rude: both of these Princes spoke the Assyrian language as well as Thomiris, so that they could hold discourse with my Master, who did so ravish and charm them, that they looked upon him as a God, so much did they admire his carriage, his manner of speaking, his sweetness, his handsomness, and his complexion. The Queen for her part, was very well satisfied, and used such advantagious terms, that there was no doubt, but that my Master had by his Presence, much confirmed her in that good opinion which she formerly had of him; for we knew, that she had given out these words, in speaking of his handsomnes and good deportment, doubtless (said she) that people who do adore none but the Sun are less reasonable then we, who are advised to represent our Gods in Figures, or do adore men; and questionless they who first gave that advice had seen some which resembled Artamenes: for certainly there is something in him so great, and so divine which begets admiration and respect. In short Sir, during the first dayes we had been in this Court, it may be very well said, that every one was very well pleased: Thomiris was ravished to see Artamenes in her Court: the two Princes were extreemly glad of friendship with such an Illustrious man: all the Court in Page 59 generall, perceiving that the presence of Artamenes did so much add unto their diversions, rejoiced: The people who naturally love valiant men, look upon Artamenes with delight: and my Master himself, seeing the manner of his treatment, hoped for a good success in his designe, and had no other vexation of mind, but that of absence and his passion, which to speak truth was very great; yet he was a little comforted with hopes of a ready and happy return; yet not to lose time, whilst he seemed to negotiate with the Queens Councell, concerning those affairs which were the Colours of his voyage, to wit, the pirates upon the Caspian Sea, the good information which had the most predominare stroke in the minde of Thomiris, to the end he might discover her thoughts, and smell whether she would harken unto a marriage with Ciaxares: he learned out, that one called Teres had most credit with her, and therupon endeavoured to engage him as much as he could. But since there must be a time for that, therefore he was forced unto patience against his will; mean while, he saw the Queen every day, and almost every hour: She discoursed with him concerning all different wayes of making war: she enquired at what manner he governed his people: she would know, how he lived in his Court during times of peace, and she discovered so much spirit, so much wisdom, and so much delight in the company of Artamenes, that she could not commend him enough: she did all she could possible, to keep him with her; for she let him see all the magnifices of the Massagetes, and all their pleasures: she carried him to hunt; she causes horse races to be made, wherein he shewed his skill: she shewed him dances after the Scythian manner, where those who danced were habited like native Scythians, with rich Furs of divers sorts; the Musique though a little Salvage, yet was very delighting: she shewed him combats and victories without blood; In short she neglected nothing that might divert him: He also saw one of their sacrifices: He also had the satisfaction to see that Mitra, the god of the Persians, though under another name, was also the god of the Scythians and Massagetes, and indeed more particularly then wee, for they never offer sacrifices unto any but the Sun, which we do call so, and offer unto him none but horses, thinking (say they) that it is but just, to sacrifice unto the greatest and most swift of all the Gods, the most noble and the most swift of all Animals. Thomiris treating my Master thus, he was courted by all the Court, and in all likelihood, he would presently be in a condition, to obtain what he could desire. He observed that Thomiris, did resent all imaginable Complacency in his company, both Chirantes and I, saw that she did infinitely esteem him, but we could not foresee that it, which in all appearance should have advanced the designs of Artamenes, did retard them, my Master, speaking with Teres concerning affairs which related unto the pirates on the Caspian Sea: Teres by order from the Queen told him that he should receive satisfaction, but yet he must allow her a little patience, because Thomiris desired that her son Spargapises should return, before she gave him an answer. In conclusion, after that Artamenes had prepared Teres by good considerable gifts, and thereby hoped he would be serviceable unto him; and told him that he would gladly know whether a proposition of marriage with Ciaxares would be acceptable to her or no: my Master layed open unto this Prime minister of state, the grandure of that Prince which was to be King of the Medes: the advantage and glory which would redound unto all Massagetes thereby; and forgot nothing that might induce this agent to approve of the motion; so that he being thoroughly perswaded him self, might more effectually move Thomiris to harken unto it. Teres did hear Artamenes very willingly, and seemed to approve of the proposition, and promised him to present it unto the Queen, with all diligence and affection possible. Mean while Thomiris, who yet knew nothing of the designe, behaved her self as she used to do, with abundance of civility unto my master: which began, not to be very pleasant unto Indathirses and Aripithes. for my part, I do confess, that I began to think Thomiris did bear so much esteem unto Artamenes, as would quickly convert it self into Affection: I perceived she did commend him very often; that she changed colour when he came neer her, and that her eyes alwayes followed him when he went from her: yet I did not tell my Master what I thought, for I believed him so possessed with his own passion, as that he would not regard it: yet Sir, this light suspicion was not without a good ground, for we knew presently after that this great Queen, who never had loved any before: who was married extreemly young: who had continued a widow fifteen years: who had refused all the Grandees of both Scythians: and who guarded her heart against the love of Indathirses and Aripithes, who were both in love with her, and served her above a year, yet could she not chuse but be surprised at the merit of Artamenes: But Sir, It is worthy of admiration to consider by what wayes the Gods will contrive things, when it is their pleasure. Page 60 to bring them to passe. Although Thomiris did know of many of the famous Actions which my Master had performed, yet she knew not all the particulars; therefore being velry desirous to know them all, she was pleased to cast her eyes upon me: so that my Maister sending me one day unto her, to tell of something, she did command me to relate all I knew concerning the glorious life of Artamenes: For my part, I did then think, that I should rather have done my Master some service by it, then augment the esteem which she had of him, (for I had then no suspicion of what I told you) therefore I related very exactly, all his combats: all his victories, and all those passages which his generosity had prompted him unto. How he saved the life of Ciaxares by exposing his own: The Combat of the two hundred: The duel between him and Aritalnus: The siege of Ceracea: The Battle which he won: The remarkable Arms which he had on that day, when forty Cavaliers conspired against his life: The common Arms which he took afterwards to conceal himself thereby, from those who had orders to spare him: His Combat with Philidaspes; and in general all his Gallantry during the war; but concerning his love, you may well imagine that I spoke not a word. She asked me, what his Quality was; and I told her that it was very noble, but that I had especial order to discover no more. To tell you the truth Sir, I think that the reputation of Artamenes, his deportment, his garb, his handsomnesse, and his spirit, had kindled love in the heart of Thomiris, and my discourse did serve for bellows to the fire, and augmented it: It became so predominate that she could not quench nor overcome it. I make no question Sir, but you desire to know how I came to dive so into the secret thoughts of the Queen; therefore, before that I do relate unto you such things as will surprize you. I must recall into your memory, how under the Reigne of the first Ciaxares, father of Astyages, who now lives, the Scythians did invade all Medea, and after they had possessed it eight and twenty years they were expelled: Then Sir, in their return unto their own Countrey, they carried with them a great number of prisoners, of all sexes, ages, and conditions. There was a man of quality amongst the Massagetes, which followed the Scythians, and who was in love with one who was Aunt unto Aglatidas whom you know; and who indeed is a man of much merit: This man, in his return, carried her away with him, and when he came into his own Countrey married her. I tell you this Sir, because this person was yet living when we came into this Court; and yet retained so great a love unto any thing that related unto Medea, that there was no good office which she was not ready to render unto us: and Chrisantes had contracted such a confidence with Gelonida, (for that was her name since she came amongst the Massagetes) that she did faithfully advertise him of all things which came within the compasse of her knowledge: She being much promoted, and knowing a thousand things which they were ignorant of in that Countrey. she rated at a very high esteem, especially having married a man of very good Quality, and one of great esteem among the people: so that by reason of these good Qualities, she was chosen to be one that was allwayes with the Queen from her infancy, and continued so still, when we came to the Court of Thomiris. Gelonida was doubtlesse a woman of a good spirit, and much vertue, and therefore she was constrained to tell some things unto Chrisantes (which you shall know) to the end he should endeavour to free her from one mischief, which without his assistance she could not prevent. By her we came to know Sir, that Thomiris no sooner saw Artamenes, but she began to esteem him, and had so great an inclination to love him, that it may almost be said, she loved him at the same instant in which she began to esteem him. This Princesse had a great soul, but naturally very passionate; she looked upon nothing with the golden mediocrity; her weakest desires were like determined resolutions; and as she was perswaded that all her desires were just, so she submitted her reason unto her will, and endeavoured every way to satisfie it: so that there needs no wonder at those violences wherewith she transacted, to compasse her desires: yet notwithstanding, when she first perceived, that her heart began to engage it self, she began also to bid resistance, but it was after such a manner, as rather augmented the malady then cured it: and as the agitation of the Air, does kindle fire, and makes the flames more violent; so Thomiris, desiring to quench those sparks which she perceived in her soul, did inflame them more, and caused that small spark, which at first had neither light nor heat in it, to flame, by that agitation which she gave unto it. She endeavoured to know what it was which tormented her, and plainly found it to be love. How comes it to passe (said she to Gelonida, when she could not hide her grief any longer) that the sight of this stranger, does procure unto me both joy, and vexation? To me, I say, who have passed away thus much of my life, Page 61 without the knowledge either of love or hatred? nor ever loved any thing but Liberty and Glory: Why am I troubled, said she, both when I see him, and when I see him not? If he have a pleasant and delightful soul, why do I not endure his company, without pen[s]iveness? If he have not, why does his absence trouble me? Do I not know very well, that Artamenes is to be but a while here, and that the same fortune which brought him hither, will presently take him away again? But suppose it should not (added she) what have I to do with Artamenes? Do I not understand by one of his men, that he will not permit the place of his birth, and his Quality to be known? Moreover, do I not know, that though these arguments are very strong, yet there is one most invincible one, against which there is no remedy? For said she, admit love to be a permitted passion; suppose Artamenes were a Prince, and a Prince of some of the Scythians, ought Thomiris to love him, since he loves not her? Oh no, no, Let us not subvert the universal custome of the World. The Gods gave not beauty unto women to begin love, and court men: But on the contrary, It is their pleasure, that this Ray of Divinity which in an instant doth what it pleases, and as well as the Sun doth shine and heat immediately, should beget women Adorers whether they will or no. They did not give this rare privilege unto our sex that we should renounce it; and besides, who knows whether or no the heart of Artamenes be not already engaged? and who can tell whether he have not an aversion unto the Massagetes, who have so often matched with the Scythians? I see, said she, that he is very civil, and complacential: But for all that he is a stranger, he loves us not, and therefore we ought not to love him. Gelonida hearing her say so, would have confirmed her in her resolution: But Thomiris fearing to be cured of that disease which brought her almost as much joy as sorrow, prevented her; No, no, Mother (said she to her, for so she often called her in private) speak not yet, and do not move me to denie you; for though I say, I ought not to love Artamenes, yet I do not say that I do not love him: There must be some excusable faults, and innocent errors. Love passeth amongst us for a dangerous passion I confesse, but not for a criminal one: So, when I say that I ought not to love Artamenes; it is for my own quiet that I say it, and not for my glory: For I do not doubt, but if I should move Artamenes to love me, and marry me, the Massagetes would not commend me for it; Native Scythians who hate all strangers, would perhaps blame me; But the people over whom my Son is to reigne, and the Issedonians whose Kingdom is mine, they would esteem me the more for it: Valour amongst us is valued at a higher rate then a Crown; And if I should make choise of the most valiant man in the World, I should merit more honour, then if I had married the greatest Prince upon earth: Sparlagapis would be beholding unto me for it; and if this Hero should guide him in his first war, I should not doubt of good successe. So that Gelonida, when I love Artamenes, I am neither unjust nor criminal: and since my people hath oftentimes solicited me to chuse for a husband, either the Prince of the Tauroscithes, or the Prince of Sauromates: I may easily imagine, they will have lesse aversion unto Artamenes, since they do look upon him with so much esteem: But Gelonida, the main matter is, that Artamenes does not love me, nor knows that I love him; But perhaps his affection is settled somewhere else. As for the first of these (said she) he does no injury unto that mean beauty, with which they flatter me up; for though it should be so, that it does not wound him, as doubtlesse he does not think that I ought to accept of his affection, he would easily resist such weak thoughts, and vanquish them. But alas, if the ignorance wherein he is, of that which my heart apprehends of him, does hinder me from making any progresse in his affection, he would perhaps passe from a light disposition to love me, into a strong inclination to hate and despise me, if I should make it known unto him: I would perhaps then think, that a wide passion would be mistresse of his reason, and Thomiris who does prefer his courage, his minde, and his vertues before the charmes of his person, would be suspected of a dishonourable weakness: Alas (said she) into what a condition am I reduced? If Artamenes do not know that I can love him, or to speak truth, that I do love him; he can never love me; and if he should know it, he will never esteem me: If it be so that his heart be already engaged, what would I have him do? or what can I desire of him? No, no, (said she upon a sudden) I must cure this disease which thus torments, how bitter soever the remedy be; I must dismisse this dangerous Embassadour, whom I desire might never depart from hence; I must, I ought, and I will do so; but yet I know not whether can or not. In conclusion Sir, after a most violent agitation, and a strong contest with her self, she retired without any power what to resolve upon: And here admire, I beseech you, Page 62 the fantastical humour of love, and fortune when they joyn together to persecute any one. My Master unto whom the remembrance of Mandana, gave restlesse thoughts, and unto whom, the impatient desires to return would not allow a minutes rest, did presse on Teres to speak unto the Queen, and to induce the Queen to give him a more favourable Answer; He visited her often then ordinary, and spoke unto her a long time together: Yet he could not so absolutely contain himself, but that his melancholy would be predominant, and he oftentimes sighed in speaking to Thomiris, seeming as if something did disturb his minde: he did sometimes in thinking upon Mandanas, examine the beauty of Thomiris, and very seriously fix his looks upon her face and eyes. This Princesse is fair indeed (would he say sometimes to himself when he looked upon her) but my Princesse is infinitely above her. I do not discover in this, that charming modesty and incomparable sweetness, which is the soul of beauty: Indeed Thomiris (said he sighing) is not Mandana, and I look upon her beauty with indifferency, but upon the other with adoration. Mean while Sir, the Queen of Massagetes, who understood not this mute language, nor could rightly interpret the looks and sighes of Artamenes, did think, that perhaps he might love her, and durst not tell it; and this conceit did puff her up into abundance of joy, and yet it was not a joy that was full of tranquillity: for (said she) peradventure the cause of these sighes is from Themiscira, though he be here amongst the Massagetes, yet (added she) it may be, that I am the cause of his sorrow, as well as he is of mine, for indeed though I will not beleve my Glasse, lest it should flatter me, yet the passions of Indathirses and Aripithes do perswade me to think, that it is not absolutely impossible to find some beauty in Thomiris: Let us hope then (said she) and endeavour to undeceive our selves in the interpretation of a thing which so much concerns us. As she was in these thoughts, Teres according to his promise unto my Master, came to propound unto her a marriage with Ciaxares; and since he did not at the first tell her directly the businesse, but oftentimes named Artamenes, this Princesse did not very well understand what he did mean, though she knew very well what she desired he should say: But at the last he told her, that the businesse of Pirates which was so much spoken of, was onely the pretence of Artamenes his Embassie, but that his right businesse was to move her unto a marriage with Ciaxares King of Cappadocia, and Galatia, and who hereafter was to be King of the Medes also. Thomiris was much surprized at this discourse, yet notwithstanding, since she had no minde to discover the disquiets of her minde unto Teres, although he was in great favour with her; she onely told him, that she was much engaged unto Ciaxares, but that this was a businesse which could not be hastily resolved upon: therefore, that she might have the more time to consider of her best course, she bad him tell Artamenes, that he had not yet moved the matter unto her; and desired Teres to prolong the businesse as much as he could. Teres promised the Queen, that he would do as she commanded: But the liberality of Artamenes had so wrought upon the spirits of Teres, that he told unto my Master the Queens true Answer, giving him much hopes of his Negotiation; because (said he) if she had disapproved of it, she would have refused it at the first. This hope gave much satisfaction unto Artamenes, so that he was more frequent in his visits, and observed some alteration in her minde: For Sir, this proposition of marriage did move in her such cruel vexations of soul, as she almost lost her reason. Let us doubt no longer (said she unto Gelonida) of Artamenes his indifferency towards us after such a proposition as this: We are so certain of it, that if he had told us from his own mouth, he loved us not, we could not have been more sure. But it may be also (said she) that he obeys his Master against his will; and this melancholy which I discover in him, may proceed from hence, that he is constrained to speak for another, when he would speak for himself. This Princesse continued not long in one thought, but contradicted her self a hundred times in one day, yet which way soever she turned it, she ever loved Artamenes: She fancied, that if she could marry him, she would make the name of Massagetes sound thoroughout the World; so that Ambition joyning it self with love, would never suffer her to be at rest. Mean while my Master, who was ignorant of her true thoughts, lived at his usual rate of melancholy. But that there might want nothing to compleat the sum of his misfortunes, it happened that Indathirses and Aripithes, who were both of them men of high souls, and both in love, were very prying into the Assiduity of Artamenes with Thomiris. They observed also, that the Queen was much perplexed more then usual; and that alwayes when Artamenes came to her, there did appear more joy in her countenance, then she used to expresse unto any else. In conclusion Sir, these Page 63 two Princes, who when we came first to this Court, were jealous one of another, although the Queen did treat them both alike with equall indifferency, did now cease their suspicious thoughts one of another, and converted their jealousies, their animosities, and suspicions which were between them into hatred of my Master; they contracted between themselves a kind of confidence and friendship: and my master caused that which perhaps never was seen before, two rivals hold good correspondency together. They could not see any important cause why Artamenes should stay long there: and the insensibility of the Queen towards them, caused them to think, that the inclination which she seemed to have unto Artamenes, did not arise without his contributing something towards it. At last they believed that Artamenes loved Thomiris, and Thomiris did not hate him: They discoursed together, as of a thing which did equally concern them both, and seemed to be firm friends. Shall we endure this affront (said Aripithes) from this stranger? Must we suffer him in the face of all the Massagetes to obtain that in a few dayes, which we with all our cares and services cannot obtain in a whole year? I know very well said Indathirses, that he is infinitely handsome, and extreemly amiable; but that which perhaps may excuse Thomiris, will not justifie him, who ought not to exceed the quality of an Ambassador. All this while Sir, they were agreed concerning my Masters crime, but they could not concur in the way of punishment; for they being too gallant to think upon any base way of revenge: And to fight with an Ambassador, was the way to cause Thomiris to banish them both, who doubtlesse would not suffer the Law of Nations to be violated upon the person of Artamenes; and also by that course they should expose themselves unto a Forraign war; So that they had much ado to resolve upon it: neither could they agree which of them two should take this enterprise in hand, which was no lesse difficult then glorious. Indathirses said it belonged unto him; Aripithes said he had as much right unto it as Indathirses; and it may very well be said, that they knew not how nor when, nor why they should revenge themselves upon a Rival whom they could not destroy without destroying all their hopes of Thomiris. This was therefore their principal reason why they deferred their revenge, and moved them to observe more narrowly the actions of Artamenes and Thomiris. They consented to render an account one to another of all they could learn out, and to transact jointly, how to rid themselves of such a dangerous enemy. Certainly it were very good sport to see Thomiris, Artamenes, Indathirses, and Aripithes all together: For Thomiris thought of nothing but how to make Artamenes love her. Artamenes thought neither of Thomiris, Indathirses, nor Aripithes, but disposed of all his thoughts upon Mandana. Indathirses and Aripithes forgot their jealousies one of another, and thought upon nothing but Artamenes and Thomiris. Mean while my Master, who thought every minute an age, did presse Teres for the Queens answer: And the Queen seeing herself importun'd, assured Teres that Artamenes should be satisfied within these three dayes: To represent unto you Sir, the turbulent agitations in the mind of Thomiris, during this time, would be a piece of difficulty. It will be sufficient that I tell you, that this Princesse being very glorious, had much ado to permit her proud and lofty soul, absolutely to command Gelonida, to ask Chrisantes whom she observed often with her, whether Artamenes would be content to accept of that which he demanded for Cixares. Gelonida then did endeavour to qualifie the mind of Thomiris; and moved her to prefer the King before the Ambassador: but Thomiris answered her, that she preferred the virtue of Artamenes before all the Crowns upon earth: yet Gelonida (said she to her) I would have you carry the business so, that Artamenes should know I love him, and not esteem me the lesse for it: and order the matter so as my passion for Artamenes may be satisfied, with directly stifling my passion which I have unto honour. Though Gelonida was much displeased with this commission, yet she assured the Queen, since nothing could change her mind, to obey her with all fidelity; and she did promise it the more seriously, because she feared that Thomiris could not trust this secret unto any other, who would manage it better then her self. The hopes which Gelonida would have had of returning into her own Country, if the Queen had married Cixares, moved her to be very sorry for that passion which Thomiris bore unto Artamenes. Moreover, she could not imagine that my Master could refuse that honour which was offered unto him; and she did foresee, that if he accepted of it, it must needs produce a war between Thomiris and Cixares. Yet she resolved to speak, and that quickly, for else the Queen would never be at rest: having then found Chrisantes, she resolved to tell him the whole truth, and after that to tell him, that if he loved Artamenes, he would hinder him from Page 64 accepting this honour which Thomiris offered him; because else in all likelihood, he would betray his master unprofitably, and never enjoy any quietnesse. Chrisantes, much amazed at Gelonidas discourse, as soon as his wonder was a little over, assured her, that she needed not to fear it: and that Artamenes would never accept of it: but since he would not give her any more direct answer, untill his master knew it, he asked her a little more time before he would absolutely resolve her: he went immediately unto him in his Tent, where finding only me with him; Sir, (said he to him) I believe you cannot guess what ill fortune I have to tell you, and to what a proof your constancy is put unto: Fortune Chrisantes (said he to him) is it not very rigorous, when she sends us only such evils as we did foresee, but when her malice is extreme, she will fatally surprize, and overload those whom she intends to destroy: yet notwithstanding (said he) I cannot imagine, what it should be that is so very averse in this Court, unless by misfortune it be, that Thomiris has some secret aversion to me, which causes her not to answer Cixares more favourably, so that I shall be compelled to return without doing any thing. Sir, (replied Chrisantes) this last thing may perhaps fall out so, but it will be by a quite contrary reason to what you say: I understand you not (replied Artamenes) you will perhaps understand me better (said Chrisantes to him) when I shall tell you that Thomiris loves you; and loves you so much as she offers you that which she refuses Cixares. My Master cried out at this report of Chrisantes, and it was a good while before he could believe it: No, no, (said he to him) Gelonida, has either lost her reason, or else yours is not in its right place. Thomiris who has regarded the passions of Indathirses and Aripithes, with such cold indifference for above a whole year, cannot possibly love Artamenes: Artamenes (I say) who loves not her, nor has neither said nor done any thing which might make her think I did; who on the contrary has moved her to Marry the King who sent him; and who can seem no more then a common Ambassador in her eyes: So that Chrisantes you are either not the same you use to be, or else Gelonida has deceived you. Sir, (said Chrisantes to him) there is no alteration in my mind, nor has Gelonida deceived me; for she spoke unto me with great gravity and wisdom: therefore I beseech you give me your answer, for she allowed me but until to morrow to return it unto her: Artamenes seemed so confounded to hear Chrisantes speak in that manner, that it was easie to see, he had much ado to believe him: yet calling unto his memory many passages which he both saw and understood; and which he regarded not before, he no longer doubted the truth of what Chrisantes told him. I could have been well contented, if it had been in his power that Chrisantes and I had never known it: and his soul was in all things so generous, that he would have been well pleased to bear all the burthen of his cares himself, and have concealed them from us if it had been possible: But he could not do it, therefore he began to comfort himself with us, in multiplying his misfortunes: Had ever any man (said he) such fortune as I? when I began to love divine Mandana, was it not to be thought that such a sweet and bitter humor might move her to compassion, and to be tenderly sensible of it; yet, as many acts as I have performed; as many services as I have done her; as much pains as I have took; as many thousand unprofitable sighes as I have breathed; as many tears as I have shed, yet all these could not mollifie her soul: It may very well be said, that if I were not dead, or at least she thought me so: Mandana, the fair Mandana, would never have afforded me the least testimony of her affection. And yet for all this she resolved to banish me, and that for ever, when I came hither. But alas, the misfortune which persecuted me in Cappadocia, has not followed me hither amongst the Massagetes in the like manner, but quite contrary, since a Queen who seems to be fierce, and proud, loves him who cares not for her; offers him a heart which was never asked, and would consent unto that of her own motion, which she might without injustice refuse if it were asked: No, no, said he to us, this perverse accident, is neither an effect of my merit, nor the imbecility of Thomiris: It is only my mistfortune, and my averse destiny which would punish me as well by a refusal of good things, as by those which they never afforded me. Do not think divine Mandana, (said he) that the sorrows which I am sensible of are any effects of my refusing a great and a fair Queen; No divine Princesse, I have no such thoughts; My heart does too dearly preserve the image of your Angelique beauty, to be ever moved by hers or any else: But I do confesse this perverse accident does much displease me; And if it were in my choice, I had rather fight two Battles, then to be put upon such a necessity, as to make a glorious and a proud Princesse blush for shame and confusion Tell then Gelonida (said he to Chrisantes) that I would not believe what you told me; but that though you had perswaded Page 65 me to believe it, yet it had been to no purpose, since the fidelity which I owe unto the King whom I serve, will not permit me to accept of such an honour: yet Chrisantes (said he) forget not to tell Gelonida, that I gave no credit unto your words; and leave an handsom way open for Thomiris, to repent her self of her first thoughts: which perhaps she has already condemned in her self. Thus Sir, did my Master say unto Chrisantes, who went immediatly unto Gelonida; and she as soon to give an account of the answer, unto the Queen: But alas, this answer produced effects, contrary to the hopes and expectation of Artamenes; and Thomiris would not make use of this honest way to correct her first thoughts by her second: but on the contrary it did exasperate the mind of this Queen in lieu of appeasing it, and this lofty Soul thought she was now doubly obliged to overcome him which resisted her: No no, Gelonida (said she unto this Ladie, after she had delivered the answer of Chrisantes) Artamenes is not so hard to be perswaded as he seems, and perhaps he is but too well perswaded of my honour, to compas my designe: This is not a business wherein any falsnesse can be suspected, for where a Princesse woos, and is the first which speaks of love, there cannot be any doubt of it. From hence it must be concluded, that Artamenes who seems not to credit, what is told him, would either be told of it often, or else he would never have it spoke on againe; which of these two soever it be, Thomiris is not satisfied, unless it be so, that Artamenes thinks it to be a becoming modestie, and will not at the first answer unto a proposition, which is so advantageous for him. But however Gelonida, I must at the least know the heart of Artamenes, though I cannot obtaine it: And I must speak unto him, in such a manner as he cannot disguise himself though he were as subtle as any Grecian: must you speak Madam? replied Gelonida; Alas, I beseech you, be not too hastie in such an unusuall way, least you should afterwards repent it: Consult a little better, before you resolve it, and do not blindly follow a passion which will draw you into too much inconveniency, if you take not heed. No Gelonida, replied Thomiris, that passion which possesseth me, shall not cause me to commit a fault: but know, that at this time I do prefer the sincerity of the Scythians my neighbours, before that handsomnesse of Ecbatan, whereof you speak so much: That virtue which causeth us to disguise our thoughts, and hide that which is in the soule, is not the custom of the Massagets. Amongst you it is no matter if a woman do love, so she do not expresse it: whereas amongst us we use to banish the most tender thoughts out of our hearts, if we do not find them just. And so I do assure you, that if I could think it a crime to love such an Illustrious man as Artamenes, I would contend with my passion in lieu of concealing it. But on the contrary, I do not at all hold it dishonorable or unworthy, to affect that man whom I think worthy to command all others: I cannot see that there is any such great mystery in the matter as you imagine, since there is none but crimes which we ought to Cover and Conceal. But Madam (replied Gelonida suppose Artamenes should not give such an answer as you desire, and as I believe he will not, would you not repent of your speaking to him? I know not what I may do, (answered Thomiris very angrily) but I know for the present that I will be better satisfied of Artamelnes his true thoughts. Good heavens Madam (said Gelonida) are you not afraid to ruine that which you would promote? I do fear every thing (answered Thomiris) But what would you have me do? I am no more a Mistress of my own will, and I do no more then what pleaseth that passion which possesseth me; and because I believe it just, I have submitted my self unto it. Thomiris spoke many other things which discovered the disturbance and irregularity of her passionate mind: she could not endure the conversation of Indathirses and Aripithes: She thought upon nothing but Artamenes: and because it was indeed the virtue of my Master which had such a powerful influence upon her heart, she beleaved that all the effects of so noble a cause and so pure, were all innocent. Mean while, Artamenes was not a little perplexed with a fear to see Thomiris after this proposition which had been made unto him: and the Queen for her part, she knew not very well how to endure the looks of Artamenes, notwithstanding her seeming resolutions. This violent passion which possessed her being more predominate then her modesty caused her, not to stay long without the sight of the object of her affection. My Master, not daring to omit any part of his duty, went unto her at the usuall hour; & as illuck would have it, found none with her but her women, who were no hinderance unto private discourse, because they stood far off at the other end of the Room. Artamenes then, saluting her with a most humble reverence; and not daring almost to look upon her, lest he should put her to the blush, did speak unto her concerning things far off that business: But as Thomiris, Page 66 retained nothing in her minde but it, so she turned all unto her own designe, and were the discourse never so far off the matter, yet she did handsomely draw the sence of it unto her own ends. After she had rendred the like salute unto Artamenes, with as much confusion as he; and after the first complements, he began to discourse of the beauty of the Country of Massagettes, and its vastnesse: It is true (answered she unto him) our Country is not very contemptible, yet I cannot be perswaded, but you prefer Cappadocia before it; and perhaps (said she blushing) you had rather obey there, then Command here. Doubtlesse (replied Artamenes) it is but just so to do; for Madam, necessity does impose it upon me, to obey in Cappadocia, although I am not born a subject unto Cixares; nor can I ever have any right to command among the Massagettes; unlesse (said he smiling) the King my Master do send me to make War upon them, which your Majestie knows very well how to prevent. You know, said she to him, that Crowns are obtained more ways then one. There are Kings elective, as well as there are Kings by conquest: and who told you, that without fighting you could not Reign here, or at least over the Issedonians? Reason Madam, told me, (replied Artamenes) knowing very well, that the Crown of the Issedonians is not elective: and also knowing most certainly, that your people are so well contented with your Government, that they will never change you. No Madam, I am not so meanly versed in the several Customs of People, but that I know, that the Spartan Customs and the Massagettes are not alike, and that it is not here, as where the Kings are elective: But it is you Madam (said he unto her, and would not give her time to answer) who may get several Crowns without fighting: and your virtue hath procured you so many Royal Adorers, as I may well say, you may chuse Scepters and Crowns, when, and where you please: and although those which you have of your own already be very illustrious, yet believe it Madam, there are others also which are not unworthy of you. For my part, (replied the Queen) I am partly of your mind in one thing; for as you had rather obey in Cappadocia, then reign here; so had I rather obey here then reign in Cappadocia. Perhaps Madam, replied my Master, you would not say so of Medea, if you were there; and the stately pallaces of Ecbatan, are if I be not deceived, to be preferred before your magnificent Tents: No Artamenes, replied she, all the magnificence of Ecbatan moves not my minde: I seek for solid vertues, and not splendent Thrones; and I know you are too full of reason, not to be of my opinion: also I am perswaded, that although we have no Pallaces nor Towns, yet if you did finde amongst us a Princesse which were most illustrious in every thing, you would prefer her before her that sits upon the Throne of Assyria. Doubtlesse I know Madam, answered Artamenes, that I should more esteem such a one in a prison, then many others which wore Crowns: But Madam, when I speak unto you of the Throne of Medea, I am not put to that trouble, since the Prince who must sit upon it, is one that is owner of all great Vertues, and good Qualities: He knew better how to make his choise (answered Thomiris) when he committed the command of his Armes unto you: But I doubt whether he was so judicious, in employing an illustrious Conquerour to be an Embassadour, since in my opinion they are different Qualities. If fidelity (answered Artamenes much non-plust) be one of the most essential parts of this kinde of employment: I can assure your Majesty, that I have as much of it as I have of Courage; and if I prove not so happy in this my negotiation, as I have been in War, it shall be because Madam, your Majesty would not have it so, but not my fault: No Madam, I will omit no endeavors which may conduce to the satisfaction of that King who sent me, to be as happy in my Negotiation, as I have been in War. No Artamenes, deceive not your self, (answered the Queen) that which you have proposed unto me, will not take effect, and you your self are an invincible hindrance unto it. I, Madam, (answered my Master.) Yes, you (answered Thomiris) and therefore complain not, if Ciaxares receive no satisfaction from me. I do confesse Madam, (answered Artamenes) I do not understand you. Page 67 You understand me well enough Artamenes (answered she in a faint voice, and dejecting her eyes) but it's I that does not understand you. You may understand me Madam when you please, replied my Master, and if I have been ill interpreted, I shall be most ready to clear all your doubts and justify my self. Your crime (answered Thomiris) is of such a quality, as I cannot accuse you, but I must accuse my self, which is not an easie matter for me to do. As I am very confident of my own innocency (replied Artamenes) so I do not doubt of yours; nor can I suspect a great Queen, of the least error. No Artamenes (said she and covering her eyes with her hand) I do not erre, when I think you worthy of a Crown. Alas Madam, (cried out my Master) doubtlesse I am not rightly understood; and lest I should neglect that reverence which I do owe you. I think it is my best not to answer you. You shall answer me enough, in not answering me at all, replied the Queen, and I shall not need any long discourse to understand you. But Madam (said Artamenes then) since what your Majesty tels me is true, I have no other businesse, but to take my leave of you and return to Themiscira, that I may no longer keep one of the greatest Kings upon earth in a fruitlesse hope. This last discourse which my Master had premeditated to puzzle the Queen, did much surprize her, and put her unto such a non-plus, that she knew not what to answer; for she thought that by leaving no hopes in Artamenes to promote the interest of Ciaxares, she should perswade him, that she loved him; but perceiving this course did produce so bad an effect, and that this resolute answer took from her all pretence of staying him, she repented of what she had said, though she knew not how to remedy it; she was upon the very point of more openly discovering her passion unto him; Love and Modesty did much contend which should open, which should shut her mouth; she would speak, and she would be silent; she would oftentimes change colour and look upon my Master, then upon a sudden withdraw her looks, and deject her eyes, and all this with such violent agitation, and turbulent irresolution, as caused abundance of perplexity in my Master, whom this crosse adventure made even desperate: But in conclusion, Thomiris not being able to speak down right of her passion unto Artamenes; and not being willing that he should depart, did turn the matter another way, so that beginning to speak again, it is not now Artamenes (said she to him) that you shall receive your Answer, but since you spoke unto me by Teres, it is by him I will return you an Answer: Mean while, we will not yet resolve upon any thing: A minuit cannot make us alter our firmest resolves. Perhaps you will desire nothing to morrow but what you desire now; and perhaps, I my self also, shall not wish for any thing but what I wish at present, though I am fully perswaded, that what I shall desire is equally innocent and glorious. As they were upon these termes, Indathirses and Aripithes, who since their jealousy of my Master, became inseparable Companions, came in, and interrupted the discourse: These two Princes did very easily observe a great agitation in the mind of Thomiris, and saw some signe of disorder in the face of Artamenes, which they imagined was caused by their anger to be interrupted in their pleasing discourse, but which indeed was quite contrary. These jealous Princes spoke little; Artamenes for his part said not much: Thomiris was restlesse in her mind, that not being able to endure the presence of these two Princes, who loved her, and could not love them, and the delighting, and therefore cruel sight of Artamenes, whom she loved, but who loved not her, troubling her, she took leave of them all; and at the same time quitted her self of the objects of her indifference, and of her love. After the Queen was gone, Artamenes went out also with the two Princes; and since he was much pleased with Indathirses, whom he suspected not of any such thoughts as he brought with him, he left them not so soon: They whose minds were only to discover his intentions, and being glad of this opportunity, propounded it unto him to walk out together: During this walk, they put a hundred odd froward questions unto him concerning the time he was to stay in this Court, unto which he answered very innocently: So that sometimes he did confirm their jealousies, sometimes he would lessen them, but yet commonly they rather augmented, then diminished. Doubtlesse (said Indathirses to him) It is a businesse of some great importance, which detains you thus long in this Court, and which moved the King of Cappadocia to employ a man of your Quality unto the Queen. My Master, thinking to do them a pleasure in speaking advantageously concerning Thomiris, did answer Indathirses in such a manner as moved resentment quite opposite to joy: The Queen (replied he) is a Princess so illustrious, that though the Negotiation were not of any great importance, yet the King whom I serve would send none unto her but a Person of great Quality, and if he failed in any thing, it was in that he did not make Page 68 choice of one more worthy then my self, to treat with so great a Princesse. I do believe (answered Aripithes) that he could not have found out one who had been more welcom to her; But that which most wonders me, added he, is to see the Queen treat you as she does, & yet dispatch you no sooner: Affairs are never dispatched in such haste, replied my Master, unless they be such as concern open wars: Those which you negotiate, answered Indathirses, I do believe are not of that nature, I should rather think them matters of love; since the King whom you serve is not married, having only one daughter unmarried also, and this Queen a widow; and the young King her son being also a great Prince, it is not impossible but love may be the subject of this so secret employment. No Aripithes (replied he interrupting him) it cannot be as you say, for the marriages of Kings and their loves are never concealed; I rather suspect something else: you may very well think (said Artamenes half smiling) that if I had any such secret orders, I ought not to tell you nor shew you my instructions; but I must leave you the liberty of your own thoughts, and give you leave to divert your selves in reasoning upon such a businesse as I must never tell you: I do not think, (said Indathirses then) that your businesse is matters of war, for the most secret things of that nature would quickly be divulged: But if I be not much deceived, our impaciency to know your businesse is not greater then yours, to know the end of your negotiation: For the Court of Thomiris, though it be very glorious to us Scythians who are declared enemies to all magnificence; yet it is not so to you, who has seen the Court of Medea, and live in that of Cappadocia, which is not inferiour in all gallantry and pomp. My Master thinking he had done them a great piece of civility, did augme•• their jealousy, when he told them thus: I do confesse that Cappadocia has most attractive charms in it; and I do confesse also that any free and reasonable soul must needs find very great ones in this Court of Thomiris: and though in lieu of being in a pleasant, such as hers is, she should reign over that people who live under the mountain Imaus, amongst the Rockes and Precipices, yet she alone were enough to make the place most pleasant where ere she were; and would doubtlesse so charm Embassadors to wait long upon her, that they would make no haste away from her. Since we are strangers as well as you are, replied Indathirses, it is not fit for us to comment upon those commendations which you bestow upon the Country of the Massagetes: and as for the Queen (added Aripithes) it belongs not to us to tell her what you say advantageously of her, it being very probable, that you being facetious as you are, you have found out ways to acquaint her with your good opinion of her. She is one, replied Artamenes, who must not be commended to her face; it is no lesse injurious to take too much liberty in commending a great Queen, then it is scandal unto one of a mean condition: But as for Thomiris (said he to them) there is no need to tell her she is infinitely deserving, and by consequence infinitely esteemed, since it is not possible she can be ignorant of those admirable qualities wherein she is so transcendent. You may imagine Sir, how these two Rivals were stung at what my Master said: Sometimes they would whisper together, and sometimes they would look upon Artamenes, and seek for that in his eyes, which they plainly saw in his words: As for his part, his spirits were so possessed with passion, and angered at this vexatious adventure wherein he was entangled, that he minded neither the discourse nor actions of these two Princes, as we understood by him which waited upon them, who told it afterwards unto Chrisantes: But in conclusion Sir, Artamenes being impatient to be alone, that he might have liberty to digest his thoughts, did end the walk, and parted from these two Princes, who left him with a colder complement, then they accosted him. We understood afterwards, that as soon as my Master was parted from them, they began to descant upon that turbulence which they observed in the Queens face: upon the pensiveness which appeared in the eyes of their supposed Rival, when they came first in, and upon every word he had spoke unto them whilst they were walking: But the result of all their arguments was, that they concluded he loved Thomiris, and Thomiris did not hate him: and in conclusion, did both think and speak, as much as most violent jealousy could prompt them unto. My Master, for his part, had not too much tranquillity, and the Queen was most of all perplexed: Insomuch as she was sorry to see her self in a manner, exceed the modesty of her sex: that which most vexed her was, to see her folly did not thrive: it grieved her to the heart, that neither her beauty nor her quality could move the heart of Artamenes: This moved her absolutely to command Gelonida, to speak her self unto my Master; and pump his thoughts to the bottom of his heart: Gelonida denied a command that had so little reason in it, but Thomiris would without more contradiction be punctually Page 69 obeyed: Gelonida, since there was no remedy, spoke her self unto Artamenes, after she had prepared his mind a little, by the assistance of Chrisantes: But the truth was, her businesse was rather to help him out with a handsome pretence to refuse the Queen, then any perswasion of him to her: for since this Lady was so affectionately tied unto the interest of Ciaxares, and conceiving that the Queen made a choice below her quality in thinking upon Artamenes; she carried the businesse after such a manner, as did little lesse intangle my Master, then if she had driven on the design which Thomiris desired her: Certainly he never met with a more peevish piece of businesse: He prayed Gelonida a hundred times over, to perswade the Queen that he esteemed her as much as mortal man could do: But although he were extremely in love with her, yet would he never falsifie that fidelity and reverence which he owed the King of Cappadocia. Indeed Sir, he said as much unto her, as any man of the sweetest and noblest mind could do, to conceal the shame and confusion of so great and fair a Queen: Gelonida and he, then being agreed upon an answer, she returned to Thomiris, who did most impatiently expect her: she no sooner saw her, but causing all to go out of her chamber; well Gelonida (said she to her) let me from your mouth hear, whether it be Thomiris or her Crown which Artamenes thinks unworthy of himself? It is rather he, Madam replied Gelonida, who thinks himself unworthy of both: But Madam, he said further, that though he might without injustice aspire unto that honour which your Majesty is pleased to offer him, and notwithstanding that esteem which he owes you, yet he resolves rather to die then fail in duty to his Master: what (replied Thomiris) would he do so though he loved me? Certainly Madam (said Gelonida, to her) it cannot be thought that love will ever corrupt his duty. He told me Madam, that he adored you in his heart; but though his life was destined to be unhappy, yet he would not be wicked: his vertue indeed would be great (replied the Queen) but his love would be small if he could do so; and doubtlesse, he expressed his passion unto you as an indifferent imaginary thing which never disturbed his reason, by any experience he had of it: I could have spoke as he does the day before he came hither; but now, since I have altered my thoughts, I am perswaded that if he loved me, he would change also with me; and his generosity would be perhaps a little dispensed with, principally in such a businesse as does not directly injure his vertue: But Gelonida (added she further) it is not I that can perswade him; that which my merit cannot do, my reasons will not: your merit Madam, replied Gelonida, has (as he assures) wrought upon his soul, as much as you can reasonably desire: He doth acknowledge that he both esteems and admires you; but he adds withall, that it is in such a manner, as those who are native subjects unto their Queen, although he be not one of yours: for my part, replied Thomiris, I cannot tell what to think of Artamenes; for certain I am, there is no vitious thought in my heart, for if there were the least tincture of any such, very despitte and repentance should quickly cure me of that malady which troubles me; yet although that kind of imbecility does not disturbe me, my soul it is not at quiet: Artamenes has induced me almost to hate Indathirses, and Aripithes; I cannot indure the name of Ciaxares, which by others he has moved in, but not himself: every thing which might divert me, annoys me; my own thoughts vex me; and not well knowing whether I do love, or ought to love; I am only certain that I hate my own tranquillity, and that it will be hard for me ever to find it, unless he will permit me to give him a Crown; and confer that upon him which indeed his vertue deserves, and quality denies him. For my part Madam (replied Gelonida) I think that Artamenes prefers his duty before his ambition. But Gelonida (replied Thomiris very angrily) if you do imagine such an impossibility in my design, why do you not tell me that Artamenes slights me? that Artamenes speaks of me but with a faint respect; and that Artamenes is unworthy of my affection? Perhaps, if you carry it thus, very spleen will work that in my heart which reason could not: But you seem to tell me, that Artamenes spoke unto you with so much respect, and so much wisdom, that I can hardly either complain or despair; For if Artamenes do esteem me, he may chance love me; and if he love me, then that which he calls duty unto Cixares, will quickly submit unto that duty which he owes unto Thomiris; therefore I must only keep Artamenes in this Court as long as possible I can, and submit the rest unto fortune: I do believe Madam, replied Gelonida, that it will be very difficult to keep him long, for if I be not deceived, he will presently ask leave to depart: he may ask it, (answered this violent Princesse) but he shall not obtain it: The orders which I shall give will stop his passage over Araxes. This was the discourse of Thomiris and Gelonida: But to the end that Teres should not understand her intentions, she gave him order Page 70 to tell my Master that if he would have a little patience, she would within a few dayes, give him a peremptory answer. Artamenes was then very much perplexed, for Gelonida did let him know by Chrisantes, that the Queens passion was every day more and more violent: Teres on the contrary, told him that there was great hopes in his transaction: Indeed, he neither knew well what to think, nor what to resolve upon: He did still urge Teres to presse on the businesse, and told him plainly, that if he received not an answer within a short time, he would be gone without it. Mean time, this bad successe did much torment him; not only because he was sorry that he disturbed the tranquillity of Thomiris; nor because Cixares would be perhaps displeased with him; but because he apprehended Mandana might imagine that he did not use his best endeavour in the businesse, since the successe of it might deprive that Princesse of a Crown. He was forced therefore unto patience; and to wait upon the issue of that businesse, which in all appearance would not succeed handsomely. Thomiris, since she had spoken unto Artamenes in such plain termes, was two dayes and would not be seen by any, under colour of being not well: During which time, Artamenes the better to entertain himself with his melancholly contemplations, went out to walk upon the banks of that Rivolet, which as I told you, did run along the Tents Royal, and went with very little company; He would sometimes leave us among some certain Trees which grew there, and there command us to stay; he would walk alone by himself, and go so far sometimes that he would be out of our sight. Two dayes after that Gelonida, had spoke unto him, Indathirses, and Aripithes, who had observed a great secrecy between Chrisantes and her, and conceived things much otherwise then they were, were extremely tormented with their jealousies, and without any further resolution, would clear all their doubts of being revenged upon Artamenes. But yet the difficulty was to agree, which of them it should be which should execute it; for said Aripithes unto Indathirses, if you should call Artamenes in question, and he give you no satisfaction, you must then fight with him, and then perhaps you would pretend a new right unto Thomiris by this combat: No, answered Indathirses, I promise you never to pretend any thing unto her without her free consent: So that you may easily imagine, that my quarrel with Artamenes is not the way to procure her favour if she love him, but it will put you into lesse danger of her hatred then my self: But so it was Sir, that they could not agree upon the matter; they were rather ready to fall upon one another, for it is imaginable, that union which was grounded upon jealousy was not indissoluble, and so they parted very ill satisfied with one another; and Indathirses seeing my master go out of the Tent to walk, followed only by two or three of his men, he went after with an equal number, to seek him by the River side where he often walked: As soon as Artamenes saw him, he went towards him, and accosting him with much civility; I am happier then I thought (said he to him) since I expected nothing in my walk but solitude, and find such good company; Indathirses answered my Master civilly enough before the company: and beginning to go on, Indathirses propounded it to walk on foot, and my Master consenting unto it, they gave their horses to their men, and walked alone along the River side: As soon as they were at a reasonable distance, and ought of sight of their men; Indathirses looking upon Artamenes, I know not (said he to him) whether the businesse I have to tell you, will surprize you; but I do know very well it can never trouble you so much as it has me: I know not (replied Artamenes) whether or no it will surprize me until I do know it; yet I can assure you, that I use not to be so at any perverse events; but always prepare my self to receive the worst malice of fortune with a quiet mind: my businesse with you now (replied Indathirses) is not of that quality: but before I explain my self any further, tell me I beseech you, whether since you came amongst the Massagettes, you ever heard of the cause which brought me into this Court of Thomiris? Since I do use to be sincere (replied Master) I must confesse they tell me it is because you are in love with Thomiris: and that both you and the Prince of Sauromates are possessed with the same passion: Knew you as much before you saw Thomiris? I did so (answered my Master) why then did you not defend your heart (added Indathirses) against her charms? and since you make such publike profession of generosity, why would you disingage two Princes, who have received you with all possible civility? for I am certain that the Queen loves you, and I conceive that you love her: for this Princesse would for a whole year together obstinately deny her affection unto me, to place it upon a man, who never asked it, or does not love her: I do confesse (answered Artamenes coldly) that what you tell me does more surprize me then I thought it would: But since Page 71 do not use to give any explanations of this nature, unto any who complaine of me, and speak unto me in such an Aire as you do, I can say nothing to you, but that I reverence the Queen more then to suspect her of any such imbecility, as you accuse her of: And for my particular, if I have been any obstacle, unto your affection, I have done nothing but what I ought; but yet (replied Indathirses) you do not directly tell me, whether or no you love the Queen, and whether the Queen loves you, and whether your businesse at Court will quickly be dispatched? I will give you no other answer (replied my Master) but as I did before, that I have done nothing but what I ought to do; and if you be not contented with it, then you must look out a way to get better satisfaction, for I will not refuse you any that I can. I do know very well, (replied Indathirses) that to assault an Ambassador, is in some degree a violation of the law of nations, which all the people in the world thinks sacred; but since I am a stranger as well as you, I do not think my self obliged by the lawes of this Countrey; nor that I am any thing injurious unto honour, if I demand reparation for the affront which you have offered, in causing Thomiris to hate me. Most Just (answered my Master without any dorr at it) and if you please to walk some two hundred paces further out of their sight which follow us, you having a Sword as well as I, we may there end all differences, and see whether the love you bear unto the Queen, will make you Conqueror without any danger. Artamenes told us afterwards, that his anger to see himself persecuted by a man unto whom he was not any Rivall, did so transport him, that he was not less incensed then if he had been in love with the Queen. Indathirses then accepting the offer, they began to walk until they were out of any sight of their men, who never minded them: Indathirses, and Artamenes drawing their Swords, began the combat, the particulars whereof I cannot well relate, since all we know was from the mouth of the Combatants, whose modestie would not permit them to set out their own valours: Artamenes told us that Indathirses shewed himself a man of great Courage, and much valour, in this dangerous attempt: They made severall passes at one another without a touch: but at last, since it was my Masters destinie ever to vanquish, his Sword was sanguin'd with the blood of Indathirses: The hurt was but slight, yet since it was in his right Arme, it much troubled him: so that fearing he should not be long able to manage his Sword; he resolved to come up very close unto my Master, who received him as gallantly: Indathirses was as tall as my Master: but there was ever such a strange vigour in the heart of Artamenes, as it allwayes doubled his strength in any dangers, and which ever made him victorious; so that after a little time of dispute, Artamenes catcht hold of Indathirses Sword, and presenting his own sword unto his brest caused him to confesse himself vanquished: my Master having both swords in his hands; you will now acknowledg (said he) that Artamenes is not altogether unworthy of the affection of Thomiris? I will confesse (replied Indathirses) that you have valour enough to vanquish me, and that my fortune is not good enough to dispute with you for her: and I do confesse, replied my Master, restoring him his sword, and embracing him (that I am not in love with Thomiris, That I never was nor ever will be: How, (replied Indathirses) are not you a lover of Thomiris? No, (replied Artamenes) and by my good will, shall never be any hinderance unto your felicity with her: since it is so (replied Indathirses) why would you fight? because I would better perswade you of the truth, (answered my Master) and not suffer you to suspect my valour: Indathirses was so much surprised and charmed with the generosity of Artamenes, that he could not chuse but desire him to explain this Riddle, and used such pressing termes, and so full of submission, that my Master promised him he would; yet since he was hurt in the Arme, he perswaded him to returne unto his tent to be dressed: the difficulty was how to get thither unperceived, and since it was not possible, Artamenes desired him not to be troubled at it, for least that Thomiris should be offended with him and banish him, that he would take it upon himself, and say that it was he who first assaulted: you are then it seems so much in her favour (answered Indathirses) that you fear not her anger? Rather say, (replied Artamenes smiling) that her anger is so little terrible to me, that I fear not to expose my self unto it. Mean while Sir, you may imagine how much they were amazed which held their horses, when at their returne they knew by the blood of Indathirses, they had been fighting: that which most wondred them, was to see them seem as good friends, as when they went out: And indeed Indathirses and Artamenes, did ever after that love dearly. My Master because he would keep his word, after he had brought Indathirses to his Pavillion, sent Chrisantes to the Queen, to ask pardon for the combat which he had fought Page 72 with Indathirses: that he confessed he was to blame in it, therefore he begged pardon for Indathirses as well as himself. Thomiris much wondered at this combat, and could not guesse the cause: Aripithes who was quite out with Indathirses, was angry with himself that he could not goe unto him to ask what Artamenes had told him: yet the Queen, who could not be angry with Artamenes, reflected all against Indathirses; saying he had extremely offended her, by affronting an Ambassador in her Court. Artamenes knowing it by the returne of Chrisantes, went himself to beseech her in the behalfe of Indathirses; or if she would punish him, yet not to make that the ground of it: she urged my Master to tell her the cause of the combat, but he would not be wooed to tell her: yet in conclusion procured pardon both for himself and Indathirses. Aripithes, angry to be thus prevented by Indathirses, but much more to see my Master escape the danger of the combat, and be victorious, resolved, notwithstanding his pretentions unto the Queen, to quarrel with him also, and to seek out foonan opportunity: Mean while, the Prince of Taurosithes, who was all impatience until he was better informed from the mouth of Artamenes., of all which he said unto him, did send very civilly unto him to put him in memory of his promise: which my Master the next day performed: He went unto his Tent; and acknowledged unto him, that his negotiation at this Court was, to propound a marriage between the Queen and Cixares; but not being able to give the reason, he found her very averse in the motion; and that he began infallibly to see he should return without effecting any thing, but the businesse which related unto Pirats upon the Caspian Sea, which was only the specious pretence of his voyage; so Sir, (said he to him) you may well Judge that I am in no fault, nor shall not be, although I do continue my transaction of the Kings interest whom I serve: But trouble not your self at it, for I do assure you, that I am not able to effect it. And that I may the more quiet your mind in regard of my self: I do confesse unto you, that I am in love with one whose manicles I would not quit for all the Crowns of the world. Indathirses gave my Master many thanks for his generosity and freedom: and after he had promised unto him perpetual affection, how comes it to pass (said he to him) that you cannot promote your negotiation, since the Queen bestowes so many marks of her esteem and affection upon you? Artamenes, desiring to conceal from Indathirses, the imbecility of Thomiris, told him that it was oft times the custom of Kings, to sweeten the bad success of a business, by their way and manner of transacting it: yet Indathirses was too much interested in the businesse to be so easily deceived, and not to discern the difference between the effects of common civility, and the effects of a violent passion: but do what he could, he could not move Artamenes to tell what he knew concerning the love of Thomiris; my Master always telling him, that he may very well content himself with knowing that he had no affection unto the Queen. This discourse being ended, Artamenes left him, and Chrisantes came to advertise him, that the Queen had given secret orders to observe his actions very carefully, least he should escape away: you may imagine Sir, how much this news troubled him; yet he dissembled it, and seemed as if he knew nothing of it. He divers times made visits to the Queen, who did not speak unto him but after an ordinary manner; sometimes she would be melancholy, sometimes she would pass from melancholy, unto vexation, and shew some signes of anger, and fury: sometimes she would assume her civil and obliging humor, so that it was easie to Judge, that one and the same cause produced different effects: my Master did once more press upon Teres, who made answer, that he was almost in despair of doing him that service he would, but yet he could not give him any absolute answer: afterwards he let my Master know that the Queen commanded to tell him, she would have him stay until the returne of Spargapises and Aritanus: that she could neither conclude of any thing, nor send him away until the King her son came back: But with all he told him, how she had sent secret orders not to returne over soone, and beseeched him to pardon him if we were not able to performe those good offices which he promised: after this, we observed that upon the matter Artamenes was not at liberty, and that there was always many men which observed him: he could never walk, but he was accompanied with a great number, and had scarce the freedome to be in his tent without guard. The ordinary guards were not only doubled; but there was courts of guard placed in several distances, round about the Railes of the Camp. We understood by Gelonida, that to color the business, it was given out, the Queen had received Intelligence how Artamenes had secret designs upon the country; and therefore without offering any violence unto him, unless her doubts were better cleared, she would have him carefully looked unto. Artamenes, seeing himself, brought unto this extremity, Page 73 did not know what to resolve upon: he saw sufficiently that the marriage of Ciaxares could not be brought about: he knew that if he should move for new leave to depart, it would rather more restrain his Libertie, then do any good: he perceived by those orders which were given unto the Guards about the Tent Royall, and by them which observed his actions, that there was no possibility to escape: nor could he devise how to get himself out of this Labyrinth. Alas (said he sometimes unto us) what can I do? what shall I say to Ciaxares? how can I speak unto Mandana? Shall I tell them that Thomiris is in love with me? Is it possible for me to entertain them with any such discourse? But if I do not tell them, what will the King and the Princesse think of my flight? What will they say of such strange proceedings? May they not well say I have lost my senses? Yet as the state of things does stand, this is the best which can happen unto me: My hopes of seeing Mandana will comfort me: and my innocence will not long lie hid: Thus was Artamenes descanting upon the business when Gelonida came to tell him, that she would advise him to be gone as soon as he could; but since he did not very well know how to do it; he thought good to colour it, and therefore he desired leave once more to depart: But she answered that it could not be with conveniency, and therefore he must absolutely wait the return of Spargapises. Artamenes then seeing himself denied, and a prisoner, was extremely melancholy; not but that Gelonida did contrive all the ways she could for his escape, but there was no means possible to bring it about. This did more disquiet my Master, then any thing else; for if he had been permitted but a sword in his hand, I do verily think, he would have hoped to escape by forcing the Guards, and killing all that opposed his passage, for such wonderful and incredible things have I seen him bring to passe. But when he began to consider that the Queen was not thus violent and unjust but because she loved him, he could not resolve to dishonour her by such an action; nor kill the subjects of that Princesse, whose crime was an error of love unto him. Sorrow did sit so heave upon his soul that Indathirses, now healed of his hurt, and coming to visit him, did perceive it, and did so urge him to acknowledge that Thomiris loved him, and that her love was the cause of his sorrows, as he could interpret it no otherwise, and at last told him how the Queen expressed such things unto him as did induce him to believe it: and further told Indathirses, that he would infinitely oblige him if he would devise some way whereby he might escape. Now you may plainly see, Generous Indathirses (said he to him) that I am not your Rival, since I do desire your furtherance to rid me away from Thomiris. I do indeed, (answered Indathirses) and plainly see you are in no fault, but that on the contrary I am much obliged to you: But for all that (said he) you do cause abundance of trouble in my soul; for truly, to discover the bottom of my heart unto you, I should be lesse troubled then I am, if Thomiris loved one who loved her: But that this Princesse who is so admirably fair and amiable; who has a soul so great, and so unalterably settled as to resist the love of Aripithes and my self so long; should after all this, fall in love with a man who loves not her, I do really confesse unto you, that I cannot resent it but with abundance of extraordinary sorrow: 'Tis true, I should be more jealous, if you loved her, but not half so much grieved: But in that state wherein I do finde my self, pardon me (said he to him) if your admirable merits can justifie Thomiris in my thoughts: No, Generous Artamenes, I will love her no longer; I will either pull that passion out of my soul, or else I'll die: and the more to facilitate your escape, I will determine upon my own; To that end, I will tell the Queen, I have received orders from the King of the Tauroscithes my father, to come unto him, and desire her leave to be gone: Since I am not Artamenes (said he sighing) she will permit it; and the better to further our designe, you shall faine your self sick: In the night you shall come into my Tent, and I will convey you away with me; your servants may also passe amongst my Train, and we will go out so early in the morning, that the Guards cannot know you: You may appoint some servants to stay behinde, who may tell it that their Master is not well, they dare not go into his chamber untill it be late: This devise will afford you more time, and you will be further off, before your flight be discovered. Those who watch and observe you in the day time, com[m]it all the care of you in the night unto the night Guards, who watch both within, and without the Camp, so that the project will aparently take effect; and I shall set you in such a way, where, unlesse I be much deceived, they will never seek you: In short, Indathirses told him; I will be both your guide and your convoy: But (said he) do not think, that this office which I do you, is out of any interest or end; for let me tell you Page 74 once more, I will love Thomiris no longer: Absence which uses to cure such maladiies, shall perfect that which anger has begun: In a word, Sir, to make my discourse the shorter; though Artamenes was extremely unwilling to take from Thomiris such an illustrious lover; yet Indathirses did presse it so upon him, that he accepted of his offer: The business was done with more ease then we could expect: Indathirses asked leave and obtained it: My master counterfeited being sick; we went out of our Tent unto that of Indathirses (which was very near) in the night: we appointed one of those who was to stay behind at the chamber door to conceal our flight as long as he could: at the first break of day, we went out of the Tents Royal unperceived by any, because we were mingled amongst the Train of Indathirses: The guards who had orders from the Queen to let this Prince passe, did not oppose our passe: so that we were got out of the Camp, and out of their furthest Courts of Guards undiscovered by any: but I forgot to tell you Sir, how much it troubled my Master thus to leave his men; so that if Gelonida, who was privy to our departure, had not assured him, that she had prevalency enough with the Queen to prevent any ill usage unto them: I do believe he would not have gone: but this vertuous woman, did so faithfully promise to protect them, that he did believe it, and took her counsel: Leaving a Letter for Thomiris, whereby he endeavoured to colour and excuse his departure. Mean time, our march proved so prosperous, that we were not found by them who questionlesse did seek for us; for Indathirses did lead us such a way, as none would ever suspect us to take. My Master would have quitted this Prince from being his guide any longer; yet Indathirses would needs continue his office; for Sir, since he imagined, that as soon as the flight of Artamenes was discovered, the Queen would cause all the passages over Araxes to be stopped; therefore he conducted him unto a place higher up the River, where it parted into three divisions, and where they might foord it over: It was just to the side of Araxes that Indathirses conducted Artamenes, whom he loved exceedingly, although he had been a cause of much sorrow unto him: My Master did then ask pardon, for being in some sort, a cause of his griefs, and both of them embracing one another with equal tendernes of affection, they parted with reciprocal promises to love one another eternally. Indathirses looked upon Artamenes as he passed the River; who being landed on the other side, saluted the Prince of Tauroscithes, and he him again: Afterwards Indathirses took the way unto his Country, though now he was a good way out of it; and we took that which conducted unto Cappadocia: But Sir, that which made the first dayes journeys most unpleasant was, because Artamenes had much ado to resolve with himself what he should say unto Ciaxares; yet after he had well bethought himself, he resolved to tell him only, that he did not find things in so good a state, as to move Thomiris openly concerning his marriage; and that this Princesse being perswaded unto it by some ill disposed persons, caused a rumour to be raised, that he had some bad designs in agitation; that he being advertised, how they were jealous of his actions, demanded leave to depart; which being denied, and seeing they resolved to Arrest him, he thought it his duty to prevent it, least any disgrace should reflect upon the King: In conclusion, after he had fancied what to say, the hopes of seeing Mandana again, did revive some joy in his soul; and after this, we travelled not a day wherein we did not discover some new satisfaction in the countenance of Artamenes: Every step he took towards Mandana was a fresh delight; and his own thoughts did so pleasantly entertain him, that he did not need either the company of Chrisantes or me, to divert him: Commonly he went either some thirty paces before, or thirty paces behind the rest of the company, that he might study out his thoughts with more freedom. One day then when we were not above five hundred furlongs from Themiscira, and because our journey was great, we were gone out before day did appear: After we had rode above an hour, we came into a Forest, when the Sun from the East did first gild the clouds: There was one of my Masters men, named Ortaliques, riding upon a white horse, and being the first which rode that the rest might follow him in the dark: Artamenes followed him; Chrisantes and my self with some others followed Artamenes: Marching in this order, and this approaching light beginning to pierce through the thick Forrest, permitting us to discern objects which were not far distant; my Master discovered upon his right hand, a great and rich Pavillion erected under some trees, and guarded by many Souldiers, and seemed as if they would forbid entrance unto any which should come there: This sight so extraordinary, begot a little curiosity in my Master: But his mind was taken up with the Idea of his Princesse, that it stopped his curiosity to ask what it was: when he was gone a little further, Page 75 he could not chuse but turn his head aside, and he saw through the boughs and trees a woman who lifting up the hanging of the Tent, seemed to look whether or no it were day. About ten or twelve paces further, he who went first and was called Ortaliques, being then some twenty paces from Artamenes, he saw a man in arms, who getting upon his horse which his Page did hold, came up to him, & asked him whether he was that Countryman? and whether he could tell him which way he should crosse the Forest, and never enter into the plains? No Sir, (answered Ortaliques) but perhaps those which come after me may better inform you; then Artamenes came up and asked him what this Cavalier did say? But whilst he was relating it, my Master saw a dozen horse-men coming, who after they had looked upon this stranger, cried out, Its he my companions, its he; send presently to inform our Captain: then one of them spur'd his horse, and rode in all haste to the place from whence they came: Mean while, the eleven which remained, fell upon this unknown Cavalier, who being retreated some certain paces, commanded his Page aloud, to go in all haste, and cause them to depart; for (said he, speaking of Artamenes and the rest, who seeing the inequality of the combate, had their swords drawn ready to defend him) this relief which the gods have have sent me, is sufficient to make my party good with them; after which I shall be with you. Indeed this stranger was not deceived; and the generosity of Artamenes not permitting him to see one single man in his presence, assaulted by eleven; never stood considering what he had to do, but as soon as he saw these Cavaliers assault a single man, drew his sword, and commanded us to do the like; so that advancing towards these blades, he gave time unto him whom they would have destroyed, to speak what I already told you unto his Page; Artamenes understood not what it was he said, although I did very distinctly hear it; as soon as he had given that order, this unknown Cavalier, came in to disingage my Master from his enemies, but he perceived that he had done it himself, by killing three of them with his own hands, and we, the rest of his company seconding his valour as well as it was possible for us; so that this unknown partner joyning with us, it was an easie matter to vanquish the remainder of our enemies, it being most certain, that he was as valiant as any man in the world; he fought then as a man that would testifie unto his liberator, he was not unworthy of that protection which was given him: But as the last of his enemies fell dead by the hand of Artamenes, and as he came unto him to render him thanks, the day being full light enough, he knew him (as we imagined afterwards;) so that immediately altering his design, he recoiled back & went towards Ortaliques, who was looking round about to spie whether there were any more enemies to fight withall; and being come near him, tell your master (said he in great haste) that I am very sorry to be so uncivil, and seem so ungrateful: But since my Destinies compel me to it, I hope he will excuse me. After he had spoken these words in great haste, he rode presently through the trees, and followed the same way which the Ladies and those which were with them took: Ortaliques told my Master what the stranger said: This passage, you may well suppose did much surprise Artamenes, since he could not imagine why he should so hastily send this complement by his man, and how pressing soever his occasions were, it would not have retarded him more to have spoke it unto himself, as well as unto his servants: he thought that in fighting he heard the tone of a voice which was not altogether unknown unto him, yet he could not recal who it should be: so that longing exceedingly to know more of this adventure, he went to look amongst the dead, if there were none amongst them which had been known unto him: and viewing them, he found one, who by reason of a great wound received in his right hand, and another in his throat which made him speechlesse, so that he was not to be understood by any thing but signs: this wounded Cavalier no sooner saw my Master, but as we might conjecture by his signs he knew him, although none of us could remember him, or ever saw him: and to say truth it was not strange at all, since it is very ordinary for thousands to know the General of an Army, whom he knows not again. This man, as soon as he saw my Master near him, seemed to be very joyful, and exceedingly desirous to make him understand the adventure; but the more he endeavoured to explain himself, the more he puzzled Artamenes, for he could not pronounce a word or a syllable, nor was there any way to draw any conjecture from him: Sometimes he would point towards that way which the unknown Cavalier had taken, as if he wished us to go after him: Sometimes he would point towards that place from whence they came, as if he expected some relief from thence: afterterwards, he would look about, and make us view that Pavillion, which the men belonging unto that unknown Cavalier had left, and carried away the Ladies which were in it: Page 76 In short, all his signs and actions did but augment the disquiet of Artamenes; who to see if he could find any thing in that Pavillion which might better inform him, lighted from his horse and went in; but though he could not meet with any thing which could add any thing unto his knowledge: yet notwithstanding he could not leave it: sometimes he was in a mind, though he knew not why, to go after him whom he had so opportunely reliev'd: otherimes he resolved to tarry there in hopes that some would come and give him better intelligence of the accident: and sometimes he would chide himself for losing so much time which was so pretious: what shall I do here (said he) and interest my self in other mens businesse, when I may be drawing neerer my Princesse? and as if he were asha|med of that fault, he went out of the Pavilion: got upon horsback and commanded one of his men to take up the wounded man behind him until he came unto the next house where he might be dressed, and from whence he might send to bury the dead, who by their Arms seemed to be Cappadocians; that which was most advantageous unto us upon this oc|casion was, that there was none of us wounded, except Chrisantes, who received a slight scratch in his left Arme. Artamenes remembering that there was one of these twelve Cavaliers, which turned back as if he went to fetch relief, would needs stay a while to see if any came, notwithstanding the counsell of Chrisantes to the contrary; for indeed he supposed if there came any men they would be numerous, and that Artamenes was not in a conditi|on to resist them, yet it was not that reason which hindred him from staying longer? But seeing that the wounded man was in much danger; and that his throat with striving to speak was so swelled that the man almost lost his senses, and fearing it might choak him, he marched in all hast unto the next house or town, as soon as he came there, he sent for a Chirurgion, to search the wound in his neck, and to try if there were any possibility to re|cover his voice. For three dayes together, this wounded man could not speak a syllable, nor was there yet any likelihood: Artamenes seeing that, commanded the Chirurgion to have a great care of him: he gave his Recompence before hand; and continued on his Journey: He did enquire of all those whom he met with in the house where we were, whether there were any men seen lately in armes: but wee found none, neither there, nor any where upon the Road, who could informe us any thing: Artamenes was so possessed with a pro|found musing that we marched all that day, and the next within six hours of night with|out pronouncing one syllable: But when we came to the banks of Thermodon, and within sight of Themiscira where the King told him he would stay till his returne, •oy did then a little move his heart, and turning himself towards me (who was next him) with a pleasant countenance, At the last, Feraulas (said he to me) I see the place where my Princess is, and by consequence, I hope to see her presently: But, O heavens, shall I find her the same I left her? shall I obtaine from the sincerity of her vertue, so much happinesse, as to hear her say she thought upon me in my absence? Sir, (said I to him) although the Princess do not tell it you, yet you may well believe it, for I am most certaine, it is impossible she should do otherwise: Indeed I had good reason for what I said; for a few dayes before we parted from Themiscyra, Martesia had so much goodness in her, as to trust me with all the advantageous thoughts which the Princess entertained concerning my Master: But she did so expresly forbid me to speak of it unto Artamenes, that I never durst reveal them; giving him only some hopes in generall of being beloved, without particularising any thing: And to tell you the truth, I saw him so grieved at his absence from the Princesse, that I made no question, but if he had known all these small circumstances which I have told you, he would not have died for grief: But in conclusion Sir after much such like discourse between my Master and me, in coming near Themiscyra; and after much rejoycing in hopes of seeing his Mandana, we came within a hundred paces of the gates, where we met one that was a servant unto the Princess: Artamenes no sooner saw him, but rode to|wards him in all hast, and asked him very earnestly concerning the King, and the Princess. Ah Sir, said the servant, would you had come four dayes sooner: At these words my Master began to look pale, and presently to convert his hopes into tears, and his joy into sorrow, he looked in the eyes of the servant, for the cause of his discours, but not being able to divine it; what (said he) is there any disasterous accident chanced unto the King or the Princesse? yes Sir, (replied the servant) and doubtless the greatest that could chance, for the King has lost the Princesse his Daughter; How, (replied my Master desperately confounded) is the Princesse dead? No Sir (answered he) but she is carried away; I do think it very happy Sir, that the minde of Artamenes was taken up with the worst resentment first: for indeed I am fully perswaded, if the thought of her Page 77 death had not instantly preceded his thought of her being taken away, he would have sunk down dead upon the place. How (cried he out) is Mandana taken away? Who is the man that durst attempt so rash and unjust designe? Philidaspes (answered the ser|vant) whom they say, was the Prince of Assyria: Philidaspes, replied Artamenes; Yes Sir, replied he, and the same misfortune would have it so, that a party which was sent af|ter her, were killed by some which rescued her, of which the King is assured• Ha my friends (cried out Artamenes in turning towards us) we need not question but that it was we, who have killed the protectors of Mandana; who have relieved her Ravisher, and who are accessory to her carrying away. Sir, said Chrisantes unto him, is it not better to go into the Town, where we may be better informed of all the circumstances in this great misfortune? Artamenes, notwithstanding his despair, finding Chrisantes speak reason, set forward; But heavens knows, how altered from what he was before, and what a prodigious change, sorrow made immediately in him; he had so sad and so terrible an aspect all at once, as one might easily see anger mingled with his melancholy; and that now jealousie was more in his heart then love. He pressed the Princesse servant, to tell him how the misfortune happened: He understood then, that three dayes before this accident, Aribeus moved the King to hunt some thirty furlongs from Themiscira, and during his abs|ence, the designe was executed; But, said my Master to him, how could they execute it? It was no difficult matter (replied Mandana's servant) for the Guards were corrupted, and it was they who carried her away: also, it is thought one of her women betrayed her, out of a secret jealousie she had, that the Princesse preferred Martesia before her: You know Sir, (added he) that the river Thermodon runs under the windows of the Princesse Mandana, and that those windows are so low, that there needs no stairs to descend them. Then Sir, one of the Guards observing the hour in which the Princesse was used to retire, went and knockt at the door of the outer Chamber, as she was ready to undresse her self; that woman which was of the conspiracy, opening the door, went and told the Princesse, there was one of the Guard, who had some important matter to acquaint her with. The Princesse wondering at it a little, did for all that command him to enter: Ma|dam, said he to her, I come to advertise you, that there is a designe in agitation, to carry you away this next night. The Princesse knowing that heretofore she heard of such a thing, was much astonished; yet notwithstanding after she had thanked the man, she asked him how he came to know it, and how it might be prevented? To give more credit unto my words (said he to her) you need onely to step unto the window, where I will shew you the bars half loose. This wise Princesse being desirous to be satisfied of the truth, went unto the window: That woman who was of the Plot, taking a candle to light her; But, Oh heavens, she was no sooner there but the Guard breaking out the bars of the window carried her away, for they were filed loose before hand. I leave you to judge how the Princesse was amazed at it: She commanded him to hold off; but much more was she astonished, when she saw six more of the Guards enter, and taking her by violence, com|mitted her into the hands of her Ravisher, who was in a Boat under the window with many armed men. Mandana at the first did obstinately resist him; but was forced to sub|mit: One of her women reported, that when she knew him to be Philidaspes by his voice (for he was disguised) she cried out: Ha Philidaspes, if Artamenes were here thou durst not attempt this: But in conclusion Sir, Philidaspes carried her away, and all her women cried lamentably out, but all in vain; for those of the Guard which were not of the Plot, desiring to enter, could not, for they which betrayed, barred the doors behind: The confusion was so great that these women belonging to the Princesse Mandana, cried out on every side, that they had taken away their Princesse, and did not open the doors unto those which could not enter but by breaking them. I forgot to tell you, that these Ravish|ers did also take away with them that woman which was of the conspiracy; but as for Martesia, they would not take her; but yet notwithstanding, this generous woman would not forsake her Mistresse, but held her so hard and fast by the clothes, that they were con|strained to take her also: although they doubtlesse heard the Princesse cry out; Ah Martesia do not forsake me: At the last Sir, the Boat going with the current of the River, went at such a•rate as they were quickly a furlong off on the other side of the water, where there was as many horses waiting for them as there was men, so that it was not pos|sible to be remedied; for before the Governour of Themisoira could be advertized of the accident, or could know what course to take, they were got so far as there was no hopes of recovery: Yet notwithstanding, the Captain of the Guard taking horse with two hund|red Page 78 men onely, divided them into severall Parties: One of them was the twelve which met Philidaspes, and knew him rather by the Arms he wore, then by his face; for having been so long concealed in the Country, he so changed his habit and countenance as he was not knowable: Those twelve men then knowing him, as I told you, and seeing a great Pavilion erected, wherein doubtlesse was the Princesse, and it being probable, he would pitch his Tent as soon as he was a good distance off, one of them returned in all hast to advertise their Captain, that he might speedily come and relieve his men, who since some strangers had took part with Philidaspes might be in danger to be defeated; but he was so unfortunate, that he could not meet with him. Desperate as not to finde him, he returned in full hast to the place where he left his companions engaged with Philidaspes, and with those men who accidentally met him in that place: But oh heavens, he found there ten of his companions dead, and found not the eleventh at all; he saw the Pavilion standing, but none in it, and he could not discover any signe that one of Philidaspes his men were killed: So Sir, this man came to acquaint the King, who came hither in all hast as soon as he heard of the accident. He hath sent unto all the Ports, to prevent the pas|sage of Philidaspes, in case he intend to take Sea: But to tell you truth, there is no great likelihood of catching him that way, since they have failed in their first discovery. More|over yesterday (added the servant) there run a Manifesto thoroughout Themiscira, by which it appears that Philidaspes, sayes he is Labinet, Son unto Queen Nitocris, and sole heir unto the Kingdom of Assyria. Moreover he sayes; THat Cappadocia by right belongs unto the Crown of Assyria, and therefore, he could not think of any milder way to conquer it, then by making Mandana Queen of Assy|ria; That the Law which forbids any stranger to marry the Princesse, ought not to be objected against him, since by right the Cappadocians are his subjects: That the reason why he did not ask the permission of Ciaxares, was because he certainly knew, that all the Medeans hating the Assyrians, both Astyages and Ciaxares would not consent he should marry the Princesse: That as he is not a stranger unto the Princesse of Cappadocia, no more is she a stranger unto him: So that he hopes the Queen Nitocris will approve of his designe, and relceive the Princesse Mandana with much joy. There are many other things in the Manifesto Sir (added he) which would be too ted|ious to rehearse. During all this discourse, Artamenes said not a word; not that he heark|ned unto it with any serenity of soul; but on the contrary, one might discover in his face such visible marks of turbulent passions, that he would make all that looked upon him to pity him: but the reason was, because he perceived that he could not speak without disco|vering too much excessive sorrow unto a man in whom he had no confidence, and therefore he thought it better to keep close the vastnesse of grief unto himself. Chrisantes easily observing his disquiet, went away in all hast as soon as the servant had ended his re|lation. Yet Artamenes, not knowing well how he should endure the sight of Ciaxares without too open a discovery of his despair, sent Chrisantes to see how the King did, to the end he might have more time to prepare himself for so difficult a transaction. My Ma|ster, seeing onely me with him, looked upon me in such lamentable manner as would have infused pity, into the hardest heart of stone. Feraulas (said he to me) Mandana is car|ried away, and carried away by Philidaspes; Philidaspes I say, who I could have killed sever|all times: But oh heavens (cried he out) is it possible the great Antipathy between him and me whilst I took him to be my Rival should ever let me mistake the Ravisher of Ma|ndana, and let my own arm assist my most mortall enemy? What; my most Divine Ma|ndana (said he all in fury) were you in that Pavilion which I saw? and was that unknown stranger, Philidaspes? Perhaps it was you I saw lift up the hanging of the Tent? have I both destroyed you and my self? have I slaine those which would have reliev'd you? Did I hinder them from killing Philidaspes? was I in a condition to deliver you, and did not? did I help him to carry you away? And could that Traitor Philidaspes who questionless knew me, accept of the assistance of his enemy? Alas, Mandana, are not you in Themiscira? are you in the power of Philidaspes? But oh heavens, was it not too much, you should do all this by violence, but I must contribute unto it? & must the injurious Philidaspes carry you away by the assistance of my hand, and my valour? But never think, Philidaspes (added he) quietly to enjoy such an Illustrious conquest; In what part of the earth soever thou art, it shall cost thee thy life. Yes, though thou shouldst be in Babylon, the greatest Page 79 and strongest City of the world, in the midst of all thy guards, sitting upon the throne of thy fathers, yet will I punish thee for this most injurious Act. Nothing but thy blood can wash it out of my memory, and nothing but thy death shall be the penalty of thy crime: oh heavens, (said he) unto what dire misfortunes am I destinied? Ha Thomiris, that your unjust passion should cost me so dear, and that I should be so rigorously punish|ed for troubling your tranquillity. But divine Princesse, said he; who was pleased, (as they assured me) to pronounce my name, when they took you away; will you remember me in Assyria? shall not the tears of Philidaspes charme you? will you not pardon his crime? will not the magnificence of Babylon blind your eyes? and that great court invite your mind? will you not praise the violence of Philidaspes, to be excesse of love? will you not be the same upon the Banks of Euphrates which you were wont to be upon the banks of Iris and Thermodon: oh divinst Princess shall not Artamenes be preferred before Philidaspes? and Cyrus before the King of Assyria? Alas, said he further, did the gods, the first minute that I saw Philidaspes move me to hate him, that I should serue him in such an unjust occasion as this? how was it possible my Rivall could so disguise, himself? I knew him when I ought not to have knowne him; and I did not know him at that critical time when it was most important for me to know it was Philidaspes, and who Philidaspes was. Imagine Feraulus (said he to me) how great would have been my joy, if the gods had permitted me to have known the truth; when after I had fought and vanquished Philidaspes, I should have gone unto the pavilion, where I should have found my Princess, and delivered her and brought her back unto Themiscira; But you may imagine how extreme is my sorrow and my despair, since it is I only who am the only cause of her loss; it is I who put her into the hands of Philidaspes; and am accessory to the taking her away, I might have lorned with those who assaulted him, but alas I assaulted them, I might have saved Mandana, but alas I have lost her; yet I must repair the loss if it be possible; or at the least be revenged of him who was the cause of it: Assist me, O ye most just Gods, with constancy enough to support this dismal accident and not die: I know that death is a remedy against all misfortunes, and that this remedy would cure me of all mine: But divine Mandana, you have at this time done that in me, which the most affrighting dangers never could: yes my Princess, that heart which never apprehended death amidst the most bloody battles, has now some fears of it under the heavy load of his discontents: I do fear, my Princess, I do indeed, but I think it is not a base and feeble fear, but since I fear not death for any cause but to expose my life to gain your liberty, doubtless you will pardon me: but alas who can tell, whether ever you shall speak again unto Artamenes, or Artamenes ever speak unto Mandana? how ever, (said he) I am sure I shall look Philidaspes in the face, though he be the King of Assyria, and it shall not be long before I disturb his felicity. As Artamenes was thus resenting his fate, Chrysantes returned, and told him that he might see the King; but since his return was divulged, more than half the Court was assembled about Ciaxares; which news not much pleased him, fearing nothing more than to have too many spectators of his sorrow: The sight of the Castle where he saw the Princess last, redoubled his sadness: the presence of the King, did so damp his soul and made his sorrows so apparent in the sight of all that great assembly, that though Ciaxares was much sadded, yet was he much more. This Prince no sooner saw my Master, but never remembering the business of his voyage, he reflected upon that loss, which he had. Alas Artamenes (said he to him) (Philidaspes has not been so happily discovered in his second enterprise, as he was in his first: The Gods have permitted him to force away my Daughter; I wish Sir, (replied my Master) that I could either by my valour or my good fortune, regain her; and that I could prevent the unjust Philidaspes from long enjoying that treasure which I might easily have taken from him: The King, not well understanding these words, desired the explanation of them; and Artamenes could not hold from relating that business, which most of any thing in the world did sensibly trouble him: he told the King how he had met with Philidaspes: and how he saw the pavilion set up in the Forrest: how he had killed them which assaulted the ravisher of Mandana: and how he had contributed to the carrying away of Mandana; This strange event did so much surprise the King, & augmented his sorrows in such a new manner as he could not heed Artamenes and his grief, which appeared exceeding much when he had ended his relation: But by good fortune; all they which saw him, did believe, that this excessive sorrow which so much appeared in his face and words, was only an effect of that odd, cross adventure which he had met withall. Inasmuch as all the Court were so sad Page 78 at the misfortune of the Princess, as that there was none so little interested in it, as could precisely observe his actions. After this fatal relation was ended, and every one spoke of it with wonder as well as woe, (Sir, said my Master, speaking to Ciaxares) will you permit me to go after and seek Philidaspes? I cannot call him the Prince of Assyria, since I can hardly believe that a son of the Queen Nitocris who is one of the greatest and wisest Princess of the world, should attempt so unjust a design: True it is, (added he) that it is also hardly to be believed, that any man who is not of a Royal extract, durst else undertake an enterprise so bold as to force away the Princess of Cappadocia. Ah Artamenes (said Ciaxares) the aversion which you ever had unto Philidaspes was better ground than you thought, and I doubt not but you will infinitely interest your self in this business: Doubt it not Sir, (replied my Master) for I promise you, either to deliver her, or die by the hand of her Ravisher. After this, the King went into his Closet, and called Artamenes after him; to the end he might ask him, whether it was true that he came back without any traine or equipage, as he had been told. Artamenes then told him, what I have told you: But since the Kings soul was so sadded with the loss of the Princess, he cared not much for the bad success of his voyage, and having such need of my Masters valour, in such a dire conjuncture of affairs; he never examined, whether what he had said unto him were likely or no. Artamenes urged him againe to give him leave to follow Philidaspes, though there was small hopes of finding him: And since it might so hap that the Princess might fall sick by the way, and retard his march, Ciaxares consented unto his desire: and gave order for three hundred horse to follow him, the next morning my Master asked the King if any thing of the conspiracy were discovered; and whether he suspected any as assistants unto Philidaspes: but the King told him, that Aribeus had used all possible means to enquire into the business, yet unto this hour could never have any conjecture: my Master had a great desire to tell the King, that Aribeus was not a fit man to be employed in that inquisition, by reason of the great friendship between him and Philidaspes; but he stayed until his jealousies were grounded upon better bottomes than surmises, and until he had more plain and convincing arguments against him. Then he left the King, and without the closing of an eye all that night, waited impatiently for break of day. Mean while Sir not to hold you with relation of all the agitations of his restless mind, and the weariness this last voyage had caused in him, give me leave only to tell you, that in fifteen dayes which were employed in quest of the Princess, we met with nonewes that could afford any hopes unto my Master: but on the contrary, we were advertized, how after many cross and blind wayes which they took, purposely to deceive followers, Philidaspes was arrived with the Princess at a town within his own kingdom, which is towards the frontiers of Medea, & in such a place where he might raise an army too considerable for us to attempt the rescue of the Princess: we learned also for certain, that Philidaspes was really son unto the Queen Nitocris, & so we returned againe unto Themiscira, without effecting any thing, but knowing that Mandana was in the hands of such a Prince, as might, (if the Queen his mother would consent) bring an Army of two hundred thousand men into the field. The thought of this, though it dejected the spirits of all others, yet did it elevate the soul of Artamenes in lieu of driving it into despair, and the quality of his Rivall, did in some sort, comfort him in his disgrace. All the rest which before went after the Ravisher of Mandana, did fruitlessly returne: they only told us, that the wounded man whom we left by the way, did recover of his wounds. Mean while Aribeus, (who as you shall know by the sequel of my discourse) was not innocent from this conspiracy, conceiving that though perhaps my Master would not find Philidaspes, yet he might perchance meet with some of the guards which he had corrupted and suborned, did pretend a journey unto Pteria whereof he was the governour, under colour that some ancient Greek inhabitants of Sinope, did attempt something against the service of the King: for Sir, I think you know how this Town was built by the Milesiens, and how that Grecian Colony has often changed masters. Indeed it would be a difficult thing to define exactly, which is true Sinope, it is so filled with inhabitants of several nations; having been one while possessed by the Graecians another by the Galatians; Sometime againe by the Paphlagonians, and at this day by the King of Cappadocia. Aribeus therefore raised this false seditious report, that under pretence of it, he might be gone from Themiscyra, before Artamenes returned, and so came unto Sinope as I said before: So that my Master being rid of him, was in absolute and quiet possession of the Kings mind: But as the state of things stood, there was nothing to be thought upon but war. Ciaxares sent first to the Page 81 Queen Nitocris to ask her whether she allowed of her sons Act; and to demand the Princess his daughter: he sent also unto Astyages to acquaint him with the misfortune, and require aide, mean while, he levied as many souldiers as ever both these two Kings were able to set out: though those orders which he sent unto Aribeus, to raise men in his government, was invalid unto him, for that Traytor had disposed them for other designs. He made a shew as if he would execute the Kings commands; and feigning to be sick would not come at Themiscyra. Mean while, we understood by the return of him who was sent unto Queen Nitocris, that she disclaimed the action, of the Assyrian Prince; and that he was not yet come unto Babylon: at the same time, those who were left among the Massagets returned, and told us how Gelonida saved them, about fifteen dayes after our departure: they brought a Letter from that virtuous woman unto Artamenes; by which she said in general, that his absence caused abundance of trouble in the Court of Thomiris: That she had much ado to obtaine pardon for his men; yet at last she told her nothing but the returne of Artamenes could give her satisfaction: and that he must either repent, or else she dye, and revenge herself that way: yet we had no sooner rejoiced at the returne of our men, but we understood that Astyages falling sick upon the news of the Princess being taken away by the Prince of Assyria; was so excessively moved at it, in consideration of the King his sons interest, and in consideration of his hatred unto the Assyrians, that a Fever seised upon him and he died within four dayes: declaring by his will that all his subjects should take up Arms for the liberty of the Princess Mandana. The news of his death almost moved my master to tell Ciaxares whom he was: but when he remembered all the expressions which he used, when Cyrus was discoursed on, his fears to be deprived of that honour to deliver his Princess prevented him: for said he, if by chance he should not change his thoughts, who knows whether or no he will banish me? and whether in lieu of delivering my Princess, I procure my own death? perhaps he will presently log me with fetters, and so this Army which ought to be employed for Mandana's liberty, will be disabled. Mean while Ciaxares must prepare himself to take possession of Medea's throne, and go to Ecbatan, but before his arrival, he caused troops to be raised, because he would lose no time. The Cappadocians were much troubled to see themselves both with a King, and without a Queen at once, especially since their Princess was in the Assyrian Power, foreseeing that if they should returne under their government, then their kingdom would be no more than a Province; yet this feare was not universall, for there were many which still retained a secret affection unto the Assyrian nation. Aribeus, as every one thought, was of that mind, even at that very time when he was so loved by Ciaxares; some also said that the original of his house was extracted from Assyria. How ever it was, when the King was ready, not yet suspecting any treason in Aribeus, he commanded him to come unto him, intending to declare him Regent of the Realme: but he not daring to trust him, and fearing lest this seeming honour, was but a trap to secure him: he sent word back unto Ciaxares that he was sick; and if he were pleased to honour him with the government of the Cappadocians, he beseeched him to send such orders unto him: yet the King being informed that Aribeus was not so sick as he fained, began to be Jealous of him, and committed all the authority unto a man of great quality, called Ariobantes, which so incensed Aribeus, as he resolved to act as afterwards he did. Artamenes sent Ortaques unto Artaxes brother of Aribeus, to command him in the name of Ciaxares, to continue in the King of Pontus his service: Ciaxares went then to Ecbatan, and my Master accompanied him. The King of Persia at the same time sent an Embassador to the King of Medes (for henceforward we will call Ciaxares so) to condole with him the death of Astyages, and the taking away of his daughter the Princess Mandana; and also within a few dayes after, he sent another, to congratulate his happy coming unto that Crown, and to offer him assistance in his wars against the Prince of Assyria: Now Sir, was Chrysantes very much entangled; yet he feared not that my Master would be known, for questionless he was very much altered as well as I, who was almost of the same age, yet he was sure that himself being much elder then we would be discovered, so that against his will, he resolved to tell a handsome Lie: he told then the Persian Embassadors in equivocall termes, that he being in utter despair ever to bring into Persia that Prince whom he carried out, he resolved to wander from Court to Court, and from Countrey to Countrey: he further told them, that in a voyage unto Greece, there he met with Artamenes, and has indissolvably tyed himself unto his fortunes: Aduisus whom you see here, and was then one of the Embassadors, moved him to relate all the particulars Page 82 in the shipwrack of Cyrus, and to tell him whether his body was ever found: but Chrysantes demeaned himself very handsomly in the discourse, telling him, that they which escaped from the shipwrack never knew what became of them which perished: Moreover, he beseeched both him and the other Embassadour, not to tell Ciaxares that ever he had the honour to be with young Cyrus, lest the hatred which he bore unto that unfortunate young Prince should reflect upon him: Chrysantes also asked him, whether the losse of Cyrus did not extraordinarily perplex the King and the Queen of Persia? Aduisus did answer him, that they had been much troubled at it, and still were; but as they were both of them very wise, so they knew how to qualify their sorrows; and could not chuse but assist that Prince which rejoiced at their losse: This they will do, both out of Generosity, and Policy, since upon the whole matter, Ciaxares was not blameable for what he did: for the resentments of Astyages, the predictions of the Magi, whom the Medaeans much reverence, and the Manies of the stars did induce him thereunto. But presently after Sir, we were informed that the Queen Nitocris was dead, and that the Prince her Son was come unto Babylon, and brought the Princess Mandana thither in triumph. This intelligence did much trouble Artamenes, for as long as she lived, it had been much more easie for him to deliver the Princess then now, it being to be supposed, that virtuous Queen would never protect any injustice, though committed by her own Son; But seeing that he could not rescue Mandana, until he had taken the prime Town in the World, and subverted all Asia, this did infinitely perplex him: not that the greatness of the enterprise did at all astonish him, but because he apprehended that it would take a long time to execute so great a designe and would move the King of Assyria to take some violent resolutions against the Princess. Mean while Ciaxares having accepted the King of Persias offer; Aduisus returned in all haste to inform the King his Master, and all sides thought upon nothing but preparations for War: The King of Assyria, who was not ignorant of the Mede'n preparations, began to act his part. Mazares the Prince of Saces, who as you know was his vassall, and who then was in Babylon, promised him his assistance: And you are not ignorant Sir, how the King of Arabia, did as you did, that is, he took part with the King of Assyria: Also it is rather unto the generous Thrasibulus, whom I now speak unto, then unto this Illustrious company, since there is none of them, onely he, which is ignorant of what I shall hereafter tell you.

Then the King of Hircania interrupting Feraulas, told him, that it was true indeed, it was onely unto Thrasibulus unto whom he was to addresse his speech: yet notwithstanding, although he did know a good part of what he had to relate, yet he should be very glad to have it revived in his memory: Thrasibulus thanked the King of Hircania for it, and Feraulas continued his discourse as followeth.

The King of Assyria then preparing for warre as well as we, was not onely assured of help from the King of Lydia, from the King of Hircania, and from the King of Arabia, but also from the Prince of Saces, from the Prince of the Paphlagonians, and from the Indians. As for the King of Phrygia, he was also pressingly solicited, to take the King of Assyria's part, following the Treaty of Peace which was made with the Queen Nitocris. But since he had warrs with Croessus, and that this Prince was to assist the King of Assyria as well as he, he told this Ravisher of Mandana, that he was willing to assist him, provided his Troops might not mingle with the Lydians his enemies, which was promised him, but which was not performed. This Prince had a good minde not to engage himself on the King of Assyria's side: But having not ratified that Treaty of Peace which was confirmed between the King of Pontus, and Cixares, he resolved upon that which he could not help. As for the King of Pontus, he was not in a condition to take either part, for he was embroyed with Civil warrs in his own Kingdom, which did extremely presse, and which doubtlesse would have destroyed him, if they have not already done it. Observe Sir, how many Kings and how many Princes had engaged themselves on the unjust side: Moreover, Aribeus seeing the King of Assyria in possession of the Throne of his father, did declare and publish thorowout all the Province of which he was Governour, that the Princesse consented to go with the King of Assyria: He leaved Troops; called back Arttaxes his brother, who was sent to help the King of Pontus, notwithstanding the King's last Orders, and perhaps conduced to the destruction of that Prince thereby. Having then got a considerable Body together, he sent it unto Babylon: Moreover, the King of Assyria dispatched an Embassadour unto Croessus, as I have told you, to sollicite him, that he would joyn with his Army: Representing unto him, that the Persians and Medean•Page 83 were two such Nations, as if they were joyned together, they might well aspire unto the Universal Dominion of all Asia: Moreover, he urged, that there was ever an Alliance between the Kings of Lydia and the Kings of Assyria; so that in demanding Assistance upon this occasion, which concerned the common good, though in appearance it seemed onely for the taking away of the Princesse Mandana, he ought not to be denied: Moreover yet, the consideration of Consanguinity ought to be no impediment in the businesse; since if he made warre against Cixares, he did it in behalf of Mandana, and that he would never have taken her away, but with intentions to put the Crown of Assyria upon her head. Indeed all the world knows that Croessus was perswaded by him: So that his Enemy had on his side, the Saces, the Hircanians, the Arabians, the higher, and lower Phrygians, the Indians, part of the Cappadocians, the Lydians, the Paphlagonians, the Serians, and the Assyrians: we understood how he endeavoured to engage the Carians in his Quarrell, but they refused: Mean while the King of Persia, being strongly solicited by the Queen his wife, sister unto Cixares, made choice of two hundred Homotimes (these are the noblest Persons of all Persia) unto every one of these two hundred men, he gave leave to chuse four others of the same Quality; so that that by this means they made up a thousand men; afterwards he appointed every one of this thousand to leavie amongst the people, ten men with Bucklers, ten Archers, and ten Slingers, so that this compleated the number of thirty thousand men besides the Homotimes. This thirty thousand choice men were better then fifty thousand others: Hidaspes whom you see there, had the Command of this Potent Aid, and Adusias was his Lieutenant General. Cixares you may well imagine, received them with much joy, and Artamenes was so sensible of it, that I know not how to expresse his extasie: Mean time, he ever was sending out for Intelligence, and was credibly informed, that Croessus brought in ten thousand horse, and forty thousand Foot, Bucklers, and Archers: That the King of Phrygia had six thousand Horse, and twenty thousand Pikes, and Bucklers: That Aribeus sent out of Cappadocia four thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot: That Maragdus, King of Arabia, pretended to have five thousand Horse, ten thousand Foot, and a hundred Armed Chariots: The Hircanians were to have also a hundred Chariots, and four thousand Slingers: The Cadusians eight thousand Foot: The Indians as many: Also the Paphlagonians: Besides all these, the King of Assyria had twenty thousand Horse, and forty thousand Foot. All these compleated up the number to be forty five thousand Horse, and neer a hundred and fifty thousand Infantry, besides the Chariots. On ourside, we had ten thousand Horse, and fifty thousand Foot, all naturall Subjects of Cixares, besides the Auxiliaries from the Provinces of the Arisantines, of the Struchaltes, and others, all which mounted unto ten thousand Horse, and fifteen thousand Foot. So that when all were joyned together, with the thirty thousand Persians, the thousand Homotimes, and five thousand Horse, and ten thousand Foot for that part of Cappadocia which was not Revolted, we found that our Army was in a Gallant condition; though it was not so numerous as the King of Assyria's, since it consisted onely of five and twenty thousand Horse, and one hundred thousand Foot, without any Armed Chariots: and though it was very advantageous to have thirty thousand Persian Infantry, and ten thousand Medean Cavalry, yet the number was much inferiour: But my Master seemed not to be at all astonished at the inequality, nor at the great number of Kings against whom he was to fight: But on the contrary, assuming fresh courage, in so important an occasion, which might render him so Glorious, although the captivity of the Princesse did infinitely trouble him, yet notwithstanding, hope to relieve her, or else die for her, caused him to become master of his melancholie. And though he was not yet known amongst the Medes, yet his Reputation, his Gallant deportment, his sweetnesse, his Courtesie, and Liberality, had procured him already a great credit amongst them, so that he was absolutely adored. It was at this time, when he took a love unto Araspes, and when Aglatidas took a love to him: but I had forgot to tell you, that Harpagus, who had all this while stayed in Persia, since the departure of Cyrus from thence, being desirous to return into his Country, made use of this occasion, after the death of Astyages, who had banished him, and came into Medea with Hidaspes, who by the Comendum of the Queen of Persia, made his peace with Cixares, although he knew Cyrus no more then the Persians did. In conclusion, to abbreviate my relation, which otherwise would be too unpleasant unto so many Illustrious persons, who were eye witnesses of what I am to tell; The Army of Cixares began to march, Artamenes being his Lieutenant General, and commanding the Vanguard. When we were ready to enter the enemies Page 84 Countrey, Artamenes saw upon his right hand a great Eagle, which flying with impetuous hast, seemed to make towards Babylon, as if she would shew him the way he was to follow. The flight of this Bird was looked upon as a fortunate Omen; and Cixares making a halt, offered sacrifices, not onely unto the Gods of the Medes and Persians, but also unto the Assyrian Deities, desiring them to be propitious unto him. I will not stand to tell you how this great Army marched, nor how prudently Artamenes ordered this vast Body; I will onely relate how impatient my Master was to be taking prisoners, that he might enquire some news of Mandana. And seeing that some of the enemies Scouts appeared, he offered to go unto them, but they took their heels, and would not fight; so that he bethought himself of a stratagem, which was this; he caused in the night time, a great number of fires to be made, behinde the place where our Army encamped, and none in the place where we were: So that these Scouts coming in the night to spie, or take some of our men, they were extremely amazed when they found us neer them, whom by the fires they thought further off. Some prisoners then being taken, we knew by them that the King of Assyria would within a few dayes leave the Princesse at Babylon, under the guard of Marsares, and that he would ere long be in the Head of his Army, accompanied with the Kings of Hircania, Lydia, Phrygia, and Arabia: But as impatient as Artamenes was to be doing with the King of Assyria, whom we will now no longer call Philidaspes, he could not be at him so soon as he thought: For he found, that they who had diverse times fled before him, went back over the River Gindes, which descending from the Mantian Mountains, passes thorow the Countrey of the Dardinians, and dischargeth it self into the River Tygris, and so empties it self into the Red-Sea. Then Sir, this River is so violent a Current, and the Assyrian Troops having broken the Bridge, that it stopped him: Artamenes coming to the River side, beyond which he saw men in Arms, was even desperate to see it was impossible to get over: he could not be perswaded of the danger, untill he had found it by such experience, as might have proved fatall unto him: For being exasperated by the fury of his soul, and the violence of his love, he spurred his horse into the midst of the River, where the rapid furie of the water had like to have engulfed him: but being come back, by good fortune unto the side again, there was one of those white horses, such as amongst us are used to be sacrificed unto the Sun, who of himself leaping furiously into the River to passe over, was presently whirled into the bottom of the River and never seen again: So that Artamenes not knowing what course to take for a passage, bethought himself of a strange extraordinary way, which was to divide the River by channels. In conclusion, he propounded this devise, and put it in execution: He took such monstrous pains for eight dayes together, that all Ages may here|after speak of it for a wonder: For amuzing the enemy alwayes by his presence, on the side of the River, he caused a great Rampire of earth to be east up, to blinde the Assyrians from sight of the Pioners, that they might not see what they did, and having digged a hundred and sixty Channels, which took their beginnings from the River, he made so many little Rivolets out of that great one, by dilating it into so many several Channels, and passed over without any trouble with his whole Army. This prodigie did so amaze the Assyrian Troops on the other side the water, that they would abide no combate, but halsted in disorder unto the Body of their Army; thinking that none but Gods could turn the course of that River; and concluding afterwards that nothing was impossible unto Artamenes. Indeed I am fully perswaded, that there are few things which can resist the Courage of such a man as he, whom Love had inspired with a most Heroick heat. As soon as Artamenes was got on the other side the River, he was infinitely joyed; Imagining that since there was no more to do but to fight, and then enter into Babylon, nothing could debar his entrance. We marched then straight unto the Enemy, who with all dililgence was marching towards us: We were yet two dayes march from them, when we saw an old man of a handsome and comely deportment coming towards us, and followed by three hundred horse, desired to speak with Artamenes, and having in few words told the just cause of his complaints against the King of Assyria, said he was come to ask Protection from Cixares, and offer unto him all the strength he had. Indeed Gobrias who was at this present in Sinope, offered unto Artamenes to put his estate into his power, as indeed a few dayes after, he did: And the Princesse Arpasea his daughter, who is one of the fairest Ladies in the World, did receive Artamenes most magnificently into a place of strength, which belonged unto him, and which she did by his command, and whom Artamenes left in possession of it. But Sir, I must not dwell upon this, though there be many Page 85 brave things dependant upon it: It was at this time, the wise Gobrias engaged Gadates unto Cixares his party; yet not to stay upon any thing which does not directly relate unto Artamenes, I will only tell you, how the King of Assyria hath given just cause unto the valiant King of Hircania, and to the Prince of the Caducians, to quit his party; these two Princes came and ranked themselves on Cixares his side, or rather on Artamenes, since certainly the reputation of my Master was the most convincing reason which obliged these two great Princes to trust his word: I will not stay to tell you how the King of Cyprus sent also some Troops unto him, under the command of Thimocrates and Philolces: But let me tell you, that the two Armies being now in view of each other, and the day of battle being come; Artamenes was busie in ordering his Troops into such a posture as they might vanquish: He commended them, and commanded them with such an imperious and obliging air, as there was not a Souldier in all the Army, which was not eager to obey him. When these two mighty Armies were come out of their Trenches; and that the armed Chariots, the Archers, the Slingers, the Launciers and Pikes, and those which used swords on both sides were ranged into battalia, Artamenes in lieu of a long Oration, said nothing but this unto them.

Which is he amongst you, my fellow Souldiers, who will be before me? who will kill the first enemy? which of you is it, whose valour will exceed Artamenes? Come on, my companions (said he to them) I do protest that I should not be less joyed to see you surmount me in valour, then if I had overcome the Assyrians.

These few words pronounced by such a man as Artamenes, had so excellent an operation in the hearts of the fouldiers, and wrought such great effects, that their voice made the Air ring such a peal, as resembled a song of victory and triumph: Cixares by the advice of Artamenes, would have the word of Battle that day to be Jupiter our Protector; so that the combate beginning, the noise of both sides was hideous, what by the confusion of cries, the clashing of Armes and Arrows, and the neighing of horses, then which nothing is more astonishing. But Sirs, all you (except Thrasibulus) do know it, therefore without particularizing this dayes great businesse, I will only tell you that Artamenes, seeking out the King of Assyria with much diligence, at last found him, being informed by one who was taken prisoner, in what quarter he would fight, and meeting with him in the throng; Let us see (said he to him) let us see, whether the King of Assyria be more valiant then Philidaspes, and whether I can now take away his life as easily, as I did pre|serve it in the Forest where I met him? That Prince hearing these words, turned fiercely towards him, and knowing my Master by his voice, Artamenes (said he to him) the King of Assyria perhaps is not more valiant then Philidaspes, but he is more civil, since though he be now a King, he will not refuse measuring his sword with you, who passe but for a common Cavalier, and no more: Advance then (said my Master to him, when he saw him studying what to do) and be assured that the Ravisher of Mandana is more disho|noured in taking her away, then he is in fighting with Artamenes: I ought not to fight with you (answered that Prince) since I owe my life unto you: but what shall I do? there is a secret thought in me, which moves me to hate you, and is more prevalent then my generosity: after those words they came together and fought: The sword of Artamenes was died with the blood of that Prince; and if the throng and confusion of the general combate had not separated them, I believe the death of the King of Assyria had put an end to the war. But at the last a report being divulged among all the Troops, that he was either dead or a prisoner, it made so great a disorder, as the like was never seen: Some fought, others fled; The Kings Allies thinking the King of Assyria to be dead, retired: Craessus caused all his men to be drawn off and be gone, and taking the mountainous way, saved the rest of his Troops from the general Rout. The King of Phrygia, who had cause of discontent given unto him, because one part of his men were ranked in the same body with the King of Lydias contrary to what was promised; and he being ever in love with the glory of Artamenes, did retire, and entrenched himself in an advantagious place, and waited the successe of our victory. The Prince of Paphlagonia, was taken prisoner, and almost all the considerable persons in the Assyrian Army, either perished or changed sides. The truth is Sir, (said Feraulas, always addressing his discourse unto Thrasibulas) it may Page 86 very well be said, that the gods did fight for Artamenes: for it is most certain, that there never was seen so many great Princes altogether which did so weakly dispute the victory; not but that there was great difficulty in obtaining it, because though they did not fight it well, yet their inequality of number, made it no easie matter. Certainly, and without flattering the Persians, the Homotimes did miracles that day; also the Medean Cavalry as well as the Hircanian wrought wonderful effects. Yet in this great disorder, the King o|f Assyria, who in all other adventures would rather perhaps have been killed, then given ground, did now retire; when he saw that there was no hopes of victory, and that Maragdus King of Arabia was killed close by him: Fearing without doubt, that if the noise of the defeat should come unto Babylon before his return, there might rise some such disorder as might let the Princesse escape: This sudden retreat which he made, did certainly confirm the report of his death. The Cappadocian Troops, fearing to be under the power of Ciaxares, as a master which was justly incensed, joynd unto that party of the Assyrians which were the King of Assyria's Convoy: And I do very well remember, that my Master seeing these Cappadocians fly, pursued, and cried unto them, Why do you fly with them that are vanquished? Is it not better to stay and triumph with Conquerors? But his words were in vain; for shame and fear stifled their repentance. To relate unto you the number of the dead; the abundance of prisoners; the vast multitude of Arms and Horses; the great number of Chariots and Tents, and the infinite rich Plunder would not be much to the purpose: But let me tell you, that Artamenes moved Ciaxares to give all the Plunder of the field to the Souldiers; and for his own part he reserved no more then the liberty to divide and bestow it, more or lesse according to the deserts of the Cal|ptains: None of the Homotimes or Persians would load themselves with any of it; but he would have the chief of them which were accustomed to fight on foot, to take the best of the enemies Horses; so that he made the first Persian Cavalry which ever was seen in Asia, But although this defeat of so many Kings, and the friendship which he had contracted with so many Princes, who in respect of him had taken the King of Medea's part, might well have satisfied him, yet the King of Assyria being neither dead nor a prisoner, and the Princesse being still in Babylon, all seemed unto him as if he had done nothing; So that he was not long at rest, but two dayes after the Battle, marched towards Babylon. In going thither, we understood that the King of Lydia was absolutely retired; and that the King of Phrygia, though discontented with the Assyrian, yet waited as I told you, to see the successe of things. But my Master desiring to remove such a puissant reserve from his enemy, he set out a considerable body of Horse under the command of Hidaspes, to go and fight him; and indeed the design did thrive so happily under Hidaspes, that after several skirmishes, they enforced the King of Phrygia's Trenches, and took him prisoner: But since Artamenes had been obliged unto him, during the Bithynian wars, he moved Ciaxares to use him very well: he left unto him the Command of those his Troops which remained after his defeat, upon condition they should not be employed against him, at the siege of Babylon: for, said he, the King of Phrygia will never fight against that Prince whom he came to aid: Artamenes sent him with as many Medean Troops only to secure a passe, which was equally advantagious unto the King of Phrygia, if he would return, and to Ciaxares from being set upon from that side; He also gave liberty unto the Prince of Paphlagonia, who afterwards did not forsake him. At the last Sir, we came within sight of stately Babylon; and although my Master found it very strong when he was there, yet he found it much stronger this second time, as well because he now observed it better, as because the King of Assyria had now a greater interest in it. As soon as he espied the magnificent Pallace which elevates it self in the midst of Babylon: There it is Feraulas (said he to me) whither we must go and deliver Mandana: He did presently begint the Town round about with his Troops, to stop the passages of any out, and to discover in what place and part it best was assaultable: But to say truly, we found the wals so high, so thick and so strong, that our Battering Rams could work no execution; also the huge deep ditches full of water hindered our approaches to make any use of our Engines: Moreover, it seemed absolutely impossible to assault it from the River, by reason of that prodigious work which Queen Nitocris had made, whereby the River Euphrates was brought almost round the Town; as well to dilate the impetuosity of the River, as to make the accessse unto the Town more difficult; for the River by that means winding and crinkling as it did, it was impossible that they in the Town should be surprized by Boats, these turnings being so long, that it would be a long dayes work to come by them into Babylon, from the place Page 87 where they must begin. I will not insist upon exact relation of this Siege, or the prodigious pains which was taken in circling about so vast a Town; nor how many Towers Artamenes built up, from distance to distance answerable; as well to secure his entrenchments, and fortifie his Lines, as to discover what the enemies did within their wals; nor how these Towers were placed upon wooden piles of Palme, of a most prodigious height; nor all the ensignes which he prepared for this siege: nor will I tell you, how the valour of Mazares did appear in divers sallies which the besieged made, nor how my Master repulsed them: But I must tell you in few words, that all their attempts and all they could do against so great a Town were all ineffectuall, and vaine, Artamenes despairing of gaining it, seeing that winter drew on, and that sooner then ordinary, the fields were covered with Snow, he knew not what to resolve upon: For although there were an infinite number of men within the town, yet were they virtualled for a long time, so that he had no hopes to take it either by force or famine, unless he should tarry so long a time, as the thought of it did affright him: at last he bethought himself of a way which yielded him some hopes of successe: he did not think the River Euphrates could resist him; more then the river Gindes, so that with the consent and approbation of the King, he caused two great tren|ches to be made, which joynd to the River, and took the water from the River above the town and let it into the Channel againe beneath: but before he had finished these trenches, or given passage for the water into them, he placed twenty thousand men neer the passage where the River runs into the Town, himself being in the head of them, & sent as many unto that place where the River issues out of the Town: things being thus ordered, he gave the signal to open the trenches a little before night: so that in less then two howrs, this River being made foordable; he marched himself the first up to the knees in walter (in spite of the coldness of the weather, & horse being unfit for takings towns) & did so encourage the rest by his example, that all which had order for it, followed, & thus they did most Couragiously, & with fierce impetuosity enter into proud Babylon. The assault <◇> made at both ends of the towne in an instant, Hidaspes not being less diligent then Art|menes My Master, to make sure work, went presently unto the palace, where as we were in|formed by prisoners (we took) the Princess used to lodge, and took with him the Prince Gadates, and one of the officers of Gobrias, to conduct him thither: I will not relate unto you, the amazement of the inhabitants; the hideous disorder of the night: the Combats which he was forced unto in some streets; and the facilities he met with in others, nor how a great sedition which was in the town did help forward their destruct|ion; nor will I speak of the confused echo of the noise, the desolation of the women, and the generall astonishment of the people: But I will tell you how Artamenes thought upon nothing but Mandana, and went in all hast unto the Palace: At first the guards made some resistance, but as soon as one of them Cried out, that the King was escaped, they left the gates; threw down their Armes; and left Artamenes master of the place: But Oh heavens it was in vaine to look for Mandana, for he could not finde either the King or the Princess, nor could meet with any which could informe what was become of them. As for Hidaspes, according to orders from Artamenes, he secured all the publique places, and placed Courts of guard in severall streets, and kept in armes all the night, so that at break of day, more then half the army of Ciaxares was got into the town: and Artamenes was absolute master of Babylon, excepting two Castles which rendred themselves the next day: But neither in the Kings Palace; nor in the Castles nor in the Temples nor in any of the houses, (for Artamenes caused all to be searched) could the King of Assyria or Man|dana be found: only one of the Assyrian women which they had placed about the Prin|cess, and who followed not: which said, that at the beginning of the night being accom|panied with many of his men, came into her Chamber and took her and her two Cappadocian women away with him, and went down a paire of stairs which leads into the Gar|den, but whither they went afterwards, she could not tell. To represent unto you my Masters despaire is a thing impossible: why does the gods, (said he) loade me thus with insupportable misfortunes? why will they not permit me to deliver my Princess, and punish my Rivall? Ha Feraulas, I seen is impossible. It was very happy that Ciaxares, and so many Grandees accompanied him and gave out necessary orders, to calme this huge Town; for as for my Master, Mandana was the only thought that he could enter|taine. A whole month passed, without any intelligence either of the King of Assyria or the Princess, during which time he suffered as much torment as man could do; Alas, said he sometimes unto me, what am I better for winning Battles; taking of townes, or sub|verting Page 88 of Kingdomes, if I can neither relieve my Princess nor punish my Rivall? If it were not my own hand, that put her into the power of her Ravisher, I should be less troubled; but since it was by my own valour that the King of Assyria carried her away; and that same valour cannot make me kill him, this is a thing which is a bove my patience: For to save the life of her enemy, when he was set upon by eleven Cavaliers, and not to be able to take it from him, at that time when so many others as valiant as himself felt the weight of my blowes; This is it Feraulas, that the Gods are resolved upon my destruct|ion, and that I must prepare my self for it. I forgot to tell you Sir, that we found in Babylon a great number of Ladies, of very great quality, who having been used with much respect (for Artamenes before he entered the Town did give express command that none should offer any violence unto any women) came to give him thanks, and assured him that the Princesse Mandana, would thanke him also, for the Civility which they had rel|ceived from him. At the very name of Mandana, my Master did double his civilities to|wards them: and he received this satisfaction however, to heare Mandana well spoken of as well in Babylon as Themiscyra; it being most certain that this Princess had caused her self to be adored amongst them. Artamenes understood by these Ladies that his Rivall did treat her with abundance of respect, at least in their sight. But they told my Master, that since the beginning of the siege, none were permitted to come neer the Prin|cess; nor any Lady to come within the palace: I will not tell you Sir, the severall re|flections which my Master made upon all these things, for it would too much lengthen my story; only this, that sometimes, he knew not well whether he should grieve more to understand that his Rivall was more rigorous unto her, since the siege of Babylon, then to use her as he did before. To speak truth, I do believe, that what these Ladies had said unto him, as thinking to tell good newes, did not much please him, so much did Jealousie disturb his reason, & so difficult a thing it is to prevent that humour from possessing those that are most reasonable. But Sir, at the last there was such great care taken to be informed concerning the King of Assyria, that they had intelligence he was retreated unto Pteria, whereof Aribeus was governor: thta Mazares, conducted him thither, and that Aribeus his old friend, had received him into the town; and that the Princess was very strictly guarded in that place; yet we neither could know then, nor at this day how they could get out of Babylon: This newes did at first afford much Joy unto Artamenes; who moved Ciaxares, to disencamp his Army which lay in and about this stately town; and after he had left a strong garrison in it, and given all requisite orders for keeping it, we marched with all speed towards Pteria; and although this march was very long, yet such was the prudent provision of Artamenes, as our Troopes wanted nothing nor were they worse for it: But Sir, when we came within three dayes march of this town: that Joy which my Master had to know where his Princess and his Rivall were, was much lessened: for we had Intelligence that the King of Assyria the Prince Mazares, and Aribeus, had con|veyed away the Princess and themselves to Sinope: when Artamenes considered how that town was seated upon the sea, and without a navall Army it was impossible to besiege it, his sorrowes were mightily multiplied; For indeed Ciaxares had no ships, neither could he get them so soone as to be serviceable, and yet was all in faine to beleaguer Sinope without them, since if they stormed the town from the land side, then the King of Assyria had the Sea open to save himself, and carry away the Princess; this was the thing which most of all Artamenes feared: This disastrous circumstance which was a reason, why he durst not besiege Sinope with an Army of a hundred thousand men, caused such a sadness in him as cannot be expressed. Desperate then as he was, he propounded unto Ciaxares, to send me into Sinope disguised, to the end I might subvert some or other, and try whether the town could be taken by conspiracy. When Ciaxares could not think of a better way, he consented unto this, and I obtained that which I myself desired, for indeed Sir, it was I who first made the motion unto my Master. I went then after I had moulded my self into the habit of a Country Pesant; and since we had heretofore stayed a long time in Sinope, I had got my self many friends: Amongst the rest Artucas was one, who is a kinsman unto Martesia, and now here with us; he always loved me, though he was something obliged unto the service of Aribeus: when I had got into the town, and had concealed my self with one who was very faithful unto me; I perceived that it was a thing impossible to speak with the Princess as I designed: And I understood that they always kept Gallies with oars, and ships ready for sail, in case of any need, especially since the King of Assyria; understood, that our Army was so near him. I smelt also, that Page 89 though Artucas was a Captain of one of the gates in the Town, yet he did not approve of the revolt in Aribeus; but thought it very strange that the Princess should be a prisoner in a Town which was her own: I understood also that the Prince Mazares had all possible care of her, and did as much as he could qualify the violent humours in the King of Assyria. In Conclusion, after I had well consulted with my self what I had to do; I went one night unto Artucas, who was not a little amused to see me: After the first compliments were past, I began to speak of things in particular: I made him understand that he was engaged on the worse side, not only because it was unjust, but also because it would ruin him: In few words, I told him so many things, and so handsomely prepared him, that he staggered, and at last I made him resolve to deceive Aribeus, and become faithful unto his King: We agreed then that he should deliver up the Gate, on that side the Town towards the Temple of Mars, precisely upon that day and hour, that I should appoint him: So then when I got out of Sinope, and was returned to the Camp, I brought such joy unto my Master, as is inconceivable: you know Sir, (pursued Feraulas speaking unto the King of Hircania) That this resolution was fixed upon, That Artamenes should come with four thousand men only, to surprize Sinope; that Ciaxares should follow the next day with the whole Army. But my Master being advanced to execute this great business; he saw as he came out of a valley, that the Town which he came to surprize was all in a flame, and believed that the Princess would perish in it: you also know that in lieu of destroying Sinope we saved that little which remains; how we quenched the fire; how Aribeus fought; how he was overwhelmed, and how he being come unto the foot of the Tower in the Castle, the generous Phrasibulus, whom you see there, opened the gate, and told my Master, that there was in that place an illustrious person who had need of help: Neither are you ignorant, how Artamenes running hastily up to the top of the Tower, thinking to find the Princess there, he only found his Corival: And doubtlesse you also know, how my Master did see a Galley, in which the King of Assyria told him, that the Prince Mazares had taken away Mandana.

In conclusion, Feraulas desiring chiefly to acquaint these Princes that his Master held no base intelligence with the King of Assyria; after he had told them all the turbulent agitations in the minds of these two Rivals, whilst they looked from the top of the sower upon the Galley during the Tempest; then he most exactly related all the discourse between the King of Assyria and Artamenes; making them to understand the promise which Artamenes had made, how that it was not prejudicial to the Kings service; and that the interest of his love was the only thing which made him conceal the King of Assyria's Letter. Afterwards he slightly rehearsed the flight of this King; the death of Aribeus; the retreat of this Prince unto Pteria; how he had written unto Artamenes, and the reason why Artamenes did hide his Letter from Ciaxares; by what accident his answer came unto the Kings hands: how Artamenes believed, and almost still believes that the Princess perished: how he found Mazares half drowned, and indeed all that happened until the arrival of Ciaxares, and imprisonment of Artamenes. In pursuance whereof, he conjured them all to consider what was best to be done for the preservation of such an illustrious man: For, (said he to them) Sirs, all this that Chrisantes and my self have related unto you, is only to give you some light touch of his virtue, it being most certain that it is infinitely above all that can be said or thought.

Feraulas having ended his relation, left all those illustrious auditors in so much admiration of the miraculous life of Artamenes, and in so much joy that they were not mistaken in that opinion which they ever had of his innocency, that they could not chuse but give some testimonies of it. I ever believed (said the King of Hircania) that it was impossible Artamenes should be in any fault: And I never doubted (added Persodes) but that he was ever absolutely innocent. The worst is (replied Hidaspes) that one cannot justify him before Ciaxares of that crime whereof he is accused, but by accusing him of another which will not lesse incense him: And I doubt (said Chrisantes interrupting him) that Ciaxares would be as well pleased with his holding secret correspondence with the King of Assyria, as with Mandana. If the Princess should be dead (answered Adusias) there would be no difficulty to justify Artamenes in discovering his love; but if by happy fortune she be alive (replied Feraulas) my Master will never forgive Chrisantes and me, for discovering his passion unto Ciaxares. For my part (added Thrasibulus) I conceive it requisite to use much prudence in the matter, and not to discover the love of Artamenes, until such time as it be thought fit to discover his quality. But the knowledge of his quality (replied Chrisantes) Page 90 is a thing altogether as dangerous to acquaint the King with: I am of this opinion (said the King of Hircania) not to do any thing slightly, but to bring things unto such a passe, as to hazard nothing; and to that end, before any thing be discovered unto Ciaxares, it is expedient to gain the hearts of the Captains of Soldiers in such a manner, that there may be neither any fear nor danger in speaking unto him for Artamenes. All the Princes concurring with the King of Hircania, and approving of what he said, did assure Hidaspes, Adusias, Chrisantes, and Feraulas, that they themselves would rather perish, then suffer their Master to be in danger of it; and that they would neglect no manner of expedient which may conduce unto his safety. Thrasibulus was in despair of any power to serve him any way then in his person and courage, which he would pawn for him. As they were thus debating, Gobrias, Gadates, Thimocrates, and Philocles came in: They were not present at the relations of Chrisantes and Feraulas, because as soon as Ciaxares came to Sinope, they returned to the Camp, and lodged not in the Town. But since they were no lesse affectionated unto their Master then the rest of the Princes, Feraulas said unto the King of Hircania, that he must needs engage them in behalf of Artamenes. At the name of Artamenes, Gobrias asked what he should do to serve him? Gadates all impatience, that if it were only to die for him, he was and ever would be ready. Thimocrates and Philocles appeared to be as ready as any to serve him: So that the King of Hircania beginning to speak, let them all understand, that there was nothing else to be done, but for every one to be ready to save Artamenes, if there were any attempt to destroy him. Upon these words, all the Princes did solemnly swear to unite themselves, and take up Arms for his safety whensoever there should be any need. They were all upon these terms, when Artucas came unto Hidaspes, and told him that he came to assure him, Artamenes had sent a note unto the King which made him very glad, but none could tell him what it was; and since he knew him to be a lover of Artamenes, he would advise him to go into the Castle: Hidaspes after he had given thanks unto Artucas for his counsel, acquainted all the illustrious assembly with it: who out of impatience to know what it was, went presently unto the King, but with so much esteem, and so much affection unto Artamenes, and did so interest themselves in his fortune, that any would have said, that they were all of them his kindred or subjects.

ARTAMENES, OR Cyrus the Great. THE SECOND PART BOOK II.

IT was not without good cause, that Artucas told Hidaspes, how the King of Medes was very glad and joyful, at a Letter which he received from Artamenes: And the joy of Artamenes did exceed the Kings, if it be permitted me to put a difference between things that are both of them extremes; but to discover the true cause of the satisfaction to these two Persons, whose present conditions seemed to be so unlike: You must know, that the same day about noon, a man which heretofore had served Andramias, and who since served Artamenes in the Scythian Voyage, and was sent by him to Artaxes, who commanded those Troops which were lent the King of Pontus; upon his return unto the Castle of Sinope, he desired to speak with his ancient Master. Aglatidas was then with Andramias, who commanded the man to enter, and whom at first he knew not; yet he no sooner heard him speak, but he knew him by his voice. Andramias gave him his hand, and asked him if he could do any thing for him? Yes Sir, (answered he) for I doubt not but if you will do me the favour to let me speak with Renowned Artamenes, I doubt not, I say, but I shall help him unto such news to tell the King, as may obtain him his liberty. Andramias not imagining what this man could tell of any such importance, urged the man to tell his business unto him, and to tell him also, why he was so affectionate unto Artamenes? for Andramias had some kind of fear to be surprized, and thought this to be some devise of the Kings to try his fidelity. Then Ortalques (for that was the mans name) told him that he served Artamenes in the Massagettan voyage, and presented unto him a piece of a torn Letter, upon which he saw these words written, not knowing to whom they were directed, nor from whom they came.

Tell it, that I am living: That they carry me into one of the two Armenia's, but I know not unto whom I shall go; and that the King of—

Page 92 After that Andramias had read this which was writ upon a loose piece of paper, he looked upon Ortalques, and asked who it was which gave it him? But the man without more ado; Indeed Sir (said he) the Princess Mandana is living: How (cried out Andramias and Aglatidas both together) is the Princess Mandana living? Yes Sirs, answered Ortalques, and this which you see writ there, is as I think her own hand. Andramias and Aglatidas having not fully satisfied their curiosity, urged him to tell them all he knew concerning the Princess; and the man told them, that when he was engaged in the Pontean and Bithynian war, he being sent thither, it was his hap to be much wounded, and stayed there a long time sick, not being able to follow Artaxes, whom Aribeus had called away: that afterwards being desirous to return home, he came unto a place which is neer the Euxine Bridge, in that place where the river Halis empties it self: that being there, and going out one morning to walk, he saw a ship on the Sea some three or four furlongs off the land, close by which, there was one of these great wooden Boats of Pine-tree, which can very well endure the waves when the winds are high, and which are used to carry Merchandize, into which he saw many persons descend, and distinguished some women. After this, the ship sailed into the open Sea, and the Boat came straight unto the mouth of the River; but since the stream in that place was very impetuous, it was a long time before the Rowers could get out of the Sea into the River: During which time, I came unto the Rivers side, and I took notice that there was a woman in the Boat, which did very attentively look upon me; that afterwards, hiding her self behinde another woman, she did something, and I suppose it was to write that which you see upon that piece of paper: after which, another of the women coming unto the Prow of the Boat which touched the Land, and came within three paces of me, having lapped up this piece of paper in a hood, which she took from her head, she threw it unto me, seeming as if the wind had wafted it from her, for it was something high, and blew it where I was: I thought that I knew the Party, and within an hour after, I recalled my self, and knew certainly that it was one of the Princesses women, called Martesia: The men who were in the Boat, were so busie in Rowing, and striving to get up the River, that I think they did not mind the action of this woman: for my part, I hastily took up what was thrown unto me, and going a little from the side, I saw that which I now give you, and I was so surprized at it that I knew not what to think: Mean while, the Boat being passed the mouth of the River, it made away much more readily, and was so soon, so far off me, that I knew not what to resolve upon. I had a better mind to follow this Boat, then to come unto Sinope, whither I understood the Kings Army was marched: for indeed since I knew nothing of what passed here, I could not well tell what they desired me to do, yet after I had well examined the matter, I did conclude, that my best way was to come hither; so that I embarked in the first ship I did meet with, and so hither I came. As I went down to the Port, the burning of this Town, making me very inquisitive, I there heard of all the passages of Sinope, and I made no more doubt but that it was the Princess Mandana, who sent me hither, for I verily think I saw her in the Boat: To tell you who carried her away is more then I can do: all I know is, that certainly she is living. Andramias and Aglatidas after they heard this mans relation, doubted no more then he, but that the Princess was living: But to make it more clear, Aglatidas told his Cosin, that since Artamenes had been so long in the Cappadocian Court, it was impossible but he should know Mandana's hand, therefore the best way would be to shew him what Ortalques had brought, and not to go unto the King, and acquaint him with any thing which might move in him a false Joy. Andramias approved of the Proposition, and with Ortalques entred into the chamber of Artamenes, who then was profoundly plunged into cruel thoughts of the Princess death, or at the least, at the apprehension of it. Aglatidas coming to him, and after he had saluted him, Sir, said he to him, here is a man, whose name is Ortalques, who desires to see you, and has brought a piece of paper unto Andramias, which hand perhaps you know. If I know the hand, as well as I know the name of Ortalques (replied Artamenes in much sadness) I shall easily tell you who writ it; for the man so called, served me in my voyage to the Massagettes, and as I went out of Cappadocia to Ecbatan, I sent him unto Artaxes who then aided the King of Pontus, and since that untill now I heard nothing of him. In saying so, Artamenes considered the Character of the paper, yet he no sooner looked upon it but he blusht; and looking upon Aglatidas and Andramias with such extream turbulency, more then usual; Doubtlesse, cried he out, the Princesse Mandana did write this paper which you shew Page 93 unto me; and I have seen her Letters unto the King, too often to be mistaken: Also I my self had the honour when I came first into Cappadocia, to present one unto him from her, wherein she was pleased to speak too advantageously of me, to lose the memory of it: But I beseech you, said he unto Andramias, if you can do it without danger to your self; Let me see Ortalques, for I do confesse the vertue of the Princesse has much interest|ed me in any thing which concerns her; and I should be very glad to understand what he knows of her: Andramias who much desired to oblige Artamenes, caused the man to enter, unseen by any of the Guards; But during that time, Aglatidas easily perceived, that the joy and agitation of Artamenes his mind, had a more powerful cause then bare compassion: he beheld the paper, as if he were afraid to be mistaken: he lifted his eyes up to heaven, as if he rendered thanks for so great a happiness; he walked up and down the room, and never regarded Aglatidas, nor spoke to him afterwards, coming suddenly to him|self, and fearing he had been too much transported; if you did but know (said he to him) the merit of the Princesse Mandana, you would lesse wonder at my excesse of joy; for although she ought to be your Queen, I can assure you I shall interest my self as much in her service, as any subjects she shall one day have in all Medea. It were to be wished (answered Aglatidas) the King were acquainted with your zeal unto any thing which concerns her, and that he would have the same thoughts of you which I have: Mean while, Andramias brought in Ortalques, whom Artamenes embraced with exceeding tendernes, seeming as if the more news he told him concerning the Princess Mandana, the more welcom should he be: yet notwithstanding he asked him so many things together, that Ortalques could not answer him; but at the last he told him as much as he knew, and as much as did not yet fully satisfie Artamenes: But yet notwithstanding, the certainty of the Princesse her life, that did afford him an unexpressible joy, insomuch as no other consideration, could diminish his delight: It is your duties (said he unto Aglatidas and Andramias) to rejoyce at the resurrection of your Princesse; But (said Aglatidas unto him interrupting him) Ortalques out of zeal which he bears unto you, has some thoughts which seem to me very reasonable, for indeed he desired to see you, with intention that it might be from your hand the King should be acquainted with the life of the Princesse his daughter; ima|gining with some probability, that the joy which you should give him, would in some sort dispose his mind to hearken more favourably unto what I should speak unto him in your behalf. Alas, (added Andramias) it may be thought, that since perhaps he will be neces|sitated unto a fresh war for the delivery of the Princesse, he will sooner set you at liberty. That reason would be but weak, (replied Artamenes modestly) since he has so many other gallant men about him; were it not for the zeal which I have unto his service, and which may be accounted something extraordinary: But if I should send this note unto the King, would it not reflect too much upon you Andramias? and would it not accuse you for giving me too much liberty? No, replied Aglatidas, not at all; for since Ortalques did once serve Andramias, and afterwards served you, it is nothing strange that he should be re|ceived into a place where he had two masters; and that you knowing the hand, desired to acquaint the King with this welcome news, which Andramias may carry from you: Artame|nes, who did indeed desire to be perswaded, did consent unto the motion which Aglatidas made; and calling for ink and paper, he writ as followeth.

ARTAMENES UNTO The KING his Sovereigne LORD.

AS long as I thought my self uselesse unto your Majestie, I endured the weight of my Chains without impatience: But the happy news of the Princesse being alive, perswades me that perhaps I may be serviceable in her Delivery; and I now dare most humbly be|seech Page 94 you, not to deprive me of that honour, to render you that service: Solemnly protesting unto your Majestie, to come into your Prison and put on my Fetters, the very next day that the Princesse is at Liberty.

ARTAMENES.

Andramias taking the Letter which Artamenes writ, also the Note from the Princesse Mandana, went with Ortalques unto the King, where Aglatidas would also be present, in hopes to perform some good office unto such an illustrious prisoner; and because the actions of my Master had begot some suspicions in him of his love, he thought that he would be very glad of liberty; and indeed, though he loved Aglatidas very well, yet he did strive to conceal his joy in his own heart. They were no sooner gone out, but being able to hold no longer, What, my Princesse (said he) are you living? need I no more fear your death? must all those gastly Images of Tombs and Coffins no longer terrifie my fancy? No, no, I can now believe you breath and live, and perhaps think upon me. Ah, whosoever it be, either gods or men which has saved my Princesse from the waves, and from such an almost inevitable danger, what does not Artamenes owe unto them? If it was a Divinity, it me|rits my vows; If it be a Mortal weight, it is worthy of all my services: But whatsoever it be, since Mandana, Divine Mandana does live, I will permit my soul to take full delight, as she did before all sorrow. But alas, (said he after he had been a while silent) I am not so happy as I thought my self: For though 'tis true Mandana lives, yet she is a Captive; and that which is most cruel, I am in fetters also, and by consequence not in a condition to Relieve her: What King would she speak unto? to whom may it be imagined is she a pri|soner? what would she expresse by her note? what a most cruel accident is this, that I cannot taste, in quiet, the greatest joy that ever amarus mind was capable of? yet am I not too blame (said he) to descant thus upon the present condition of my life, at a time when I see my Princesse lives, and when I may hope to see her again? For since it is the pleasure of the gods to bring her from the deep Abysses of the Sea, they may also perhaps bring me out of prison to deliver her, and set her upon her Throne. But my fairest Prin|cesse, after all these misfortunes which I have endured, I dare not make any prayers for my self; I fear lest my own interests should be contagious and infect yours; and for the love of you I will separate them, and ask of the gods no more then what directly relates unto you. Therefore O ye Omnipotent Divinities, which govern all the Earth, cause them to deliver me, that I may deliver my Princesse; that I may have power to punish all her Ravishers; to bring her back unto her father, and let her possesse all those Crowns, which you have enabled me to defend, fight for, and Conquer for the King of the Medes: Oh ye most just Gods, do only as I say, and afterwards let me die at the feet of Mandana; and that she may never have any other sorrows but for the losse of Artamenes. Thus did the most amorous Prince in the world entertain himself, whilst Andramias with Ortalques was with the King; and whilst all his illustrious friends were with Hidaspes, where they received the advice from Artucas, which made them all impatient, and moved them to go presently unto the Castle, as I already told you: But to make you understand how Artucas came so soon to the knowledge of it; you must know, that when Andramias gave the Let|ter unto the King from Artamenes, this Prince was in a rapture of joy which cannot be ex|pressed, so that some of those who were then in the Chamber, without diving any further into the matter, or staying for any more, did in all haste divulge that Artamenes was in favour with the King; and it was from them which Artucas had that which he told unto Hidaspes, as knowing him most affectionate unto Artamenes. The King of Phrygia, who was with Ciaxares when he received this Letter, being desirous to take hold of that occasi|on; told him that such good news as that well deserved liberty unto him who sent it; and Ciaxares in his first apprehensions of joy, did partly forget his anger against Artame|nes, and was glad to receive from his hand this news as a sign of his affection unto his service. He then did exactly inform himself from Ortalques, of all he knew, and all he had seen, and bad Andramias that he should assure Artamenes; it should be long of himself if he did not suddently come out of prison to relieve the Princesse his daughter, and that he should no sooner acknowledge the correspondency which he held with the King of Assyria,Page 95 nor should no sooner ask pardon for it, then he should forget what was past, and restore him unto his former condition, Oh Sir, (said the King of Phrygia then unto him) let not your Majesty stand upon such a uselesse piece of formality; for I do almost certainly know that Artamenes is innocent; and if there were any secret intelligence between the King of Assyria and him, it was not at all prejudicial unto your Majesties service. As they were thus in discourse, the King of Hircania, the Prince of the Caducians, Gobrias, Gadates, Thrasibulus, Hidaspes, Adusius, Thimocrates, Philocles, Artucas, Feraulas and Chrisantes came in; and immediately after Aglatidas entered, with a multitude of strangers of quali|ty, whom this strange news did draw unto the King, every one being desirous to rejoyce with him in the happy news, which did indeed deserve a publique thanksgiving. The name of Mandana was in every ones mouth, those who knew her told it unto those who knew her not, and discoursed of all her admirable qualities; so that as the souls of all were dejected at the news of her losse, so now they were elevated at the news of her being alive: After the first resentments of satisfaction, Ciaxares much displeased that he could not precisely know what was the adventure of the Princesse, nor who carried her away, nor why they carried her unto Armenia: He knew very well that the King of that Country was his Tributary; that the Prince Tigranes his son was gallant and generous, and one that loved Artamenes: But he knew also that the old King was capritious, and humorous, and that he sent no Troops to his Army as he was obliged to do; Ciaxares therefore did not fully relish his joys, but would sometimes make his unquietnesse apparent. Sir, said the King of Hircania unto him, let not the Captivity of the Princesse Mandana disquiet you, for if you would have her prison doors flie open wheresoever they be, you need do no more but set open the prison doors of Artamenes, and set him before so many Kings and Princes as now hear me: And you may be assured Sir, that if he be our guide, we will follow him unto Armenia, and make victory follow us. When we have rendred thanks unto the Gods (replied the King of the Medes) we shall then see how they will inspire us: But for my part, I do not think, that in thanking them for their equity in saving an innocent Princesse, I ought to pardon a Delinquent; and such a one as will neither ask pardon, nor repent; no nor so much as acknowledge his fault, although it be most apparent: Ha Sir, (cried they all with one voice, both the Kings, the Princes, the Homotimes, and all the Cavaliers) Artamenes indeed is unfortunate, but never was culpable. There is not one of us but will enter into his prison, and remain a hostage for him, until he has made proof of his inno|cency by his new services, or (to say better) new miracles. Ciaxares was much moved to find such violent affection, in the minds of all these illustrious persons, and could not answer them but with a congie; yet such a one as left them in some hopes, insomuch as they redoubled their reasons and requests. Aglatidas was not lesse zealous then any: And Migabises, (maugre their old quarrels) was amongst them in the Kings chamber, and begged liberty for Artamenes, as well as his old enemy. The King of Phrygia did extreemly presse Ciaxares unto it: The King of Hircania spoke wonderful boldly: Thimocrates and Philocles used as much power, as there was in Graecia eloquence: Thrasibulus did no lesse; Hidaspes, and Adusius spoke with extream violence, as well as Persodes, Gadates, and a hundred others, who seemed all to be linked unto the interests of Artamenes. Ciax|ares then seeing himself thus urgently pressed; know, (said he unto the King of Phrygia, and Hircania, and all the rest) I wish as well as any, that Artamenes were innocent, or at least that he would acknowledge his crime with repentance, upon condition I gave one of my Kingdoms; and to let you see that I will do all I can, I do permit you (at the return from the Temple) to go one after another unto him, to the end you may perswade him unto obedience, and not to keep that secret from me, which I both will, and I ought to know. After he had said so, Ciaxares without giving them time to answer, went out of the chamber, and went unto the Temple to thank the Gods, for the favour he received from them, and that they would be pleased to compleat the blessing, in rendring unto him the Princesse his daughter: All the people followed unto this ceremony; and the happy news being divulged both in Town and Camp, caused a general rejoycing every where: At their return from the Temple, he had not forgot what Ciaxares said, and therefore in|treated him to give order unto Andramias, that any of his friends might go unto Artame|nes, and endeavour to discover (as he said) what the King would know. The King of Medea, since he saw the state of things to be as they were, would have been very glad if Artamenes would ask pardon, that he might give it unto him; suffered most of those Prin|ces and persons of quality, to see Artamenes in little companies; so that at that time when Page 96 permission was given, and orders sent unto Andromias to that purpose; the King of Phry|gia, and the King of Hircania went to visit him, accompanied with Chrisantes and Ferau|llas: leaving all the rest in great impatience to enjoy the same happiness. In going thither, they resolved to acquaint Artamenes, that they knew he was Cyrus, and that they were not ignorant of all the rest of his adventures, to the end, they might afterwards advise up|on the best expedients to procure his liberty. Not but that Chrisantes & Feraulas did ap|prehend he would be angry with them, but yet they saw such a necessity of it, that they would run that hazard, and rather expose themselves unto disgrace, then to hide from him a truth, which was requisite he should know: As soon as these two Kings entered, Ar|tamenes was much amazed as well at the sight of them, as of Chrisantes and Feraulas, for although Aglatidas had seen him, during his imprisonment, for Andramias did so much favoured his Cosen, yet none els of his domestiques ever saw him. This famous prisoner received these Princes with all the civility and respect, which Artamenes as Artalmenes did owe unto persons of that quality: but after they had saluted him, and moved him to embrace Chrisantes and Feraulas, they told him, smiling, that they came to receive orders from him, and to know what he would have them do, to deliver Artamenes out of prison, and to put him into such a condition, as he might appear to be Cyrus. At these words Artamenes looked upon Chrisantes and Feraulas; but the King of Phrygia begin[ning] to speak, No (said he to him) do not blame these two men whom you ought to love better then any men in the world; and be not sorry that we know the secrets of your life: They were not told us but when there was a great necessity, therefore murmut not, but be assured that what we know shall never hurt you. I know very well Sirs, (answered Artamenes) that Chrisantes and Feraulas had alwayes good intentions towards me, and that questionless they could never have made a better choyce then of you, and the King of Hircania; for all that Sirs there are some passages in my adventures which I wish had been never knowne, and which I should never have told whilst I had life. Had we not seen you in eminent danger, (said Chrisantes with much reverence) we would have kept in an invincible secret: but we conceived, that since we could tell nothing which was not glorious unto you, we thought it better to acquaint these Kings which hear me with your Innocency, then suffer you to perish. Artamenes although he was very sorry that they knew what he would have concealed, yet forced himself not to seem so openly, lest he should disoblige these two Princes who were thus interested in his fortune. Then they acquainted him with the alteration which appeared in the Kings mind, and with his obstinate desire to know exactly what that Intelligence was which he had with the King of Assyria. Since that you know all, replied Artamenes, you may understand that I ought not to tell him: not that I care for exposing my life by incensing the King against Cyrus: But when I think how I should displease the Princess Mandana by it, and should expose her perhaps unto the anger of the King her father, Ah Sirs, I do confess I can[not] think on it but I tremble, and therefore it is a thing which I can never do, I had much rather that Ciaxares should think me perfidious, then that Mandana should suspect me of indiscretion: Indeed Sirs, shall I tell you truly? If I have any sorrowes for your knowing the truth of my life, it is merely in respect of the interest of this most Illustrious Princesse: not but that she is purely innocent, or that her vertue can be stayned by any Calumnies, yet for all that, I wish you thought me to be as faulty as Ciaxares doth, and were ignorant of that which might justifie me: These Princes hearing him speak so, could not chuse but smile, and afterwards admire the power of his respectfull passion, which moved him to prefer the interest of the Princesse, not only before his own life, but also before his own glory. In conclusion, after a long discourse, which yet would not afford them a way to resolve upon, they designed to protract the business as long as they could, and obtaine for certain dayes permission to visit him. That in the mean time, they advised him, to speak concerning Ciaxares as he was wont, which was, with much reverence and affection: that on their sides, they would tell the King of Medes, how they were in some hopes to come unto the knowledge of something which he desired to be informed of, yet he just have patience for a while: that in the interim, they would incine all the Captains and Souldiers, to ask his liberty; and in conclusion, they would Act further according as Ciaxares did appear more or less incensed against him. Artamenes thanked them most civilly for their good intentions towards him. And did that which two dayes before he could not think he should, which was to sollicite them earnestly to break his fetters; for since he knew the Princess living, and that she was in captivity, his Page 97 prison became intolerable unto him. Chrysantes, and Feraulas, staying after these Prin[ces], told him the names of all those who were acquainted with his story; and he did a little blame them for making so many privie unto it: But Sir, (said they unto him) by what other wayes can you hope to break your chaines, to deliver your Princess, if so many Illustrious friends as you have, should be all ignorant of your innocencie? Ah (said he unto them) If all you have told them will procure me my liberty, you had good reason to do it, and I have great cause to thank you: Afterwards he told of his Joy to hear the Prin[cess] was not perished, and of his disquiet in being absolutely ignorant in whose hands for[tune] had disposed her: for, said he, you know as well as I, that the King of Assyria is now at Pteria; and they assure you that Mazares is dead. Thus discoursing of one thing or other, yet all relating unto his love, he kept Chrisantes and Feraulas a long time with him. They were no sooner gone out, but Persodes, Hidaspes, and Adusius came in; after them followed Gobrias, Gadates, and Megabises: and after them againe, Thrasibullus, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Aglatides; Indeed of all those who had permission to see him, there was not one but earnestly desired it: Artamenes transacted with those who had been told his history, as he did with the Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania; and with those who knew it not, according as it was agreed upon between the Princes and him. Mean while Ciaxares dispatched one unto the King of Armenia, and made choise of Melgabises for that employment: appointing him to acquaint that King, how since he under[stood] the Princess his daughter was within his dominions, he desired she might be sent back unto him, in an Equipage proportionable unto her quality: and in case he refused, then to declare war against him. That which incensed Ciaxares more against him, was, that this King, refused the payment of that tribute which he ought to do, and produced some weak bottomed reasons for his exemption: he never thought upon any new war which was likely, but he was sorry for Artamenes, and harkened very favourably unto those who returned from the prison, who told him, that Artamenes did alwayes speak of him with very great reverence and affection, and that according to all appearances, he was most certainly innocent: But after all, he would needs know this impenetrable secret, which they put him in some hopes to discover, yet the opinion of every one was, that since they fore-saw a necessity of a war with Armenia, it would move Ciaxares to pas over his first resolutions. Mean time Artamenes remembred himself of his promise unto the King of Assyria, which was to advertize him exactly of every thing, to the end they might transact together for the liberty of the Princess: oh ye destinies, (said he to him[se]lf, in calling to memory his promises) unto what intricate adventures do you expose me? It seems I came into this world, only to do good offices unto the King of Assyria: I found out his first conspiracy to no other end, but to acquaint Mandana with his love, which himself durst not discover: I went unto the Massagettes for nothing else but to facilitate his second enterprise: And I returned back, purposely to save his life, and to help him in the carrying away of Mandana: I came now to Sinope to save him from the fury of the flames: and now at this time I do not understand of my Princess being alive; But to give him so much satisfaction as to know by what means, and to make the way easie un[t]o him, to deliver her: For Indeed, since I have promised, I must and will keep it: But alas, how can I informe him, that she is in Armenia whilst I am a close prisoner? All his Kingdom is not yet so absolutely destroyed, but he has some dispersed troopes which he can rally together: there is one part of Assyria which does acknowledg his Authority: The one half of Cappadocia is for him; and he may perhaps as soon deliver her as Ciaxa[re]s; what shall I do then? and what shall I resolve upon? But alas, what am I doing, (said he reprehending himself) do I consider and doubt upon a thing which I have pro[m]ised? No, no, waver no longer upon it: and if I desire that men should performe their promises with me, let me be stedfast unto my word: And also, since the King of Assyria is so gallant, let us not give him any cause to suspect it, or to say the truth, we do but informe him of that, which he cannot chuse but know ere long, it not being possible, that the life and the prison of the Princess Mandana can be long concealed. Artamenes also considered that since Ciaxares did accuse him for having intelligence with the King of Assyria, he exposed himself unto absolute destruction if ever it were discovered: but the fear of any danger was not any reason at all to hinder Artamenes for performing what he had promised, and therefore he did descant no longer upon it. This generous Prince resol[ving] then to send unto Pteria did look upon Ortalques as upon one whom he knew to be full of fidelity, and since at that time almost any one had liberty to visit him, he lost not that Page 98 opportunity; so that it was an easie matter for him to excuse his designe. He sent then Ortalques unto the King of Assyria, after he rewarded him very nobly for the good news he brought unto him, and appointed him to tell that Prince from him, that he advertised him, how Mandana was living; that she was in Armenia, not knowing who carried her thither: He desired him also to keep his word with a man who is so punctual with him in so nice a businesse. Ortalques did acq[ui]t himself of this Commission with as much fidelity as hast, and going out of the Town under pretence of some particular businesse of his own, he went unto Pteria, which is not above a hundred and seventy furlongs from Sinope, where he found the King of Assyria ready to depart from thence. This Prince was ravished with the Generosity of Artamenes, and was unexpressibly joyfull at the certain[ty] of Mandana's life, for by his Spies which he had in Sinope, by the means of Artax[es], brother to Aribeus, who alwayes had some powerfull friend or other, neer Ciaxa[re]s, he knew of the shipwrack of Mazares, and the fears which every one apprehen[d]ed of the Princesse being perished: He received Ortalques therefore very well, and after he had magnificently rewarded him, Tell Artamenes (said he to him) that the King of Assyria cannot promise to be his Friend, since Fate will have us ever enemie[s], but let him assure himself, that the King of Assyria will not neglect the rules of generosity, and therefore will always keep his word exactly: But whilst Ortalques was at Pteria, and came back to Sinope, to give an account of his voyage unto his Master, and ac[qu]ainted him with the generous answer of the King of Assyria: All the Kings and Princes were busied in observing the resentments of Ciaxares, and contriving which way they could be serviceable unto Artamenes: And all the Officers and Souldiers in the Army, moved by their own inclinations, and incited by their chief Commanders, did nothing else but ask aloud for Artamenes, that he might be rendred unto them againe, else they re[sol]ved never to stir a foot again unto any War; whilst, I say, Ciaxares was yet very irresolute what to do, though he seemed to incline towards some indulgency, Chrisan[tes] and Feraulas were very restlesse in their transactions: for sometimes they went to vi[sit] their Master: sometimes they courted all the Princes which had interessed them[selves] in his fortune: sometimes they went into the Kings presence, and very often unto Hidaspes and Adusius; so that continually bestirring themselves, and living between hopes and fears, their souls were never in any tranquillity. They had a designe, to send into Persia, and advertise Cambyses of the life of the Prince his Son, and the danger wherein he was, but the distance of the place prevented them; Artamenes also suppo[sing] such a businesse, did expressly forbid it, telling them, that he would never have the king his father know he was living, untill he might be informed of it without sorrow: Moreover, he told them that course would be absolutely in vain, and the readiest way to let Ciaxa[re]s know he was Cyrus. Upon an evening then, when Chrisantes and Feraulas were both together, walking by the Port of Synope, Artucas came unto them, and desired them to go along with him, unto a place where he would freely entertain them: They knew very well the affection which Artucas bore unto Artamenes, and remembred how he left Aribeus to become faithfull unto his Prince, and were contented to go with him: His house was far off the Port, and therefore lesse consumed by fire, but was still habitable. As soon as they came there, Artucas carried them into a chamber, and thorow that into another, where they did finde one who at first they knew not, for it was dark, and can[d]les were not yet lighted: they saw well she was a woman of a good fashion, and seemed to be fair, but yet they could not perceive her face so plainly as to know her: This uncertainty lasted not long, for this woman no sooner saw them, but leaving the daughter of Artucas who was with her, and coming towards them, she began to speak, and call them by their names, to signifie her joy she had to see them; so that the Tone of her voyce no sooner sounded in the ears of Feraulas, but running hastily to her, Ah Martesia (cried he out) is it you that speaks? Can I beleieve that what I think is true? Yes, answered she, I am Martesia, and the very same you left me at Themiscira with the Princesse Man[da]na: At those words Feraulas transported with excesse of joy, did again salute the Lady which had so great a share in his heart, and had so great a confidence in him. Chrisantes for his part, so much esteemed the vertue of this woman, that he behaved himself towards her, with all possible civility. But as his soul was not so tender over her, as the soul of Feraulas was, so he was the first which asked Martesia whether or no the Princesse were at liberty? Alas, wise Chrisantes, said she, and sighed, I would to the Gods she were, or at the least, that your Illustrious Master were not a prisoner, as I understand he is, but Page 99 that he were in a condition to relieve her. What joy soever Feraulas had to see Mar[tesia], this tale did lessen it. But since all he thought was not to be spoken of before Artucas, or his daughter, who knew nothing of Artamenes Love unto the Princesse, Chrisantes and Feraulas did burn with desire to ask a hundred questions, which they then could not enquire of; and she for her part did answer unto many things as she would not have answered if they had been by themselves; however (said Chrisantes) you can as[su]re us that the Princesse is alive? for although Ortalques told us so, yet we shall be far better satisfied to hear you confirm it. Feraulas asked her how they escaped the ship[w]rack? Chrisantes would needs tell her how they grieved for the supposed death of the Princesse, and both of them together did make the discourse so interrupted and full of confusion, that it did but augment their curiosity: Martesia desired Chrisantes and Feraulas to salute a very compleat man who came with her, and was called Orsanes, telling them how he had been both her Guide and Protector. This first discourse was not long, be[cau]se the night was late. But Martesia desired them to come again to morrow morning, for she should be very glad to speak with them before she saw the King, who yet knew nothing of her return, thinking it fit to enforme her self of somethings before she ap[pe]ared at Court, or shewed her self unto him; and this was the reason she came late in[t]o Sinope, and desired to lodge in her Kinsmans house, where she might be welcome, and he having a daughter which was very fair and vertuous; therefore she conjured them not to speak a word of her return unto any. Chrisantes and Feraulas, then left her, and failed not to come the next morning as Martesia had appointed them; and would not acquaint Artamenes with her arrival until they knew more certainties of Mandana, whereby to satisfy his Curiosity, his Impatience, and his Love. Martesia was a woman of most excellent Qualities, and one whose Aunt Artucas had married, and therefore she made choice of his house in Sinope. As she had ever been about Mandana, and that Princesse did always very tenderly love her, so she did love her again most passionately, and could not at all relish her liberty, unless her Princesse enjoyed hers also: and though perhaps there were some in Sinope to whom she had no aversion, yet she had rather have been captive with her Mistress, than free without her. She seemed also very melancholy unto Chrisantes and Feraulas, when they came to her in the morning; and as she knew how to carry things handsomly, she let Artucas understand, that she had some business to impart unto Chrisantes, which concerned the liberty of the Princesse, and which she had orders not to reveal unto any but him and Feraulas: So that without suspicion of any thing, she received them privately into her Chamber, without any other witnesses but one woman which waited upon her, who was so far off the place where she caused Chrisantes and Feraulas to sit down, that she could not understand any thing of their discourse: when then they were come unto her, and the first complements were passed, and they seated in their places: Alas (said she to them) what strange alterations do we find since the day you parted from Themiscira to go unto the Massagetes? and how ignorant am I of all you have done since? only I know that the famous Artamenes has gained some Battles, and subverted Kingdoms. But oh heavens, when I came hither, and was told that he was in prison, how was I surprized and sorrowful? and how sad the Princesse would be if she should know of this terrible alteration? Truly, said she, when I call to memory all that has hapned unto us, and that after all these hurrysings away; so many persecutions; so many warres; so many shipwracks, and so many misfortunes, that Man|dana should be a prisoner in Armenia, and Artamenes a prisoner in Sinope, I do confesse unto you, that my spirits are confounded. I have learned to despair of nothing, since after all this I am living, and at Sinope, and with some whom I am not sorry to see: You are very good Martesia (said Feraulas interrupting her) to say so. And you would continue that goodnesse (said Chrisantes) if you would relate all your adventures since our departure from Themiscira, and by what wayes Philidaspes brought about his designe: why he being Prince of Assyria he appeared onely as Philidaspes; how he treated the Princesse after he took her away: how Mazares fell in love; how that Prince deceived the other and took her away; how you did during the shipwrack; how you escaped it; and how it comes to passe the Princesse is not free; for I do confesse, this last event is in|comprehensible, and puts all the Court into amazement. None can imagine who it should be, who has thus saved the Princesse to destroy her, nor can any conceive who is that King whereof she speaks, and why she named him not in that Note which we received from her. Therefore sweet Martesia, I do conjure you by the Illustrious name of the Princesse Man|dana, Page 100 and also by the name of Artamenes, to tell us exactly all that you know concerning the King of Assyria, concerning the Prince of Saces, and concerning the King whom we cannot guesse: You require so many things, said she, in requiring this, that I know not whether I can in a whole day give you that satisfaction: I will therefore abbreviate my discourse as much as I can: We do not desire you should do so (replied Feraulas) but on the contrary, we do befeech you, not to deprive us of one of the Princesse thoughts, for truly Artamenes has need of all the comforts we can afford him; and we cannot bring him a greater, then to let him know what is become of that Princesse whom he adores: therefore I do conjure you, to give us this satisfaction, for we are gladly disposed to give you hearing as long as you shall please. But, said Martesia, do you not think it fit that I should know also what has chanced unto you? I will engage my self to tell you all (answered he) before we part from hence, so you will first satisfy our extreemly longing desires, to understand your adventures; for as Artamenes has no interest which is not mine, so I am certain Mandana has none which is not yours. Martesia seeing her self so urged, did re|collect her memory, to order the discourse she intended, into the better method; and after a little silence, she began thus.

THE HISTORY OF MANDANA:

TO make all our adventures more clear unto you; also the reasons why the King of Assyria did appear in the Cappadocian Court under the name of Philidaspes, although his right name is Labinet; It is requisite that I do begin my story far off, and that I relate the History of the Queen Nitocris, and of the Princesse Istrina, daughter of Gadates, as well as that of Mandana: I doubt not but you wonder to hear me speak so precisely of the Assyrian affairs; and of the particular relations of two Princes, who have the greatest share in this History: But at the end of my story, I shall acquaint you by what wayes I came to know, what I am now going to tell you. Doubtlesse you know that it was the Queen Nitocris unto whom the Kingdom of Assyria did belong; and it was upon this reason, that the Prince her son, had not the quality of a King, although the King his father was dead. This great Princesse was lineally descended from the first Kings of Assyria; And there never was a Princesse ever since the great King Ninus, and the famous Semiramis more illustrious then she. The King her father died when she was very young; and she wore the Crown at an age, when any other but she had strength enough to support it; yet all the Assyrians did confesse that they never knew more wisdom and prudence in any, then she did manifest in all her actions: Yet notwithstanding, although her own reason was very ripe, she had a Council which was composed of the most excellent men of the whole Monarchy who steered affairs. But since by the fundamental Law of the State she could not marry any stranger Prince, so all the Assyrian Princes were then at Babylon; and I have heard reported, that this Court was at that time the most magnificent of all the world. As this Princesse was very fair, and was owner of the prime Crown in all Asia, so she moved passions in the souls of all the Princes which ever saw her; and I have been assured, that of all this great number of her servants, there was not one of them which were not more amorous then ambitious: I will not stay to tell you with what wisdom and vertue she behaved her self amongst them; only this I must relate, that amongst Page 101 the rest, there were two which seemed to be in greatest hopes to effect their design, more likely then any of the rest. The first was a Prince called Labinet, as he who is now King of Assyria is called: The other named Gadates, who at that very time was a very miracle in beauty, in handsomnesse, in valour, in spirit, in gallantry, and in vertue: his quality also was very high, and allied unto the Royal family. But as for Labinet, although he was nothing so accomplished, and his good qualities were more dim, yet he had this advantage, that he stiled himself to be descended from one of the children of Sardanapalus, if it may be called an advantage to descend from so bad a Prince) and by consequence he pretended to have some right unto the Crown, although he did not at that time openly declare his pretensions. As the Queen was then very young, so she did not consider this reason of state, and her soul preferring him which was more accomplished before him that was lesse; therefore her inclination leaned towards Gadates, who doubtlesse was most worthy, both both for his rare qualities, and in respect of his passion, since they say he adored the Queen Nitocris with as much purity, as men adore the Gods. This innocent passion having took root in the heart of this young Princesse, who thought she could do nothing more advantagious for her people, then to give them a King whom she knew most vertuous; she began to receive the services of Gadates in such a manner, as this precedence above all the rest of them which were interested, was made known unto them. There needed no more to trouble all the Court, principally by Labinet, who by reason of his pretensions unto the Crown was most dangerous. Questionlesse this Prince had no great faults in him, although he was not owner of those heroicue virtues which prefer men above their own qualities: yet notwithstanding, ambition, and love together inflaming his heart, he talked of nothing but civil wars of revolt, and of sedition: and truly the matter was so forward, that every one began to bandy parties: All the discontented lovers made one faction: Labinet made another by himself, followed by some stirring spirits: and Gadates, he had only the Queen on his side. The young Princesse seeing the condition of affairs stand so, she was extreemly troubled: and after she had well consulted with her self, that perhaps it might cost her a great Kingdom, she took a resolution which made the greatnesse of her soul and vertue to appear. For calling Gadates unto her, who doubtlesse she loved very well, and more then she had signified unto him; calling him, I say, unto her to give him a testimony of her affection after a new and surprising manner; Gadates (said she unto him) I have a desire to tell you that which doubtless you are ignorant of, at the least I am certain, that I have had some care to conceal it from you: Know then (pursued she) that I have thought you worthy to wear the Crown of Assyria; Madam (said he) it becomes the Queen Nitocris too well to take it from her; and he whom she shall chuse for that honour were unworthy of it, if he should not content himself with being only the first of her subjects: Reserve your thanks Gadates (said she unto him) until the end of my discourse; for after I have given you this great testimony of my esteem, I must require another testimony from you of your affection: If it be to die at your feet Madam (replied he) I am most ready to obey you, and I do not know any thing in the world which I would not consent unto: observe me I conjure you; to the end I ask you nothing impossible. Gadates, who never durst speak of his love unto the Queen, was a little surprized, yet after this which she spoke unto him, he quickly recollected himself, and looking upon her with as much respect as love; provided Madam (said he unto her) that your Majesty do not forbid me to adore you, I shal never disobey you: No (said she sighing) I do not intend that my authority shall extend it self over the thoughts of the heart; and though, may be, my dominion would reach so far, yet would I not destroy those thoughts which your soul has of me: But that which I would tell you is this, That the necessity of State affairs, and the good of my people, will not permit me to make my own choice of a husband; I would have you know, I am resolved to assemble the States General of my Kingdom, and to receive a husband by the universal allowance of my subjects; If they be reasonable, you may perhaps obtain their voices, as I would have given you mine, if they would have given me the liberty: But if you cannot procure your self to be chosen by them, then resolve with your self Gadates, never to see me again as long as you live; but to retire unto that Province which belongs unto you, and never come at this Court. I will not stand, wise Chrisantes, to tell you all the discourse between Gadates, and the Queen Nitocris, nor many other passages, which depend upon this discourse, though they be well worth observation, and much concerning: I shall only tell you, (to the end I may come unto the more essential part of my discourse) that do what Gadates could, he could obtain no more from her, but liberty to sollicite the Judges of the matter. Page 102 Then the Queen assembled the states generall of her kingdome, declaring unto them, that she thought upon the good & satisfaction of her people, & therefore left them the liberty to chuse themselves a King. When all the incensed lovers heard of this, they were surprized at the declaration; they were ravished with the wisdom & vertue of the Queen, & came unto Babylon to sollicite their interests: but in conclusion, this powerful reason of state which would have all causes and pretences of civill wars removed, induced the states general to beseech the Queen that she would be pleased to marry Labinet, which she accordingly did without the least shew of repugnancy, & was all her life extreemly well pleased with her marriage, & lived very well with her husband: yet it was her pleasure that Gadates should obey her, should retire unto his province and never returne to the Court. The King who knew the business, and also was acquainted with the vertue of this Princess, did much sollicite her that Gadates might returne to Babylon: but she would never consent unto it. A while after her mariage, she sent commands unto Gadates, that he should marry a Prin|cess, descended from the Ancient kings of Bithynia who was extreemly rich and infinitely virtuous; which he did, although certainly he did ever preserve his violent passion to the Queen: He lived as well with the Princess his wife, as the Queen did with her husband. Mean while Nitocris had a son, which was he whom you knew sometimes by the name of Philidaspes, sometimes by the title of the King of Assyria: Gadates had also a son and a daughter: and as soon as they were crept out of their first infancy, the Queen who was then a widow, and still forbade Gadates from coming to Court, commanded him to send his children unto her, that his son who was called Intaphernes might be brought up with the Prince of Assyria; and the young princess his daughter called Istrina, lived in that place where there might love grow between her and her son, unto whom she had a designe to marry him, as well to satisfy the law in marrying a Princess who was not a stranger, as to testifie the esteem she had unto Gadates, thinking she could not better nor more innocently acknowledge those services which he had done her, then by preferring his daughter unto the throne of Assyria: It seems also, that she took not this resolution out of choyce only, but out of a necessity also: for all of the princes which had been pretenders unto the Queen Nitocris, the greatest part of them were resolved not to match with him, and the rest had no daughters: so that the Princess Istrina was the only Lady whom the King of Assyria could marry. But here you may well admire how humane prudence is limited, and how this great Queen, who by such publique works is rendered famous throughout all the world, and ever shall be to all posterity, was deceived in her reasons, and how that which she thought would have caused love, did inspire the heart of the young King of Assyria with aversion. The Princess Istrina was ten years of age when she came to Babylon: Intaphernes her brother fifteen, and the Prince of Assyria fourteen: But from that very time the imperious humour which we saw in Philidaspes, began to take beginning and growth. He lived with Intaphernes after such a manner, as made all believe, he would not look upon him hereafter as a brother in law: he regarded the Prin|cess Istrina with so much indifferencie, that every one beleaved, were it not for feare to displease the Queen, the aversion he had towards her would have appeared more apparently. As for Intaphernes, as he was a Prince very well borne, so he behaved himself with the Prince of Assyria, in all such respects as was due, although he had much adoe to endure his losty humour: yet ambition, and the advise of such as had the care over him, caused him to be very complacent towards him. The young Princess Istrina, for her part, she carried it with all the sweetness and civility towards Labinet, that can be expressed; for though she was very young, yet the Crown of Assyria, unto which she hoped she was destined, did shine so bright in her eyes, that she neglected nothing which might win upon the heart of that Prince whom she hoped to marry: The Queen for her part contri|buted all her endeavours to plant a liking in these two young hearts which she desired to unite; and to that end she caused them to see one another very oft, and at all feasts and publique rejoycings, they exposed themselves unto the people both together, who by their acclamations and applauses did approve of the Queens choyce: for as I have heard say, it was impossible for any eye to behold any fairer object then the Princess Istrina. As for the Prince of Assyria, we know that he is as well made as a man can be: Intaphernes also, was handsom, and of a good garb. But do what the Queen could, the aversion of the Prince her son, did grow with his age: some ill minded spirits, perswaded him that Istrina was ambitious, and was only complacentiall towards him, because she would be a Queen, and therefore he accepted of all her civilities in a rejecting manner: he hated Page 103Intapherne's for no other reason, but because he was her brother, in whom notwithstanding no fault could be found: for certainly she was of a fine spirit, and her complexion as lovely a brown as was in the world: mean while the Prince of Assyria having attained unto his eighteenth year, and the Princess Istrina fourteen: the Queen did motion her son to marry her: but he beseeched her, not to press him yet to marry, and told her that a Prince who never yet was in any war, ought not to think of marriage. The Queen, knowing the violent humour of the Prince, thought best to give a little longer time, and the rather because in all appearance, there was like to be a war with the King of Phrygia, who had made some eruptions upon the frontiers of Assyria. Since this proposition: the Prince who before seemed only indifferent, did now change his course of life, and as much as he could possible, shunned meeting with the Princess Istrina; and therefore, he used to go every day almost to hunt, to the end he might not go so often unto the Queen: But by shunning the company of the sister, he could not shake off the brother, for Intaphernes followed him alwayes, which did a little displease him: It often chanced, that Intaphernes thinking to get his esteem, he encreased his hatred: for as he did not love to be surmounted in any thing, so the extraordinary expertnesse which Intaphernes had in darting the Javelin, shooting in the Bow, and such activities did alwayes anger him: one time above the rest, the Prince shot at a Bear, and missed, presently after Intaphernes shot, and killed him dead: and the same day also, the Prince shot at a Lion, and missed; but Intaphernes killed him immediatly, the Prince was so much angrd at this adventure, that he could not commend him for it, but gave out some bitter expressions against the action: for as some could not forbear commending him, stay, (said he to the man) and keep your excess of commendations untill we have been both together in the wars of Phrygia: for in my opinion there is more honour in killing of a man who can defend himself, then in killing a beast which runs away. Intaphernes did not hear what the Prince said, although he was very near; but some or other having told him afterwards, his spirit was a little exasperated; and upon this passage did rise a report which spread among strange nations that the Prince of Assyria killed him at that hunting: The same report with as little truth in it, took the son of Gadates for the son of Gobrias: though the truth was only as I tell you. Mean while, the Queen, seeing the Phrygian affaires were protracted, did againe presse the Prince to marry Istrina, and employed Mazares, Prince of Saces, who was then in Court, to perswade him unto it, for the Prince of Assyria loved him very dearly: Mazares, according to his instructions and commission, asked him from whence this aversion unto that marriage which was propounded unto him did proceed? for truly, said he to him, the Princess Istrina is very faire: tis true (answered he) but she is not such a one as can reach my heart: why, said Mazares, she is of a sweet and complacentiall disposition as you can desire: if she were a little more fierce, (replied the Prince of Assyria) she would please me more: But do you not confess, (replied Mazares) that she is one of an excellent spirit and much virtue? I beleieve the latter (answered he,) but for the other, since she knows not how to move my heart, I think I may be permitted to leave it disputable: but after all this, added Mazares, you are not at liberty to chuse, for the Princess Istrina is the only Lady whom by the lawes of this state you can marry throughout your whole kingdome: for my part I know not why you should not like her, and why you should not esteem your self happy in such a wife, since she is fair, sweet, sprightly, and vertuous: Ah Mazares, said the Prince of Assyria, this fatal necessity, is the cause why I cannot endure the Princess Istrina: yes Mazares, I do confess, since you will know it, that this Princess has much beauty, sweetness, spirit, and virtue; But for all that, although I confess she is very amiable, yet I cannot love her, nor ever shall: No Mazares, Kings which are above the liberty of other men, ought not to be deprived of the liberty to chuse a wife: It is a law which my predecessors have established, but which I cannot observe, especially in such a juncture of time, where there is none to chuse, or where there is such a necessity, that if I will marry an Assyrian Princess, I must marry Istrina. For although that Gobrias have a daughter, yet the Assyrians make a difference between his countrey and ours, and moreover he is rather my vassall, then my subject: and I am most cer|taine, (added this violent Prince) that if the law of the state, and the Queens commands would not force me to love the Princess Istrina against my will, I should never love her. And I do confess unto you, that since I must not chuse, I cannot love her, and the Prince of Assyria shall never be captivated with any thing in the world, since he ought to be free. But (said Mazares unto him) Kings do not use to marry as other men do, and it Page 104 does not much import whether they love or not love those they marry. The Assyrians demand a Queen from you, satisfie them in their demands, and bestow your heart upon none but whom you please. My heart (replied the Prince smiling) is a thing which I esteem more pretious then to bestow it upon any but a Queen: so that Mazares, if I should chance to love one who is not a Queen, I will reserve unto my self, the liberty to give her a Crown, therefore let us speak no more of it; and if you love me, act so in my behalf, that the Queen may not be offended at my disobedience. The Prince Mazares indeed, did use his best endeavours to perswade Nitocris; But there was no way to make her think well of her Sons disobedience: She whom all the world did look upon with high esteem; and who would leave unto her Son the most flourishing state in all Asia. Then she thought good to take from her Son this pretence of War with the King of Phrygia. When the Prince knew that, and not being able to hinder it, he did think that Peace would be no sooner published, but they would presse marriage upon him; So that not knowing what pretence to finde out, did bethink himself, to do what he could, in causing some other young Prince to be in love with the Princess Istrina; amongst the rest he pitched upon Malzares, and extreemly pressed him unto it: My dear Mazares (said he unto him) Let me in|treat you to love Istrina for the love of me; doubtlesse you have much disposition unto it already: for you have told me she is fair, of an excellent spirit, and great virtue: Why then do you not love her? because (answered Mazares) that fatal minuit wherein my destinies will have me begin to love is not yet come; and because the Queen will not suffer it, and because the Princess Istrina will not favourably look upon me: after he had, and all in vain, tormented Mazares, he went unto another, whom they said was really in love with her, and durst not tell it, and who durst not so much as acknowledge it unto the Prince, nor accept of those assistances which he offered him, out of his respect unto the Queen Nitocris, and Princess whom he loved; for indeed the Prince of Assyria, offered then no lesse then to take her away from them, and assist them in the most violent and unjust courses. Seeing then, that this invention would not take, he took a per|verse resolution to cause the Princess Istrina to hate him; and since he knew she loved her brother very dearly; he carried himself very coldly towards him: One evening then, when they had nothing to do but stay for him who went to signe the Articles of Peace with the King of Phrygia, the King of Assyria being gone out to walk upon the banks of the River Euphrates, Intaphernes followed with many others, and as they were of that age which is most pleasant for the conversation of Ladies, Mazares said, that those Beauties which were inclined to flaxen hair, did most move his heart, and Intaphernes assured him that the brown had greatest influence in his phancie. For my part said the Prince of Assyria, I yet neither loved flaxen nor brown, but if ever I love any, I do not think it will be that which Intaphernes loves. Love Sir, (replied this Prince) will not give us leave to chuse, and perhaps you may finde his tyranny in conclusion. Love (replied this Imperious Prince) may perhaps as you say, become my conquerour, but I am very much deceived, if I be overcome by Assyrian Beauties: And I can tell you there are very Glorious ones in Babylon (replied Intaphernes when he was alone with him, some twelve paces from the company.) Yes (answered he with a malicious smile) but since the Princess Istrina cannot vanquish me, I fear none else, and I am well assured of my liberty in Babylon. My sister (answered Intaphernes with much respect) has not so good an opinion of her Beauty, as to pretend unto such an Illustrious conquest: But Sir, that which her charms cannot do, it is not impossible but other may, who have more attractive power then she, and who beside their merit, may perhaps have better fortune. It is very true (replied the Prince of Assyria very fiercely) she is not very fortunate in her designs, and she has reason to complain of her fate, that she has not gotten a Crown, which as she thinks she deserves. I know not Sir (answered Intaphernes a little sharply) why you should speak thus unto me; but I know very well that the house from whence I am descen|ded, has more times then once given Queens unto the Assyrian Kings: and therefore when my sister by the Queens command hoped for the like honour, she did no more then what was reasonable. Fortune Intaphernes (replied this violent Prince) is not alwayes blinde in her gifts; sometimes she gives them with choise; and I am certain, that she shall never by my hand humorously bestow any Crown, nor shall ever by me, set such upon the Throne, who ought not to look upon it, but with a trembling eye. In other Kingdoms (answered Intaphernes) they say, the Prince is above the Lawes; but in Assyria, the Lawes are used to be above the Prince, whose Glory it is to be subject unto them: and upon Page 105 Reason, Subjects as my Sister, need not to tremble in looking upon that Throne whereon they may sit. When Subjects, as your Sister, shall live under the Reigne of such a Prince as I (replied he) they will better learn what they ought to do, then yet she knows; and they will then see that Reason is stronger then the Lawes, and that without injustice they may be broken when the Law is found unjust. Learn Intaphernes (pursued he) not to trust too much unto the Law; and renounce all those privileges which you think it gives you, and content your self with that alliance which you have had heretofore with the Kings of Assyria; and beleieve that if ever I Reigne, you shall never have any new alliance. May be, (replied Intaphernes) that before the Queen Nitocris has left you the Crown, you may change your minde. I understand you very well (answered the Prince of Assyria) you think because I Reigne not yet, that you are almost my equal. But Intaphernes, undeceive your self, and to begin to let you know that there is some difference betwixt you and I, I command you to retire, and to see me no more; If you will not, you will expose your self: to finde but course entertainment. Oh Sir, replied Intaphernes, Persons of my quality ought not to be thus used. I know not whether they ought to be (answered the Prince of Assyria) but I know very well, that if Intaphernes do not obey me, and that without murmuring, I shall give an example unto Princes which succeed me. Yes Sir, (replied Intaphernes in retiring himself) I will obey you, but it shall be more out of the respect I bear unto the Son of the Queen Nitocris, then out of fear to be ill en|tertained, since Princes that have the heart of Intaphernes, are confident that none shall do them wrong unpunished. The Prince of Assyria by good fortune did not hear these last words, and there was none but Mazares which heard them. At his departure from thence Intaphernes went to take his leave of the Queen; who would not give it: The Princess Istrina, for her part, being infinitely offended for the ill treatment of her bro|ther, since it was in her behalf, did beseech Nitocris to send him to her Father, but the Queen denied her, as well as Intaphernes: Alwayes telling them, that her Son would change his minde with his years, and that she would order him so to do: Mean while she was extreem angry at him, and could not chuse but shew it: so that the Prince coming to know of it, and he which went into Phrygia, reporting the Articles of Peace to be signed, he took a resolution to leave the Court of Assyria, and that way, deliver himself from the persecution which he suffered, and to travel unknown, untill the Queen his mother had altered her minde, or that the Princess Istrina was married. He departed then the next morning, which was a publique day of Rejoyning for the peace of Phrygia, and carried with him only three of his servants, amongst which, there was one of them a man of Quality, and of the same house from which they say Aribeus is descended, at that time when Cappadocia was under the power of the Assyrians, I will hold you no longer to tell you the voyages of that Prince, who upon his going from Babylon, took upon him the name of Philidaspes: only this I must tell you, that after he had been in many Courts of Asia, he came at the last unknown unto Sinope, upon that day wherein a Sacrifice was offered in the Temple of Mars, for the death of young Cyrus, a little before the Pon|tean, and Bithynian war.

For (said Chrisantes, then interrupting her) was the day of that Sacrifice, the first day that the Prince of Assyria, under the name of Philidaspes, did see the Princess Mandana.

It was so, replied Martesia, and it was that also on which he fell in love as well as the Illustrious Artamenes. You may suppose, that after this unto his first designe of talking away the Princess Mandana, the execution whereof Artamenes endeavoured to hin|der, I have little to tell you concerning him, since you have been witnesses of the secret jealousie which moved them to hate one another: therefore I will not insist upon the violent passion of Philidaspes, nor his jealousy, nor any thing which his Love produced in his heart: yet I must tell you of some things, which you could not know. How that this man who accompanied Philidaspes, and was descended from the same house of Aribeus, made himself known unto him, and also presented Philidaspes unto him as a man of Quality, who desired to travel unknown; desiring him to be favourable unto him, and present him unto the King of Cappadocia. This was the chief reason which moved Aribeus to protect Philidaspes, and to present him unto Ciaxares and Mandana a few dayes before the King went from Sinope to the wars: Mean while, Love being chief Commander in the heart of the Prince of Assyria, and he finding an opportunity of a war in Cappadocia; he resolved to stay in that Court, and live in such a manner as you know very well.

Page 106 But I would gladly know (amiable Martesia, said Feraulas) why the Prince of Assyria did not make his love known unto the Princesse Mandana, since he had not the same reasons to conceal it which Cyrus had?

He had partly the same reasons (replied she) for indeed the austere virtue of the Prin|cesse restrained him also as well as it did Artamenes: also he was not ignorant that Ciaxares would never consent that his daughter, who was to be Queen of Medea, should marry him: for doublesse you are not ignorant, how since the illustrious Deioeces did set his Country at liberty, and delivered it from the Tyrannie of the Assyrian Kings, there has been an irreconcilable hatred betwixt those two people; and that all the people would revolt from Astyages if he should ever give his consent unto this alliance: The Prince of Assyria then durst not speak of his love, unless he made himself known; and he durst not make himself known for fear he should be hated and denied, as well for the reasons afore|said, as because the Laws, both of Assyria and Cappadocia, did forbid the banes. He thought then that his only course was, to get so good an opinion in the mind of the Princesse, as might obtain his pardon when he should take her away, as he designed: but to execute this, he imagined that his absolute best way was to make Aribeus for him and his design: and since he had observed in several private discourses, that Aribeus was very passionately affected unto the Assyrian Nation, and that he could almost wish the Cappadocians were under their ancient Lords; he discovered himself unto him, and made him apprehend, that he could never find out a more innocent way to bring the Cappadocians under the Assyrian power, then by favouring his enterprize: You may well imagine by considering the actions of Aribeus since this time, that he hearkened unto the proposition, and consented unto it; and also promised Philidaspes to serve him in all things. This Prince discovered himself unto him, a little after the taking of Cesarea: and they resolved that Philidaspes should make sure of some strong place in Assyria for his retreat, when he should carry away the the Princesse Mandana; and not daring to think of carrying her unto the Court of Queen Nitocris, considering the manner how he parted from her: But since the businesse requiired some time, he resolved upon patience, and for a while to defer the execution of his design; yet he was in hopes of happy successe, for he did believe, that when he had took the Princesse Mandana away, then the Queen Nitocris would authorise his enterprize, since it would add three Kingdoms unto Assyria; and as for the Law, he thought that it might well admit of a favourable construction, by saying the Princesse of Cappadocia was no stranger, since the Kingdom where she was born, did legally belong to him. He sent then unto the Governour of a Town which is some eight dayes journey from Babylon, called Is, and which is scituated upon a River of the same name, to the end he might sub|orn him, and oblige him to be faithful unto him. But whilst these things were in contri|ving, you were a witness of all the passages both in Court and Army, between these two illustrious Rivals; and I have nothing to tell you, untill after the two Battles which Artamenes gained in one day: by one of which, you know, he took the King of Pontus prisoner, and afterwards all the world believed him dead: But now in this place I must tell you, that Feraulas, before whom I speak, did perhaps hasten the execution of this first plot to take away the Princesse Mandana, some moneths sooner then otherwise it would.

I (amiable Martesia, said he) and interrupted her?

Yes you (answered she;) for when you thought that your Master was dead, in the violence of your sorrows, you could not forbear crying out in the presence of Philidaspes, Alas poor Prince, must so glorious a life last no longer? he told me afterwards at Babylon, that then he stopt you, and asked you whether you Master was in that condition? and that you fained the excesse of your sorrows, made you spake one word for another, but yet that did not hinder him from suspecting that the matter was as you had said.

It is very true (replied Feraulas) I remember that I committed this error, and that in my extream sorrow wherein then I was, in the extream joy I was in afterwards for the resur|rection of my dear Master, I had absolutely lost my memory. Feraulas, having done speaking, and Chrisantes desiring him to interrupt Martesia no more; she pursued her di|scourse.

At the return of Artamenes and Philidaspes unto Sinope, the jealousy of the last did encrease, and he being assured from the Governour of the Town of Is, that he should be relceived when he pleased, he thought upon nothing but ripening and acting his design: he saw also that he could never have a more favourable opportunity: for there being now a likely-hood of peace, he conceived that he should need no more Troops then he already Page 107 had, since he had four thousand men about the Town, which were under his command, and a Castle to retire unto, to give a colour for his not being at Sinope, whilst Aribeus was transacting his plot: believe you have not forgot how a Letter which this Prince writ, fell into the hands of Artamenes, and both discovered and prevented this conspiracy: But you do not know, how he which lost this Letter, coming unto Aribeus, and not finding it about him, was extremely surprised, & confessed that he feared the man with whom he had fought, had found it: Neither do you know, how Aribeus, knowing that Artamenes had been with the Princesse and the King, went afterwards and changed the Guards, and sent to advertise Philidaspes, who after he had in the night-time dispersed his four thousand men, which he had under the Castle, in lieu of flying, as all the world believed he did, went unto Pteria, whereof Aribeus was Governour, and there did lie concealed, resolving to wait there for a more favourable opportunity. It was for the love of him that Aribeus was so desirous to remove Artamenes from the Court, since he was so great an obstacle un|to his design, and therefore he propounded unto Ciaxares, to send him unto the Queen of the Massagettes, to the end he might more easily execute his design, during his absence: There happened one chance which much crossed him, and which made him almost despair, and made him lose much time. It was this, as soon as Artamenes was gone his voyage, Philidaspes understood that the Governour of that Town of Is, unto which he was to re|treat, was dead, so that he must seek out another sanctuary before he could at|tempt any thing; which took up so much time that he could not act his design until Artamenes was expected back again, of whom they had heard no news since his departure. The Gover|nour of the Town of Opis, which stands upon the River Pygris being then suborned, and Aribeus also having corrupted one of my companions named Arianta, and made for him almost all the Guards of the Princesse, he did execute his design at Themiscira, where Philidaspes was come without any danger, for he stirred not but in the night, and was so much disguised for this purpose, that he was not knowable. Now Chrisantes, I am come unto that part of my relation which is altogether unknown unto you; But I beseech you im|agine how the Princesse was surprised when she saw Philidaspes take her away, you have heard I suppose, how I followed my dear Mistresse, in spite of those which took her away. I will not stay you so long as to relate how we left the Boat into which they put us: nor how we found horses ready on the other side of the River: nor which road we took; nor who was the guide: I will only tell you that just at break of day, we encamped within a wood, under a Tent which was set up: and neither the Princesse nor I had spoke one syllable; nor were capable of understanding one syllable of all that Philidaspes said unto us, so much was her soul and mine sunk with sorrow: and I think that since the Princesse in the first rapture of her sorrow, cried out unto Philidaspes, that, If Artamenes were at Themiscira, he durst not have attempted this enterprise, she spoke not one word at all: But after we were in the Tent, and the Princesse half dead, did sit down on a cushion, which was laid upon a footcloth, that covered all the ground of the Tent; and as I stood by her as well as Arianta, who did counterfet her sorrow admirably well; Philidaspes, after he had placed his Guards and Centinels for most security, came and cast himself at her feet: and looking upon her with as much submission as he had audacity in taking her away; I know very well Madam (said he unto her) that Philidaspes is not only rash, but the Prince of Assyria also is most bold, and deserves to be punished for thus offering you one of the most illustrious Crowns in the world; Yes, Divine Princesse, I do so much prize your ver|tue above your quality, that I do confesse the greatest King in the world cannot pretend unto the honour of your love, without too great a presumption: But Madam, since the Gods have set you above all the Kings upon earth; and that none can presume to enjoy you without an injury; I thought that I might as well as any other, aspire unto this happy boldnesse which the Gods have destined you unto: I am perhaps lesse worthy of it then some others in consideration of my self; but I am, it may be, as much deserving as others in respect of that Crown I am to wear, and more then any other in respect of my passion to you; so that Madam, how unjust soever I am, I may perhaps merit some compassion, especially if you will but be pleased to know, that I have done nothing, but what I could not hinder my self from. For truly, if there had been any other way, to advance my hopes unto the honour which I pretend to, I should never have taken this; But you know Madam, that though I should have been so happy as not to be despised in your esteem, yet Ciaxares nor Astyages would ever have consented unto that proposition which I should have made; what then would you have a Prince do who lov'd and adored you? and who Page 108 must either have Mandana or death? Death (replied the Princesse in much an|ger) had been a choice more just and fit for you; for if you love Mandana, she will ren|der your life more cruel unto you then your death would be. Perhaps Madam (replied he) that when you see me continually at your feet with unequalled submission, my tears and my sighs may move you to compassion: No, no, (said she and interrupted him) never expect any thing either from time, or tears, or sighs, or submissions, or any thing else; the heart of Mandana shall never be won that way; your crime is so far from being washed away by your tears, that your blood can never do it: Therefore Philidaspes (for so bad an action, deserves no better title) expect from hence forward, that my hate of you which began at Sinope, shall increase every minute: this shall be the progresse of my soul, and believe it I will not stop it as long as I am a Captive: Therefore, if there be yet any spark remaining in your mind, which your unjust passion has not extinguished, know, that it will be much more advantageous for you, to repent of your crime, and set me at li|berty, then thus to continue me your prisoner: we are not yet so far off Themiscira, but you may easily do it, and I will engage my word, to move the King my father not to resent this affront: I will promise you that the hatred which began to grow in my heart, since the first time you designed to take me away, shall vanish; and I shall think my self obliged unto you, if for the love of me you will surmount your self: I shall then believe you love me really; whereas, if you will not be perswaded by my reasons, I shall believe that your own interest, not mine, does prompt you to this action; and that since you have no subjects of your own who is owner of any Crowns, you refuse them, and marry rather out of ambition then love. Moreover, do not ground any hopes, because I do not rail against you for the injury, my mouth Philidaspes is not accustomed unto it: neither do I know in what termes to speak unto those which injure me, since till now I never was wronged: But I am most certain, that I apprehend the injury you do me, as a Princesse of a great soul ought to do; and without suffering my self to be transported by any unprofitable violence, I can extreemly hate you; also I can unalterably resolve never to be moved, neither with your respects, your services, your tears, your sighs, your menaces, nor by death it self, if you put me to it: Once more, Philidaspes, bethink your self, if you can repair your fault; and consider that nothing can be more unreasonable then to commit an unprofitable crime: Think into what a condition you are putting all Cappadocia, all Galatia, all Medea, and all Assyria; or indeed to say truly, all Asia, into what an affrighting disorder it will be brought; for assuredly Astyages and Ciaxares, will not endure this wrong without revenge, and all the Kings their allies will be engaged in the Quarrel: Fear, Philidaspes, tremble, lest you should be drowned in that River of blood which you shall cause to be spilt: For there are Gods, and Gods that are just and will revenge: Gods, I say, that will defend oppressed innocents, and are declared enemies unto unjust Princes: But is it possible Philidaspes, that the Queen Nitocris, who is a most illustrious Princesse, does know of this unjust design? Can it be possible to find one in the world that would advise you to it? No Madam (replied Philidaspes) none gave me any counsel in it, I did not so much as consult with mine own reason; it was love only which was my adviser in the enterprise: But Madam it is now too late to advise Philidaspes unto repentance; your glorious eyes, incensed though they be, does command me not to hearken unto your words, but confirms me in my designs: Ah, alas, if it be so said the Princesse, I forbid you to look upon me, and I for my part will never look upon you again: Go Philidaspes, go, go out of the Tent, and enter no more, unless you will augment your crime: Go out and walk in the woods I say, and consult with your reason, if you have any: Call unto your assistance your generosity, and dim not that ho|nour and glory whereof you seem so amorous and jealous. The glory, Madam, which I did and ever shall aim at, is to set you upon the Throne of Assyria, and to see you command in the most stately Town in the world: Therefore, Madam, I think it but just to put all Asia in arms, since Mandana is of higher merit then to be obtained without lesse trouble, Perhaps when you see me in the head of two hundred thousand men, you will change your mind, and be upon better termes with me, then you are with Philidaspes, whom you thought to be no more then a common Cavalier, and who passed in your conceit for a man much inferiour to your quality: But, Madam, upon all occasions wherein fortune shall smile upon me, and when I have conquered all those Kings who you say will engage themselves in your quarrel; I shall then descend out of my chair of triumph, to prostrate at your feet, my self, and all those palms wherewith they shall crown me. Ah, Philidaspes (said the Princesse) I had rather see you in your grave, then in your chair of triumph after you Page 109 have vanquished my father. Madam (replied he) you may if you will prevent the war, and those eyes, those fair eyes, which you so conceal from me, or els incensedly glance them, makes my armes fall out of my hands, if they but look smilingly upon me. I shall never end if I should tell you that which Philidaspes spoke (wise Chrisantes;) But in conclusion, the Princesse being out of all patience, and seeing all she had said was in vaine, did then command him to go out of the Tent, by such an absolute Authority, that he obeyed her. I must needs say thus much for Philidaspes; that although he was very hasty, and did many things very violently, yet he never failed in his respects unto the Princesse: After he was gone out, we remained by our selves: Philidaspes caused something to be presented unto Mandana for her to eate, but she would not touch a bit: yet we were not all this while he was out of the tent, at handsom freedom, for though we did not yet know that Arianta had betrayed her, yet the Princess had never any confidence in her, and for my part, she was never any of my friends: yet the Princess in this deplorable state, did make me know, she remembered Artamenes: she spent all that day, which was night to us, in lamenting her misfortune, and praying unto the gods to avert it: when night was come, they told us we must be gone, and it was with much ado, that I moved the Princess to eat something: Madam (said I to her in a low voice) Artamenes can perhaps fetch you out of the hands of a Prince, who is accustomed to vanquish, but he cannot fetch you out of your grave if you be once there: Tis true Martesia (said she to me) but how can I live in such a miserable condition? It becomes the greatest soules (said I unto her) to endure the greatest misfortunes with most constancy: Ah Martesia (cryed she) that constancy should be such a difficult vertue? It is a deceitfull virtue also, which commonly never calmes my eyes and face, but it leaves my heartfull of cruell agitations: Indeed Sir, I spoke so earnestly unto her, that I constrain'd her to eat, and presently after they constrayned us to depart: we marched in this manner three nights, before Mandana would permit Philidaspes to speak a word unto her: But in the end of the third night, as we were in the tent, and I according to the direction of Mandana looking whether Philidaspes was out of the reach of hearing what she said, we heard a great noise, and presently a servant of Philidaspes came unto us and caused us immediately to depart, not giving us any time at all. Since we heard a great noise some thirty or forty paces of us, and did not see Philidaspes, the Princess did imagine that perhaps it was somerelief was coming to them; and by reason of that Imagination we used all means possible, both by prayers and promises, and also striving not to go so fast away, as they caused us to go, but all would not do, for a part of them which guarded us, were such as never could hope for pardon, if those orders which they received were not exactly obeyed: so they carried us to a place where we found a coach which stayed for us, and with a convoy of fifty horses; we stayed there for Philidaspes, who came presently after unto us.

Here Chrisantes could not forbear telling Martesia, what obstacle Philidaspes did then meet with; and how Artamenes saw her at the entry of the tent, but knew her not, and how he relieved Philidaspes; how he killed those which set upon him, and how he contributed to the carrying away of Mandana. At this discourse, Martesia cryed mainly out with wonder: and after she had sufficiently testified her astonishment at such an extraordinary passage, she continued her relation.

I will not stay, said she, since I have related unto you, this strange combat, and which doubtless the King of Assyria would not have kept from Mandana, but because he would not thereby occasion the memory of Artamenes in Mandanas mind; I will not stay, I say, to repeat all our complaints during our sad voyage; nor with what obstinateness Mandana denied speaking with Philidaspes: only this, that at last, we came to the town of Opis, where we were lodged in a very magnificent chamber: and where Philidaspes neglected nothing which might render our imprisonment less offensive: But to tell you truly all his care was in vaine, and the Princess sorrow was so violent, that nothing could moderate it; Mean while Philidaspes thought that if he could move the Queen his mother to favour the matter, and that she would receive the Princess Mandana unto her, then things would go according to his hearts desire: for he made no question but if the Queen Nitocris would take her in hand, she would gaine him the heart of the Princess: he also believed that if she did but once see Mandana, she would presently alter her designe of his marriage with Istrina, for the Princess of Cappadocia; and indeed, he sent one of his men secretly to Babylon unto the Prince of Saces who was yet in that Court: the Queen Nitocris Page 110 having stayed him there ever since the absence of her son. For besides the good esteem which she had of him, he was nephew unto her, the Queen Iarinas, his mother, (An excellent and vertuous Princess,) beeing sister unto the late King of Assyria her husband. He writ then unto Mazares, to the end, he might present, what he writ unto his mother, the Queen, and forward his desires: This Prince by his letter which he writ unto this Princess, did ask her pardon for departing from the Court without her leave, he desired her to forget it, and that she would be pleased to think well of his bringing the Princess of Cappadocia unto her, and that by her good consent he might marry her. Then he layed open unto her all the reasons which might induce her to approve of it, and forgot nothing that might win her approbation; but the returne of the messenger did not bring him all the satisfaction he expected; for he understood, that the same day he arrived at Babylon, there also arrived an ambassador from Cixares, to demand of the Queen Nitocris, the Princesse of Cappadocia; and that the Queen did disallow of the act, and that she her self would be the first which would take up arms to restore him the Princesse his daughter: that when she read the letter which the Prince of Assyria had writ unto her, she could not forbear expressing her self, that she was willing he should bring Mandana unto Babylon, but it should only be to restore her unto Cixares: yet Mazares used his best endeavours to procure the Queens consent unto it, but all were in vaine: and he sent unto the Prince of Assyria, to advise him, not to bring the Princess whom he had taken away, unto Babylon, because he understood the Queen had promised Cixares by the Ambassador who was returned, never to consent unto the marriage, but to use all possible wayes to send her unto the King of Medea her father: And indeed, if Mazares had not put her into some hopes that it were more easie to get her out of the hands of her son by policy then power, she had armed all Assyria against him: Mean while we were in the city of Opis, treated with all possible civility: although Mandana used all imaginable aversion and severity against the Prince of Assyria: for she did not only forbear speaking any thing which might please him, but she would not speak at all unto him, and sometimes she would not so much as suffer the sight of him: yet Philidaspes did as much as possible he could devise to qualifie her aversion; and since he saw, she did me the honour to love me, what did he not do and say to move me unto his assistance? but say or do what he could, I could not promise any thing, and told him that all the Grandure upon earth, should not move me to faile in my duty unto the Princess: yet since I feared the extream rigour of Mandana might exasperate the minde of this Prince, and put him upon some unjust designe, I did permit him sometimes to speak unto me of his love, and of his despair: In deed I do think it was not amiss, to prevent any desperate resolutions in him, considering the violence of his love and humour: Sometimes he would speak unto me concerning his love of Mandana, with as much reverence as is conceivable; and sometimes againe, he would be so violent and speak so, as made me fear he was capable of some desperate destiny; but when I discovered his minde so inclined, Sir, said I unto him: take heed what you say, for the Princess yet does only hate you; but if she once see, you have any thoughts of neglecting that respect, which is her due, she will then exchange her hatred for scorn. Ah Martesia (said he) mistake not my crimes and my raptures: sorrow indeed is able to make me do the most unjust thing, but the reverence I have of Mandana prevents me; therefore Martesia, pitty I beseech you my weakness, and though you will not advantage, yet do me no prejudice I conjure you. Sir, (said I unto him) I neither can help nor hurt you, for I dare never so much as speak of you unto Mandana. But wise Chrisantes, whatsoever I said unto the Prince of Assyria upon that subject, I think he did not believe me, but imagined, that I related all he said unto the Princess, though he was much deceived; for as long as Arianta was with us, we discoursed of nothing but our sorrowes in general; and when we were alone, Artamenes was the only subject of our discourse. Alas, (said Mandana sometimes, when for a little liberty, we asked leave to walk by the river Tygris) in what despair will Artamenes be when he returns unto Themiscira and finds not us there? and when he shall know that Philidaspes, that same Philidaspes whom he so much hated, has carried me away? But oh heavens! will he not suspect my vertue? can he think that Philidaspes durst execute such a designe without my consent? But on the other side, can he think that Mandana is capable of any such thing? Ha no no, he will believe me to be innocent though unfortunate. Artamenes, the Illustrious Artamenes, will never conceive that one who has been so severe unto him, can be so pliable unto his Enemy: Thus did we spend our tedious time when we had any Page 111 liberty, but that was seldom; for besides Arianta, who always kept close about the Princesse, there was a great sort of other women which Philidaspes appointed to wait upon the Princesse, who almost never left her. But it is admirable to consider how vertue will shine in those who are in adversity, although it be extream, for the Princesse had not been among them above fifteen dayes, but every one of them who were about her did adore her: but we could not for all that see an end of our misery, nor Philidaspes of his. Still he continued writing unto Mazares, that he should still sollicite the Queen: he writ also secretly unto Aribes, for relief if he should stand in any need of it: He sent also unto the King of Lydia, to desire assistance, knowing him to be no friend neither unto Astyages, or Cixares, though there was an alliance between them: Truth, he neglected nothing that might advance his designe; either in inviting Princes unto his Party, or in putting the Town of Opis into a condition to abide a Siege, in case it should be beleagured: For our parts, we neither knew what we should do, or what to hope for; for we knew not that Artamenes was returned unto Themiscira. Therefore the Princesse, who could not endure to be so in the power of a violent and amorous Prince, did one day resolve to speak with him, intending to ask a favour at his hand, which presently I shall relate unto you. You may imagine how joyfull Philidaspes was, when Arianta told him, the Princesse would speak with him, and doubtlesse, you believe he diligently obeyed the Command. When he was entred into the Princesse Chamber, Is it possible Madam (said he to her) that the Princesse Mandana will speak with the unfortunate Philidaspes, unless it be to pronounce the sentence of his death? But though you should do so, (Dilvine Princesse) I would vpon my knee receive the Doom with joy, so much does this honour, in commanding me to come unto you, delightfully disturb my reason. Sir said she to him, (for through my advice, she resolved to treat him as she did) since I have so often in vain desired you to send me either to Themiscira, or Sinope, or Ancyra, or Almasia, I intend to ask you a thing which you ought not to deny me: for since it is so far from asking you to go out of your Dominions, as I conjure you to conduct me unto Babylon, to the Queen Nitocris, where I shall be in a handsomer condition then I can be here in this place: If you consent unto this favour, I shall promise you, to diminish a little of that just hatred, which is growing in my soul; for I cannot endure that all Asia should know I am in your power, and that I should have no other witnesses of my vertue, but my greatest enemy. Madam (replied Philidaspes, being a little surprized) if you will do me the honour to go unto Babylon, with intention to be one day the Queen of it, and to take from the hands of Nitocris, that Scepter which she has most gloriously swayed, doubtlesse I shall consent unto your proposition: But if in going to Babylon, your designe be to go thereby the sooner unto Themiscira, pardon me Madam, if I be constrained to disobey you: And to tell the truth, squares go not so handsomely there, because for some certain reasons I am in some disgust with the Queen, yet more for the love of you, then for any other cause; therefore in desiring that Madam, you would have me carry you unto a place that will be rather my punishment, then my sanctuary. It is not out of any fear that I refuse you, but love onely forceth it. You told me once Madam, that nothing was more unreasonable then to commit a great crime, to no end: Think not ill then, if I endeavour to prevent falling into the like fault. The Crime is already committed, Madam: I was so presumptuous as to take you away; and it behoves me endeavour for so much happinesse as to obtain my Pardon and your Love. The way you take (replied the Princesse very sharply) makes it a hard matter to obtain either your Pardon or my Love. Do you know Madam, what may be hereafter, (replied this Prince?) I know very well (replied she) that the time will never come in which Mandana will love you. Yet Madam (answered he) I hope there is no absolute impossibility in it. Whosoever should have told me, the first day I came unto the Temple of Mars in Sinope, that I should fall desperately in love with you, I should not have believed it: and whosoever should have told me the first time that I saw Artamenes in that same place, and on that same day, that I should mortally hate him, I could not have believed it; for truly I saw no women in that Temple which could enamour me; And I found Artamenes, very handsome, well proportioned, of a good deportment, and very civil: yet I am in extream love with you, and in extream hate of him. The Princesse blusht at the name of Artamenes, and the Prince who always looked upon her, observed it: yet notwithstanding, he durst not then speak of it; and it was at Babylon where he told me of it. The Princesse, seeing her discourse was to no purpose, broke it off, and went away whether he would or no. A few Page 112 dayes after, we heard of the death of Astyages, though Philidaspes kept it from the Princesse as much as he could: but when he understood she knew of it, he put himself in mourning and came to visit her. And not long after that we heard how the Queen Nitocris died, after she had finished her magnificent Tombe, which is in the prime Port of Babylon, and that the disobedience and bad action of her Son, was the cause of her death. These two accidents did both of them extreamly trouble the Princesse: The first, because he was so neer in kinned: The second, because she relied much upon the vertue of the Queen Nitocris. We understood by one of those women which they had placed about the Princesse, that Mazares did the Prince of Assyria very good service at this time, and that but for him the Queen had disposed of her Crown from him: We understood also by her, that the Princesse Istrina, according unto the last Will of the Queen, went from Babylon the next day after her death into Bithynia where her brother Intaphernes then was, who went thither to assist Arsamones in recovering his estate from the King of Pontus, who (as was reported) was likely to lose both his Kingdoms. Mean while we were not persecuted with any visits from the new King of Assyria for some certain dayes, because as indeed he had some Generosity in him, he was very sad at the death of the Queen Nitocris: Yet as Love was the predominate passion in his soul, and the first dayes of mourning being over, he hoped that the magnificence of Babylon might perhaps work upon the heart of the Princesse, which caused him a little sooner to cheer himself up from his sorrows for the Queen his mother, who put mourning into the hearts of all her Subjects. Mean while Mazares writ unto the King, that it was very requisite he came presently as soon as he could to shew himself unto the people, and that a Throne was such a place as ought not to be long empty, lest some should be tempted to fill it up: Yet for all that, there was no reason of State so strong as could move him to leave Mandana to go unto Babylon: but he writ unto Mazares, that he should prepare all things in the most pompous manner against his entrance; and that he should send thither unto him all things necessary to conduct the Princesse of Medea thither, for since the death of Astyages, we will no more call her the Princesse of Cappadocia. I forgot to tell you (wise Chrisantes) how after the death of the Queen Nitocris, the Princesse by my advice sent unto the new King, to tell him she was very sorry for the death of the Queen his Mother, and how afterwards, he came to thank her for that Complement which with much ado I obtained from her. But to return unto my story; The King of Assyria came one day unto Mandana's chamber, after he had civilly sent to ask leave; and after he had with much reverence saluted her; Madam (said he unto her) The River Euphrates is jealous of that holour, which the River Tigris hath received from you, and it is but just that the prime Town in the World should be honoured with the presence of the most Fair, and illustrious Mandana. When I asked you, to go unto Babylon (replied Mandana) the Queen Nitocris was living: And when I would wait upon you thither (replied this Prince) the Throne of Assyria is ready to receive you, and all the people willing to salute you by the Title of Queen. No Sir (said she to him) never hope that change of place can change my soul, nor that the sight of stately Babylon can move my heart. I had rather spin away my life in a Shepherds cottage, then sit on the Throne of a King that is offensive unto me: No Sir, once for all, I will neither command nor obey you: I will never sit in the seat of that Queen whose virtues I cannot parallel; and I had much rather be in your prison, then on the Throne of Assyria. If I were able to resist, I would not I warrant you be hurried whither you would have me; nor would I willingly draw the war unto that Town which passeth for one of the wonders of the World: I would if I could, save the blood of so many innocent persons wherewith it is filled: But since I cannot resist your designe, Let me tell you, that I shall be the same at Babylon, I am at Opis; and that the King of Assyria with all his great Magnificence, shall move no heart of mine, more then he could when he seemed only Philidaspes. Time Madam (replied he, because for all her severity, he was in some hopes) will shew whether your rigorous resolution be more strong thou my perseverance; At least, if you do resolve upon my death, I shall have a more illustrious Tombe at Babylon, then I can have here; and you will have more witnesses of that cruelty wherein you glory. So it was Chrisantes, that three dayes after, we must resolve upon departure; and to report what our equipage was, is so unnecessary it would but abuse your patience; unlesse you be of their humour who say, that liberality is the tried measure of love; for if so, then I cannot make you understand the greatness of the King of Assyrias passion, better, then by relating the prodigious expences at the entrance of the Page 113 Princess into Babylon. That morning which we went from Opis, we saw in a great court under the window of the Princess, Twelve magnificent Chariots, for the Ladies which were to accompany her, and another, most incomparably above the rest for her self. We saw also two hundred Camels for the baggage, with sumpter clothes of Tyrian purple embroidered with gold: and when we were at the gates of the town, we saw in a great plaine, fifteen thousand men in Armes, all having gilt morrions, and croslets of the same with Bowes of Ebonie, and Arrowes piled with gold, who dividing themselves into two bodies, one part marched before, the other behind, and the Chariots in the middle: As for the Camels they went some two hundred paces before the Souldiers: And as for the King, he went on horse back next after the Chariot in which was the Princess, which went last of all the Chariots, he and a thousand horse did follow him: thus went we to Babylon, untill we were within one dayes Journey, and the King of Assyria desired the Princess should rest her self a day in a Castle where we lodged; mean while, all necessary preparations were making for our entrance: questionless you will think it strange to hear talk of all this magnificence so presently after the death of the Queen Nitocris; but it is the Assyrian fashion as well as of Cappadocia who was once in subjection unto them, that the people never are in mourning above three dayes after the death of their Kings; because, say they, there is more to rejoyce then mourne, that they have so gloriously finished their raigne. See that the Babylonians had no sooner ended their pomp of mourning for their Queen, but they were in another pomp of rejoycing for the Arivall of Mandana: yet you may be assured that she her self was no participant at the feast: mean time, although she was resolved to be seen that day as carelessly drest as possibly she could, yet she could not bring it to pass: For since all the women which waited upon her, and waited upon Arianta and me, were of the King of Assyria's placing, and since Arianta herself was of conspiracy with him; there was no cloaths that morning to be found, but such as were most rich, and full of pearls and diamonds: for my part, I do confess, that this device did not anger me so much as it did the Princess, who was ready to chide me for it; Madam (said I unto her to excuse my self, and because indeed, it did concur with my opinion) the King of Assyria does think questionless to Justifie his action unto the people by your admirable beauty; and therefore desires you should appear in most glory; but, never thinks, that unless he look very well about him you will make all his subjects Rebels; and if you will follow my counsel, you shall appear in all your charmes; for then, if this Prince, should ever attempt any thing against you; the people in favour of you would revolt from him: you are very ingenious (said she to me) to excuse your own fault, or to say better, your simplicity: But Martesia, as flattering as you are, you wrong me much to be moved no more then you are at my dislike of this, and to counsell me unto it, as you have done, for I beseech you tell me, what will the unhappy Artamenes think, if he should chance to know, by the report of those spies which the King my Father has in Babylon, that I shew my self in such a dress, as speaks Joyfull, and well pleased? All the rest of the magnificence cannot be imputed unto me; but it may be thought I consented unto this. Madam, (said I unto her) if you might do as you pleased, and had your choyce, I should not then advise you as I do; but since it is not, it is a good expedient, to draw a good ood out of an evil; and to endeavour if it be possible that the same beauty which caused you to be taken away, may also procure you protectors if you shall need them: And as for what you say concerning Artamenes; beleieve it Madam, that if the King your father have any spies in Babylon, who will report faithfully what they have seen, they will speak more of your melancholy, then your dress, you need not fear it: So indeed Chrisantes, when the Princess could do no other, she suffered her self to be so dressed, yet without any art or care at all: but as you know very well, her hair is so admirable fair, that her neglective comliness, was extremely becoming. All the cloaths they brought us were made after the Medean and Cappadocian fashion, to wit, of fresh, lively, and glorious colours: As for the women of quality in Babylon, they never wear any colour, but white; yet notwithstanding very magnificently and gallantly dressed, having no colours about them but Diamond, Emralds, and Rubies, which gave a glorious lustre: and after that day, we came to know as much, for though the Princess had much unwillingness to be seen, yet more then two hundred women of quality, came to do their reverence unto her: she received them very civilly, but in so deep a melancholy, that she begot as much pity as admiration: in conclusion, we must depart, and in lieu of twelve Chariots full of Ladies, which we had the day before, there was now a hundred times as Page 114 many: As for the Princess, she was compelled to go into a stately magnificent chair of triumph, all the ornaments whereof were pure gold; It was drawn by four Tigers, harnesssed the most ornamentally that could be devised: four men of prime quality carried a stately Canopy over the Chair, imbrodered with Gold, Pearls, and Diamonds, and such as the Sydiaonns only know how to do: I will not insist upon a particular description of this pomp; only tell you that all that great plaine as we came to Babylon, and which you know very well is set with palme trees of a prodigious height, was full of troopes, but such troopes as were all armed in a most strange magnificence. At every hundred paces distance, we saw Arches of triumph erected, upon which were very glorious inscriptions: They were all very stately; and we saw nothing which spoke not Joy and Grandure: About two furlongs from the town, the Prince of Saces, who was a man very fashionable and handsome, also rich in clothes, and upon a horse of Isabella colour with a black mane, came in the head of two thousand horse, to present unto the Princess from the King, great keyes of gold in a box of the same mettall, Topazes and Amethysts: Madam, (said he in presenting them unto her) the King has commanded me to obey you, and from him to offer, that which he only can give you. Sir, answered the Princess (for they had informed her of the quality of Mazares) If in presenting unto me two keyes of Babylon, you will assure me, that I may be permitted in the morning to open the gates, to returne unto Themiscira, or go unto Ecabatane I should accept of them, and be eternally obliged unto you for the offer; but if that liberty will not be allowed me, (pursued she with a charming melancholy which eclipsed nothing of her beauty) It seems unto me to be a peece of injustice, and something inhumane, that I my self should keep the keyes of my prison. So Sir, untill the King of Assyria, be resolved to grant me that, I pray you keep what you offer me, since I think they cannot be in better hands then yours. Mazares, charmed with the beauty, spirit, and civility, of the Princess, told her, that he would not keep what she was pleased to do him so much honour as to trust him with, but that she might use them at her own disposition when she came unto the town: and staying no longer, he Joyned his troop which was very magnificent, with the Kings: this Prince, marched by himself, next immediately after the Princess her triumphant Chair, but so glorious, so handsome, and so glittering with gold and jewels, that except Artamenes, I never saw a man of a better garb then he: At the entry into the town, the Princess was presented with a speech, or to say better an elogy: All the houses were hung with rich Tapestry, every street strewed with flowers: All the windowes were full of women, handsomly dressed: Trumpets and Flutes made the Aire Echo: All the people were ravished at the beauty of the Princess; and expressed their wonder with such loud acclamations, as joyled the King of Assyria beyond all expressions; at the last Chrisantes, we were brought unto the pallace of the Queen Nitocris: the King of Assyria presented his hand unto the Princess as she descended from her Chaire, to conduct her unto her Chamber: she had a good disposition to refuse it, but she thought that it would appear phantasticall, and to no purpose. And therefore without any incivility she gave him her hand; but it was after such a manner, as she let see, it was not the quality of the King of Assyria, did move her unto that complacency, insomuch as he was nothing satisfied with it; we passed through some chambers all upon a floor one within another, all were magnificently furnished; in the last of these, he made her a very low congee, and told her, that from hence forward, it was in her power to command all Assyria; and that he was but the first of her subjects: at the last, after an hour was spent, in accepting the complements of all the Babylonian grantees, they left us at a little liberty; and we had so much consolation, as to know, that all those women which waited upon the Queen Nitocris, were appointed to wait upon the Princess Mandana, so that none came about her, but such as were persons of very vertuous mindes: a little while after we were left alone, and Arianta being gone into another Chamber; the Princess looked upon me with extream melancholy: Ah Martesia (said she) where are we now? and how shall we ever get out? did you not observe, said she to me, the monstrous walls of Babylon, which are so thick and strong, that severall Chariots may pass one by another upon them? did you not observe the high towers all about them; and did you not mark how the River Euphrates so incloses it, as makes the access unto it very difficult, if any should attempt to besiege it? were you not astonished at the innumerable company of people where with it is filled? and the gates of Brass, which shuts them in? Is it not to be feared, that if all Asia should arm themselves in my behalf, they could never get me out of it? and as valiant as Artamenes is, he can never vanquish the Page 115 King of Assyria, as long as he is within the walls of this Town: These are the thoughts, my dear Martesia, which took up my minde, all the time of this disgustive Ceremony; and thus much did all their Magnificence at the entry work upon me. Madam (said I unto her) The Gods can do what they please, and that which to all humane Prudence is impossible, to them is easie. You say well, said she, and I have no other hopes but what are grounded upon their Assistance. And indeed, the next morning, the Princesse would go unto the Temple, and they conducted her unto that of Jupiter Belus, which is one of the fairest in the World: Mean while the King of Assyria endeavoured to win her by sweetnesse, and feared to anger her. I visited her but one hour in a day, and that was before many people, so that the Princesse was lesse troubled at it. The Prince Mazares, by order from the King, did often visit her, the King desired him, to speak unto her in his behalf, knowing that there was not any man in the world had more charming eloquence in his conversation then he. Indeed this Prince did negotiate so admirably well to get unto himself the Princesse esteem, and gain her love, that it was not a little consolation unto himself: He was full of sweetnesse, civility, and respect: and although he did speak to the King of Assyria's advantage, when any occasion was offered; yet notwithstanding, we discovered in his eyes an obliging melancholy; and because we thought that it was onely an effect of his compassion towards us and our misfortunes, the Princesse could not forbear, sometimes commending him. But Chrisantes, that you may the better understand the rest of my discourse, I must in this part of it, discover a thing unto you, which we knew not a long time after, nor which we did so much as suspect at all. It is very true, that the unfortunate Mazares did admirably well disguise his thoughts. But I must tell you Chrisantes, how this Prince in presenting the Keyes of Babylon unto the Princesse, the first day we came thither, did then absolutely lose his liberty, and was captivated with the Beauty of Mandana, as well as the King of Assyria. Since he was never in lovebefore, he was not at first acquainted with the passion. He imagined (as I since knew by the generous Orsanès, who is now come with me, and who discovered unto me all the secrets of his Masters thoughts) that admiration, only joyned with pity to see so fair a Lady in misery, was it which troubled his minde: Yet within eight dayes after, he perceived that it was more then so: He accepted therefore of the King of Assyria's Commission, to see her often, and to speak unto her in his behalf: for what reason had he to refuse it? Yet notwithstanding, he seemed at the first to scruple at it; but afterwards, whether he wanted a lawfull excuse, or whether his secret passion would not suffer him to refuse the sight of her whom he loved in spite of his teeth, he promised the King, that he would visit her, and do him the best service he could; and indeed, he did visit her, and endeavoured to do him service: For it must be acknowledged, that Mazares was naturally Generous, and that love only caused him to do things contrary to Generosity. Orsanès did assure me, that he had discovered his heart unto him; and that there was no course which he did not use, to regulate his passion, and to keep it within the limits of esteem and friendship. What unhappy destiny is mine? (would he say unto Orsanès) I lived all my life in a Court, amidst an infinite number of Beauties, and never was in love with any, but I no sooner lookt upon Mandana, but I am desperately captivated. Ha Orsanès, said he, how those who say, that hope begins with love are deceived? For, what is it, I can hope for? I finde a passion in my self, which I ought, and which I will resist; and though I cannot perhaps absolutely vanquish it, yet I will eternally conceal it at the least: for truly I have promised a friendly office unto the King of Assyria; I am his vassall; I have the honour to be his Kinsman; and he has made choise of me for a confidant of his passion: How can I ever overcome all these objections? But suppose my Generosity should submit unto my love? and that I should resolve to betray a Prince unto whom I owe much respect? I should not be the better, since it is to be believed, that a Princesse who treats the King of Assyria so coarsely, will never receive the Prince of Saces into favour: Therefore Orsanès (said he to him) there is no hopes for me, though I do love, and that so desperately as I have lost my reason: But, said he, since there is no hope in my passion, I will hope it will continue long, or rather think, that since my despair will not cause my passion to die, it will continue for ever: Love then, said he, love on, since it is my destiny; Love, and make no scruple at it; for indeed we cannot be masters of our affection; it is well if we can hide them, and if I can content my self with the esteem and friendship of Mandana. In short Chrisantes, when Mazares could not root his love of Mandana out of his heart, he resolved to keep it Page 116 secret, and not to give over doing a good office for the King of Assyria; but yet Chrisantes he spoke not one word in his behalf, which did not yield him a thousand secret vexations; nor did the Princesse give him a word unto his disadvantage, which joyed him not so much, as he had much adoe to hide it; so that he was both faithful and unfaithful at once: his mouth spoke for the King of Assyria, but his heart betrayed him; and whatsoever he either said or did, one might always see his soul was infinitely afraid to displease the Princesse Mandana: nor did I ever see in any one more respect then in him to her. Mean while, we suspected nothing of his passion; he seemed sometimes very melancholy indeed, but his addresses, without any words, did tell us the misfortunes of the Princesse did trouble him; and that he could wish the King of Assyria, would give over his design. Thus was the state of things, when a piece of crosse misfortune happened unto us, which did exceedingly trouble us; for when the King of Assyria, found no alteration in the mind of Mandana, notwithstanding all his respects, and submissions, and all the endeavours of Mazares, he began to think that the heart of the Princesse was already disposed of; and when he called to mind all the jealousies, he entertained that Artamènes was in love with Mandana; and when he remembered what he had heard from the mouth of Feraulus concerning the quality of Artamènes, all thought of the Princesse blushing at Opis, when Artamènes was named: Then he said unto Mazares (after he had related unto him all the passages in the Cappadocian Court) it is no more to be questioned, but that Artamènes is not only a Prince, nor a Prince only that loves Mandana, but Mandana also loves Artamènes. You may very well imagine, how this conceit tormented the mind of this young Prince; and how it disquieted the thoughts of Mazares; he was so planet-struck at it, that the King of Assyria, supposing that it was in consideration of his interest, did heartily thank him for it. Mean while, to clear all his doubts, he found an opportunity to speak in private with Arianta, who unknown to us had unluckily understood our discourse the night before, and where the Princesse and I had repeated almost all the passages of his life, excepting the name of Cyrus, which happily we pronounced not. But though she understood not all we said, yet she heard enough to clear all doubts, that there was a correspondency between Artamènes and Mandana: So that when the King of Assyria had spoken with this malicious wench, he understood more from her then he desired to know: Yet notwithstanding, since she did make but a confused relation of things, he resolved to clear his doubts a little more fully, and speak unto the Princesse her self: And as jealousy is a much more turbulent passion then love; so the King of Assyria, when he entered into Mandana's chamber, seemed unto me much altered: There was then none with her but Arianta and my self: he saluted her with all due reverence; and began to discourse of things indifferent; yet notwithstanding all this, there appeared so much distemper in his mind, as we could easily perceive it: Madam (said he to her, after much interrupted discourse) I would gladly know one thing from you, which is of infinite importance both to me, and you also: If I may conveniently tell it (replied the Princesse) and if I know it, perhaps I may satisfie your curiosity. Yes Madam (answered he) you do know it, and to conceal it no longer, I wish you would do me the honour to tell me who is that great enemy who surmounts me, and keeps such strong possession in your heart; for such a one there is; else I know not why all my cares, my respects, and my submissions should beget such an aversion in you to me. Sir (said the Princesse unto him, not thinking he knew any thing relating unto Artamènes) trouble not your self to find out the secret reasons of my proceedings with you; and know that though I loved you, and that extream dearly, if you would take me thus away without my consent, I should never love you after it; for I have a strong aversion against all those, who once only in their lives do fail in that duty which they owe unto me. How Madam, (replied this violent Prince almost against his intention) if Artamènes had done what Philidaspes did, would you have used him as you use me? Artamènes, (answered the Princesse blushing) is too wise for me to think he would ever commit such a crime: But Sir, why do you speak of Artamènes upon this occasion? I speak of him, Madam, replied he, as of a man who has overcome me more then once, but much more cruelly in your heart, then with arms in his hands; Yes Madam, this Artamènes whom I ever hated, and whom you have heretofore commanded me to love, is questionlesse the man who opposes my glory, and my good fortunes: As I have no unjust thoughts (replied the Princesse calmly) so I will not deny, but I have had, and still have a great esteem of Artamènes: and you your self know, I am obliged not to hate him: Those obligations, (replied this turbulent Prince) would never have moved the Princesse Mandana, to entertain a secret affection unto a simple Page 117 common Cavalier, if her heart had not been prompted unto it by some more potent inclination. This simple Cavalier whom you speak of (replied the Princesse very angrily) appeared to be as much as Philidaspes did at that time, and may perhaps be one day more then he, although he be King of Assyria: He shall not need to stay long for that, answered he; for since Artamènes is possessor of your affection, I value him above all Princes upon earth; though he be no more then he seems to be: you expresse much pride, and much humililty together (replied the Princesse;) but Sir, after all this, I would wish you to unaccustome your self to speak so imperiously unto me, for I cannot indure it. The King of Assyria, seeing he had extreamly incensed the Princesse, and passing out of his extream violence into extream submission; Alas Madam (said he unto her) would you have me retain my reason, when I understand that the same heart, which I did think all the earth could not move, is not so insensible of Artamènes? was it not enough to know you hate me, but that I must know you love another? and that other whom I most hate? As long as I believed you to be insensible, the Gods do know that I did justifie you with my whole heart, as much as ever I could; and should have confessed, that you had good cause to scorn all the Kings upon earth, because there was none worthy of you: I should have acknowledged that my proceedings thus with you, did deserve to make me wait a long time for a pardon of my fault. But Madam, since I certainly perceive, that the only man upon the face of the earth whom I hate (though I once esteemed him) is the only man you love; Ah Madam, I cannot keep within those limits prescribed: I have complained, I have accused you, I have lost my respect in losing my reason; if I could have pul'd my soul out of this violent passion, I should have done it with abundance of joy; I have done all I can to hate you, but the Gods do know all my endeavours are in vain; for I love you more then I did: My hate of Artamènes augments, and my love to Mandana multiplies; I find fresh sparks of love in me: and Madam, I must, indeed I must chase Artamènes out of your heart; my respects, my solicitations, my t <...> and sighs must destroy him: The truth is, I must either die, or he must live no longer in your memory. The Princesse hearing the King of Assyria speak so, did no longer doubt but that he knew some passage of her affection unto Artamènes, and therefore she did not think it convenient to make a subtilty of her innocent friendship; and considering in what disorder this discourse had driven her soul, she thought that perhaps when he saw that there was no hopes of ever being beloved, he would then let her alone in quiet; therefore, being to speak, Sir, (said she unto him) the Gods do know whether I use any criminous dissimulation; The ingenuity I use unto you may make you know it. Ah Madam, (said the King of Assyria then) be not so sincere, as to tell me all your advantageous thoughts of Artamènes; hide, rather from me, some part of his glory, and put not my patience unto such a vigorous test. I cannot tell you any thing more then your self knows, (answered the Princesse) for indeed, all the Court of Cappadocia knows, how I much esteemed Artamènes; and I told you as much at that time when you were Philidaspes; But all the Court of Cappadocia is ignorant of what I see you know, and what I will confesse unto you; which is, that Artamènes is of a quality equal unto yours; and that if the King my father would consent unto it, then the affection which Artamènes bears unto me, should find from me all the recompence he deserves. Thus Sir, you see upon what termes the businessse is, and perhaps you know more now, then yet Artamènes himself knows; and thus I have told you that important truth which you so earnestly desired to know: And now it is your part to regulate your designs and your affection to me; you have a high soul, which is full of generosity; therefore I need say no more upon this subject. You may yet take such a course as may oblige me to esteem you, and which may yet retain the friendship of Artamènes. Ha, Madam, (said this Prince) although your esteem be very glorious, yet I will have none of it without your affection: nor care I for the friendship of that man who enjoys your affection, and who is the only obstacle which hinders me from it: No, no, Madam, Artamènes and I must take more rough courses to decide our differences; his death must either give you satisfaction for your cruelty, or mine shall assure his good fortune and yours together: In saying so he went out, and left the Princesse extreamly troubled. He went to Mazares, and related unto him all that Mandana said: This unfortunate Prince did lend a most unquiet ear unto him; sometimes he would be sorry for the King of Assyria; and sometimes he would be glad, there was such an obstacle in the heart of the Princesse, as would prevent the King from being loved; and sometimes he would hope, that between a lover hated, and a lover absent, he might perhaps thrive the better in his design; so that he resolved to endeavour all wayes Page 118 whereby he might gain the esteem and favour of the Princesse: Yet he did not intend to act against the rules of generosity; for, said he, it shall not be I who will hinder the King of Assyria, it shall be Artamènes, who shall be the obstacle. But Oh heavens, (said he presently to himself!) This Artamènes, who opposes the designs of the King of Assyria, will also oppose Mazares; yet (added he) Mazares shall not vanquish him by open force, nor declared war;; policy shall help out where force is unavailable; and since there is no other way to be happy, I must have recourse unto subtilty: Mean while, since he perceived the King of Assyria was much incensed, and in such a condition as might perhaps move him to undertake some desperate resolution, he restrained him with all imaginable art, and caused him to rely much upon his solicitations. Indeed, he went to visit the Princesse, and as she had much confidence in him, & was not ignorant how the King of Assyria told him every thing, she spoke unto him with so much spirit, so much virtue, so much sweetness, and in such an obliging manner, that Mazares did almost resolve, to entertain no more then a friendship with her; but oh heavens, how weak a foundation had those thoughts in him, when he hearkened unto the Princesse his heart melted: Compassion on her caused him almost to shed tears; but when he lifted up his eyes, and saw Mandana's fresh flames dried up his tears, and choaked his first design by enflaming his soul: The Princesse notwithstanding was very well satisfied with him; for as she seemed to take some notice of the King of Assyria's violent humour: No Madam (said he to her, after such a manner as might perswade her that he expressed his real thoughts) fear not the violence of the King of Assyria; I will engage my word unto you, to employ all my diligence, in preventing all vitious thoughts in him: But, if I cannot dissuade him from any such designs, I do protest unto you, that from a vassal I shall become an enemy unto him; and that as long as Mazares lives, the Princesse Mandana, shall find no other violence from the King of Assyria, then his prayers and tears, and sighs. You may imagine Chrisantes, how mainly thanks and commendations the Princess gave him: Truth is, Mazares got so much into her esteem, that she loved him like a brother; and this Prince for a while, was so happy, that he neither thought of Artamenes, nor any thing which might vex him: But presently after, when the King of Assyria was informed of the return of Artamenes unto Themiscira; and of his arrival at Ecbatan with Ciaxares; also of all Military preparations against him; he then hastened the execution of those orders which he had formerly given: for since that morning we came unto Babylon, he had sent into Lydia, into Phrygia, Hircania, Arabia, Paphlagonia, and also unto one of the Indian Princes: The Prince of Saces also sent to entreat his father that he would hasten all those Levies which he was to send out of his country; yet we had but a confused notion of all these war-like preparations: For Mazares who would not speak a word of Artamenes unto Mandana, told her always that he knew no more but that he was returned from the Massagettes; and that there was war-like preparations in hand: The King of Assyria, in the mean while did often visit the Princesse, and was sometimes all violence, sometimes all submission; sometimes looking upon her with a deep silent melancholly; and sometimes speaking with extream anger, not daring to fix his eyes upon hers: But truly I wondered a hundred times at the goodness of the Gods, that a Prince so imperious as this, and of so proud a disposition, should ever observe and keep within limits of respect: At first when we came to Babylon, all Ladies were permitted to see the Princesse, and she was so infinitely loved amongst them, that they were willing to do any thing to deliver her, were it not for their desires they had that she should be their Queen; and therefore every Lady of quality, in relation to her own satisfaction; was ready to do a good office for the King of Assyria; yet since this Prince was informed by his spies, that they came very often unto her, they were debared of that Liberty, and the Princesse was so strictly guarded, that none, unlesse Mazares, must see her; and the principal reason of it was, because the common people began to grumble, that all Assyria should be engaged in an unjust war: Thus did we live in most melancholly, and without any comfort, but the company of Mazares. The women which waited upon the Princesse, told us, that there came every day a great number of strangers unto Babylon, and none knew what they were, for these women had more liberty then we, but not much: 'Tis very true, that we were in a very fine prison, (if any can be so) for certainly the King of Assyria's palace, is the most stately thing in the world: The Princesse chamber was on that side which looks towards the great plain, along the River Euphrates, and has a prospect of above fifty furlongs from Babylon; and you know very well, how this prospect is full of variety and delightful, either in respect of the River, Page 119 which there winds and turns it self very pleasantly, or in respect of many stately houses which are obvious to the eye, and which are environ'd round with palm trees: In that quarter was the Princesse lodging, out of which a Balcone jettied out, in which she used to sit, when the weather was fair. I remember, that one night, she was sitting there very late; and as the King her father, and Artamenes took up much of her thoughts; Imagine Martesia (said she to me) how glad and sorry both I should be, if in the morning when I open this window, I should spie a Medean, and a Cappadocian Army; really, said she, I think that I should not be able to contain my self; delight to see relief, and fear lest it should prove in vain for me, and fatal to them who bring it, would so disturb my soul, that I should never have strength, or constancy enough to live out the event: But alas, Martesia, I am not likely to be either glad or sad, upon such an occasion: solitude and silence, that reigns in all this vast plain, which we dimly discover through the obscurity of the night, does tell me that my defenders are not there; and we see nothing by the gloomy light of Stars and Moon, but only trees and this great River: It was then two days since we saw the Prince Mazares, and he being the greatest part of our conversation, the Princesse was very sorry that she did not see her protector, for so she often called him: But after the Princesse had sufficiently entertained her contemplations, she retired into a chamber which joyned unto that where we were, and where commonly she passed away the day. The next morning, as soon as she was drest, one came to tell her that the King of Assyria desired admittance; and as soon as he was entered, Madam, (said he to her, after he had saluted her with all due reverence) will you be pleased to do me the favour, as to go in that chamber, where commonly you use to be? Sir, (said she to him, making signs unto Arianta and me to follow her) Captives must not chuse the places of their prison, and in saying so she followed him, who presented her his hand, and we also followed them. When we were come into that chamber, the King of Assyria, went unto the Balcone, and drawing a great Curtain which ran upon hoops of gold, to open and shut as one pleased, we discovered all that great plain, which the night before we saw so solitary, full of Souldiers in arms; and as they were drawn up into multitudes of Squadrons, Battalia's, and Ensigns, they seemed to be four hundred thousand men: You may imagine, wise Chrisantes, what effect such a terrible object did work in the heart of Mandana; and at the first she did imagine it to be the Army of Ciaxares, but she continued not in that delightful error; for the King of Assyria turning towards her; you see Madam (said he to her) that my design to Conquer and deserve you, is not judged by the Gods so criminal as you think, since they thus prosper it; and since so many Kings and Princes as there is in this Army do take my part, and since two hundred thousand men are ready to expose their lives for the love of me. The Princesse, seeing her hopes deceived, did cast her eyes upon the Army; and though by reason of the remotenesse she could not discern the Ensigns, yet it seemed they were not Medeans: Then hastily turning aside, as not enduring so terrible an object; oh Sir, (cried she out) what do you let me see? what kind of punishment have you invented wherewith to torment me? would you have me all at once resent the wounds, your Souldiers shall give unto those of my party? would you have me apprehend my misfortunes before they fall upon me? what would you have unhappy Mandana do? I would have you know (answered he) that upon your will depends the destiny of all Asia: Thus many men, thus many Provinces, and thus many Kingdoms, have you brought hither, in my behalf. I know Madam (added he) that the King your Father, assisted by the King of Persia, has brought his Troops into the field, and that he is upon the banks of the River Gindes, to come to you; and therefore, Madam, I put my self into a posture of defence, and try if this last remedy will mollifie your heart: Consider, if you please Madam, that the Kings of Lydia, Phrygia, Arabia, Hircania, and a hundred other most valiant Princes who are in my Army, do not acknowledge the King your Father, nor are they in love with you as I am, and therefore will not spare you as doubtlesse I shall do: Consider seriously, I conjure you, that amongst two hundred thousand men, one of them may easily deprive you of that person who is so dear unto you: Oh cruel man (cried she) unto what a fearful punishment do you expose me? Ah pitillesse Princesse (answered he) whose hard heart, had rather all Asia should be in arms, that it should swim in blood, and be ruined, and that the King your Father should be engaged in a dangerous war, rather then accept the affection of a Prince who adores you, who lives not but for you, and who is ready to imply this same Army to Conquer more Crowns for you, if those he has does not satisfie your ambition: you see Madam, two hundred thousand men, ready to march, and ready to fight when Page 120 occasion requires: yet although so many valiant Captains and Souldiers be all impatient to look their enemies in the face, and fight them, yet one favourable look from you is able to make all their Arms fall out of their hands: Yes Divine Princess, the Fate of people depends upon your eyes: Cast but one pleasant look upon me; pronounce but one advantagious word unto me; be but lesse cruel, and afford me but one spark of hope, and then all Asia shall rest in peace, and the King your Father in safety: Speak then I conjure you; or if you will not speak, let your eyes speak for you; say that you will hereafter love the King of Assyria; or promise once only, that you will love Artamenes no longer. Pronounce the doome Madam, Must I fight, or must I disarme: But consider well, before you give the fatal sentence. Sir (answered the Princesse) The Gods are absolute Masters of all men, and Mandana ought not to usurp that Supream authority over them: It is my part patiently to endure the misfortunes they shall send me, and not oppose their wills: If they were not resolved upon a warre they would change my heart, and also the heart of my father to pardon you. So, I am not in a condition to dispose of my own will. It is enough I know from your mouth, that the King of Medes is in Arms against you; I may know thereby, that it is not permitted me, to afford you either a favourable look, or an advantageous syllable, or to give you the least glimps of hope. Since he holds you for his enemy, I have a new cause to use you ill, nor must I pardon you, though I should be so weak as to wish it: And though Artamenes were not living, yet I should be the same I am unto you: Moreover, although your Army be very great, yet will I hope, the Gods will be favourable unto the justnesse of my Cause, making all my fathers enemies to fall before him, and giving him the Victory: Yet the Gods do know, if I could with the losse of my life, prevent the danger of my fathers, I should sacrifice it with incredible joy: Yes Sir, if you can suffer me to be that Victim, which will bring peace unto all Asia, I freely consent unto it, with all my heart: And if nothing will give you satisfaction, but the taking Mandana away from unfortunate Artamenes, I also consent unto it, so you will put her into her grave; and that it may be permitted her to passe out of the hands of the King of Assyria, into the hands of Death, which she would sooner chuse. But in the Name of the Gods Sir, be Generous: Do an Heroick act; surmount that passion which is in your heart: The conquest of Mandana, is not worth half the blood which will be spilt. Love does deceive you Sir, and that Beauty which thus charmes you, is but a pleasing delusion: And although she were as fair as you phansie her, yet at the best, it would be but a treasure which time would certainly steal from any that enjoys it: Recollect your self therefore Sir, and if there be any spark of reason in you, affect honour, and glory, and prefer it above Mandana; That is much more fair then she, and will treat you better: Then will you esteem Mandana more, and also she will you; nor will she then blame you for the injuries you have done her: Consider that such a Princesse as she, is not worthy of so constant a love as yours; think how she hates you, treats you coarsely, and will never love you. In short, either by reason, or revenge, or out of generosity, restore Peace unto all Asia, and hate Mandana, who hates you. I would do so Madam, (said the King of Assyria) if I could, but alas, I cannot if I would: and I think, it is as impossible for me, not to love Mandana, as it is impossible for Mandana, not to love Artamenes. But Madam (added this Prince, in extream anger) If you love the life of your father the King of Medea, be moved with my prayers, for know assuredly, that there is not a valiant man in all my Army, which has not a resolute designe to encounter with him: Imagine that all the Arrows in the hands of all these souldiers which you see, are aimed at Artamenes; that all their spears are set against his heart, and that all Engines, all Strategems, all offensive Arms, are employed particularly against him; and that, it rests onely in your power to take so many enemies off him: Therefore cruel woman, if you love Artamenes, hate not me, but give me some slight signe of your good will, and repentance. No Sir, (answered the Princesse) you do not yet know me; for if I would have changed my minde, it would have been when I heard the name of my Father pronounced; and that which I will not do for him, I will never do for Artamenes; Not but that (since you force me to tell it) I am infinite tender of that Prince, and shall preserve an immoveable fidelity for him: and between a Father and a Lover, I will do what befits me, without any wavering what resolution to take. Then Madam (said he in a more sharp Tone) we must go fight, and you have appointed it so. The Princesse, seeing that he was in earnest, and was going away much moved, that boldnesse which she retained in speaking unto him, did forsake her, and tears came in her eyes; she then threw her self at his feet, and fast holding him, Page 121 (Oh Sir, said she unto him) what are you intending to do? To fight and vanquish if I can, said he unto her, and hastily lifting her up: But though you should vanquish the King my Father, yet you should never vanquish the heart of Mandana (replied she) but on the contrary, I here declare unto you, in the presence of the gods, who hear me, that if in this War, either the King my Father, or the Illustrious Artamenes do die in it, you shall expect nothing from Mandana, but her death: Fight Sir, as long as you will, you shall not enjoy the fruits of your victory: And since the prize for which you fight is in my dispose, you shall never obtain it: You may perhaps overcome the King my Father; and you may perhaps, cause Artamenes to be killed, after he once gave you your life: but you cannot hinder Mandana from dying: So that Sir, if you bring her into despair, she shall also do the like for you. Think with your self once more, and consider it well; for indeed if you be vanquished, then you will be vanquished with abundance of shame, considering the injustice of the Action: and if you be Conquerour, you will finde no other recompence for all your pains, but the Coffin of Mandana. The gods Madam, answered he, did not send you unto the earth, to take you away so soon; and I will hope that if I return Conquerour, you will then change your thoughts of me. If ever I see you Victorious (replied the Princesse) and the noise of your Victory precede your returne, my death shall precede the day of your Triumph. But Madam (replied this Prince) what would you have me do? Since things are at that passe I cannot live without you; and since I cannot suffer Artamenes to live, and you to love him, but not the King of Assyria; yet Madam, I see you had rather all Asia should perish, and you hope I shall perish in it: Yes, yes Madam, I read this secret joy in your heart, which mingles it self with your sorrows; but yet for all that, I still respect you, love you and adore you: Judge Madam, whether there be any comparison between the love of Artamenes and mine: For he sees, he is beloved of the fairest Princesse upon earth, what wonder is it, that he should be faithful unto such a Princesse who scorns all the Grandure of the World for him? To know the difference betwixt his love and mine, seem Madam to scorne him, as you do me, and treat but him as you treat me; then, if after that, he shall love you as do, I shall confesse he has more right unto your affection then I have. You know Madam, that I am Master in Babylon, and so can cause my self to be obeyed; Yet you have commanded absolutely here, and I let you have the liberty to scorne me, and all this because I am possessed with such a passion as has no paralell, which combats with all those violent desires which are in my heart, and which will not permit me to do any thing but adore you. Indeed Madam, I must be gone, and carry sword and fire to the Camp of my enemies: I must go and seek out Artamenes; you will have it so, and I will obey you; In the mean time, I know you will pray unto the gods for his Victory and my ruine; but I conjure you to change your heart. I have onely thus much to say unto you Madam, That if when I am gone, the image of all those misfortunes which you cause, shall happily move you to repent of so unjust a Resolution, and would have the Wars to cease; It is but sending the meanest of your servants unto me, and write onely this word, HOPE, and at that very instant when I shall receive that happy Ticket, though I were in the midst of Battle, and my hand lifted up to kill Artamenes, and although the Victory were almost sure unto me, yet I will promise you (Inexorable Princesse) to sound a Retreat; to flee before my enemies, to come and throw my self at your feet, and look in your eyes, for a confirmation of that blessed syllable. Whilst this Prince was speaking thus, Mandana was so sunk in sorrows, that she hardly understood him what he said; and found her self so weak that she was glad to sit down upon the seat which was in the Balcone; so that the King of Assyria seeing she was inflexible, and would speak no more unto him, he left her, after he unperceivedly had kissed her Robe: When he was in another Chamber, he caused me to be called unto him, but I confesse that I never in all my life saw a more desperate man: He spoke unto me a hundred things which I should repeat unto the Princesse, and I answered him as well as I could, to reduce him unto Reason. And since the Princesse mentioning her own death, did much trouble his minde, Martesia, said he to me, you shall answer for the life of Mandana; speak no more in my behalf if you please, but be sure you look unto her preservation: afterwards he said the same unto Arianta, and all the rest of the women about her; also he spoke much more unto Mazares, whom he was to leave Governour in Babylon; and who had been busied in those Troops which his father had sent up to the Rendezvous, and that was the reason we saw him not two days together. But Chrisantes, if I should relate all that the Princesse said after the King of Assyria was departed, Page 122 it would ingage me unto a long discourse: she rose up, and would once againe view this multitudinous Army: But alas what sad thoughts did it produce? Alas Martesia, (said she, after she had been a long while silent) can I ever consent that all these troops, should march against my father, and against Artamenes? must I expose the lives of two, who are so infinitely dear unto me, to a long and dangerous war? Can I who ever had an Antipathy to war, consent, that so many thousands of men, so many Princes, so many Kings, should be killed for the love of me? must so many innocent soules suffer for my sake? Ah no, no, Martesia, I am infinitely wronged; and there was some passages in the King of Assyrias discourse, at which I doubt whether I had my reason about me or no: yet I do confesse that neither my heart nor my tongue had so much power as to afford him one advantageous word: I know not whether it be an effect of hatred unto him as the Ravisher of Mandana, or an effect of love unto Artamenes: But perhaps, I have not said enough to qualifie him; yet what should I do? said she upon a sudden, doubtless I have lost my reason; my heart and my tongue have been more Just, then my conceit; for the truth is, neither peace nor war are in my dispose; though I should expell that hatred, which I have of that Prince who has so injuriously taken me away: though I should think no more upon Artamenes, and though I should resolve to be so wicked as to submit unto the King of Assyria, yet all these base courses would not advantage me, since the King my father would not give over the war; and since the Illustrious Artamenes would become more bloody and furious, for culpable Mandana, then he would be for Innocent Mandana. Moreover, do I not know very well, that ever since the famous Dejoca who set Medea at liberty, and delivered them from the tyrannie of the Assyrians, there has been an irreconcilable hatred between those two people? & were it Just that a Princesse descended from the illustrious blood of the restorer of her country should bring it againe into servitude? no Martesia; for whether I do consider the King of Assyria, as the Ravisher of Mandana, or as an enemy unto the King of the Medes, or as the enemy of Artamenes or as the tyrant of my country; I have behaved my self towards him, as I ought to do. But Artamenes is in the same Army that my father is: he hath already saved his life, & may do so againe, and considering the justness of their cause, it may be hoped, the gods will protect and preserve them both. But Chrisantes, all her contemplations of the Justness of her cause did not procure her so much rest, as the sight of this vast Army did disquiet her: Madam, said I, look no longer upon those troops which so much trouble you; or if you will needs view them, then look upon them as a subject of glory for the King your father and for Artamenes: Ah, alas my dear Martesia, (cried she) who can tell whether amongst all these I look upon, I do not see the murderer of my father, or of Artamenes? truly Chrisantes, I was forced to pull her away violently unto another Chamber: mean while, we were informed, that the Army would depart the next morning, and that the King of Assyria had intelligence how the Medean Army had passed the River Gindes, by a prodigious invention which you are not ignorant of since you were there; and how they had repulsed some Assyrian troops which were on this side the river: the King therefore departed in all haste, and caused the army to march: the Prince Mazares, moved with thoughts of honour, did much desire to accompany him: But the King of Assyria would trust the guard of Babylon and the keeping of the Princesse unto none but him: so that he conjured him to stay behind: and I know not whether, thoughts of love (notwithstanding the great heart of this Prince) made him glad of it: It was the King of Assyrias mind that the troops which belonged unto Mazares should stay in Babylon; to the end, that if the people did murmur at the injustice of this war, in his absence, those forraigne forces might keep them in obedience: but that which was most admirable, was this, that the King of Assyria, a little before he left Mazares, he drew him aside; and with an unquiet and much disordered mind spoke to him in these termes: you see my dear Mazares, that Artamenes is always very fortunate and invincible: he hath got over that River in eight dayes, which might have been well a years work: he hath done that which was only the work of a god, and if I be not mistaken, fortune has not thus friended him, to forsake him afterwards, not but that I know my army is thrice as strong as the King of Medes, for, for all that I may be overcome, and also killed in the fight: know, that by reason of my unexpressible passion for the Princesse Mandana, I am terribly tormented with this cruel thought, that if I die, then will Artamenes quietly enjoy the affection of Mandana: promise me therefore, I conjure you, that if I die, you will fight with Artamenes, and never deliver up the Princesse unto the King her father untill that too happy Rival be Page 123 dead also: promise me this I entreat you, and seal it with an oath: for after that, I shall be at some rest; and be less tormented with that envious Jealousie which persecutes me: and I confesse unto you, that if I thought any one should enjoy Mandana, I should die desperate: But considering the extreame affection she has unto Artamenes, I shall hope that if you kill him, she will never love any other nor ever marry. This Mazares, is the service I expect from you, and which doubtless you will not refuse me, though it be something difficult, it must be acknowledged that you cannot kill Artamenes, but it will be a great glory unto you; and you will that way find a recompence, in doing this office for me. I leave you to Judge whether Mazares was not much surprised at such discourse, and you may easily think, that without any denyall he promised the King his desire, it being most certaine, that since reports went in Babylon, Artamenes was drawing towards it, his passion grew more violent. So Chrisantes, the King of Assyria went away much satisfied with what Mazares promised, which was, to fight with Artamenes, in case he died. Now were we under the dispose of Mazares, who doubled his civilities and goodness to us; and in the tormenting fears in which we continually were, to hear some ill news, it might be said our captivity was not rigorous, yet it was very much notwithstanding that. The Prince Mazares, never came into the Princesse chamber, but she trembled, and looked for some ill tidings from the army. As for him; he was more and more amorous, and I think he had need of all his generosity, to wish the King of Assyria victory. I remember, one day, that when he saw the Princesse much troubled, and that according to his custom he was very melancholy, Mandana, thinking compassion of her misfortunes, was only the cause of it, Sir (said she unto him) I am not a little beholding unto you, since being what you are unto the King of Assyria, you are so good as to interest your self in any thing which concerns me: Indeed Madam, answered he, you have wrought a strange alteration in my heart: I confesse notwithstanding, that I cannot wish the King of Assyria were vanquished, yet I have much ado to wish him victory; and all this Madam out of my love to you; and I hope you will not condemn me for it; no said she but on the contrary, I much commend you, and think you more innocent for truly, not to be prejudicated in the business of a Prince whom you love, and to favour the interest of an unfortunate Princesse whom you scarcely know, is truly generous: Ah Madam, replied MaJzares, do not say I beseech you, that I do not know Mandana: for I know her so perfectly well, that none upon earth knowes her better; and therefore I do in some sort betray the King of Assyria: also I do know (added he) her own misfortunes better then she her self does: I doubt it not, (replied the Princesse) for since you know him who is the cause of them better then I do, you may also better see those dangerous consequences which that cause may produce. Thus Chrisantes did Mazares, sometimes speak such things as might move some suspicion of his secret thoughts, and thus did the ingenuity of the Princesse cause her to expound them without any subtilty: In the mean time, we were always upon extreame incertainties: the least noise troubled us: I never came into Mandanas chamber, but she looked in my face to see if she found any ill news in it; and she often thought, that she found signes of victory to the King of Assyria in it, and the death of her father and Artamenes. But presently after, as we stood in that Balcone, which I named before, we discovered a great thick dust, arise from the earth in that great plaine a great way off: and presently after, we discerned a great body of horse appeared: this sight, and the Princesse feares, made her look pale: But after we had well considered them; me thought they came too fast, and in too great disorder, towards Babylon to bring victory with them: Madam, (said I unto the Princesse) certainly we have had the better on it; it is easie to be seen; for besides that they are no great number, they come in such hasty confusion, as conquerors would never do. But Martesia, (said the Princesse to me, always fearing the worst) how know you, whether or no these be prisoners of war, which they send away; and whether the King my father, or Artamenes, be not amongst these I see? But Chrisantes presently after, our doubts were all cleared: for a little after these troopes were come into the Town, we heard a great noise upon the staires <...> and after that; we saw the dore of our Chamber opened, and the King of Assyria enter: with his Arms all broken, and stain'd with blood in divers places: his scarf all torn and bloody his plume all ruffled, broken and bloody likewise, for he had a slight wound in his shoulder: There were such signes of sorrow in his eyes, and so many marks of fury in his face: that the Princesse was out of all fears of her father or Artamenes. As soon as this desperate Prince was come into the Chamber; your prayers Madam are heard. Artamenes has got the better of us; and I hoped once in my life not to displease you, in seeing at your feet him whom Page 124 fortune has conquered: It is none of my fault Sir, (replied the Princesse) that this misfortune is fall'n unto you; and if you would have suffered my prayers to have overcome you, Artamenes never should have vanquished you; and the victory which you would have obtained over your self, had been more glory to you, then that, which Artamenes has, is honorable unto him. Madam, (replied the King of Assyria) can Mandana whom I have often seen so sweet and compassionate over the meanest subjects of the King her father, hear with dry eyes, and calme soule, that for the love of her, there is a field full of dead and dying men; Charriots overthrowen; Armes broken; Kings lost their lives: Princes wounded or prisoners: an infinite number of souldiers wallowing in their own blood; & that near four hundred thousand men have fought for you, can I say, this obdurate Princesse, see me wounded, and vanquished at her feet, without one thought of compassion? me, I say, who have quite lost all my fury as soon as I saw her; who as soon as I look upon her has no sorrowes for my defeat; and who should esteem my self very happy to suffer all these disgraces if it were permitted me to hope, that she would once pity my misfortunes. Yes cruell Princesse, though I be vanquished, wounded, and misfortunat, yet you can if you please, make me the happiest of men: but I beseech you, do not insult over a miserable man; and consider, that Artamenes is not yet got into Babylon: and Madam to temper your Joy a little, give me leave to tell you, that it is not so easie a thing to enter it, as it is to vanquish in the field: Battles doe more particularly depend upon fortune then fieges, and therefore I can answer more absolutly for the event of the one then of the other: and Babylon shall all be butchered, & also I will burie my self in its ruines, then suffer Artamenes to enjoy you: Sir (said the Princesse, interrupting him without any passionate disorder) fear of death, does not tremble my soul, and you have so accustomed me to desire it, that it is not a threatening which affrights me, if you should tell me of perishing in flames: Ha Madam (said this Prince kneeling unto her) I beseech you pardon an unfortunat man, in whom you have not left the use of reason: I thought not of what I said, when I said so unto you: but yet, what would you have me do? I have often told you and do so againe, that Artamenes shall never enjoy you as long as I live, nor shall Artamenes overcome me without some danger to himself, as brave and fortunat as he is. But Sir, (said the Princesse unto him) Is it possible you should be so blind, as not to see the gods are against you? But Inhumane Princesse, (replied he) Is it possible you should not consider that you are the cause of this war, and are the most cruel woman in the world? which way can your heart be moved? when I last spoke unto you, I said in my self to excuse you, that great souls are never flexible with armes in their hands; and you speaking almost in the head of two hundred thousand men, said that there would be found some way to resist me: But now, I come unto you vanquished, wounded, and miserable; (confess the truth) is it not something Inhumane, Barbarous, and Cruel, not to look upon me with some compassion at the least? the gods do know Sir, (replied the Princesse) that I am no lover of war, and that I am a wisher of peace unto all Asia: But for all that I can contribute nothing towards it but my prayers, my will depends upon my fathers; and my affection is a thing I cannot take away againe after I have given it: Oh Madam, (said the King of Assyria; interrupting her) speak no more in the name of the gods, drive me not into absolut despair: for I confesse, I am afraid my reason has forsaken me, and that those respects which I would have unto you untill death, will (whether I will or no) so sake me also: speak not at all, when you can speak nothing but what is insufferable: yet (said he in going away) since my blood mingled with my tears will not move you, and since the vanquish'd King of Assyria, is no pleasing object unto you, I will leave you to joyce at the victo'ry of Artaments, in saying so, he went out of the Princess chamber; and after he had taken all necessary order for those troops, which escaped the Rout; and for the preservation of the town; he went to bed: for though the wound he received was not very considerable, yet he having lost much blood, it had a little weakened him: though he was dressed at a little town about twelve surlongs from Babylon: you may imagin Sir, what variety of thoughts the Princess had: and how impatient she was to know all passages, but it was not possible for us to be better satisfied: we understood that the King of Assyria, after he was vanquished, apprehending there might arise some sedition within Babyllon, came in all hast, that he might be in the town, before the reports of his defeat: yet what questions soever we asked, we could receive but confusedly the particulars of the Battle: yet they kept us up more close then before, and changed chambers, with intention doubtless to deprive us of that consolation, in seeing the victorious army of the King [Page 125 her father: I will relate unto you no more of the King of Assyria's despair, and how ir[re]solute he was in coming to Babylon, whether he should see the Princesse or no: The shame of his defeat denied it, but his extream desire to see her constrained it; also he thought that happily he might move her to pity his misfortune: since he was not much wounded, he left his bed the next day, and began to prepare for a Siege, and to take all re[qu]isite orders to hold it out. He imagined that since the time of lying in the field was al[m]most at an end, the King of Medes could not take Babylon in one winter, but would be compelled to raise his Siege, and defer it until the spring; during which time he would use all the wayes he could to move the mind of Mandana, either by fair means or foul; and also would in the mean time prepare himself for a new battle. For our parts, Chrisantes, we did not fully relish our joys; for we saw Mazares so sad, as caused us to apprehend he had discovered some ill intentions in the mind of the King; also it was easie for us to conceive that the Siege of Babylon could not be without much danger; yet this happy beginning gave us good heart; and so much joy as drave a great part of our fears out of our souls. The Gods (said the Princesse) are too just and good to forsake us; and I have greater confidence in their justice, then in the arms of the King my Father, or the valour of Artamenes. Mean while, we treated Mazares much more civil then ordinary; for since we feared nothing so much as the violent humour of the King of Assyria, Mazares was the only hopes we had, to preserve us from him; but we did not know all the interest he hoped for in the Princesse. In conclusion, as you know better then I; the Siege of Balbylon began, and both sides did as much as men of great hearts could do, both in assaulting, and defending: It was now, wise Chrisantes, that our fears were without intermission; for we know there was not a day in which the Besiegers did not make an assault, and in which the Besieged did not make a Sally; so that our whole life was but a continued fear: Our fears were not only for the King, and for Artamenes, and Mazares, whom we under[st]ood commanded the parties which Sallyed very often; but I remember the Princesse one day, could not chuse but complain her self unto him; Generous Prince (said she, when she was informed he had been fighting) I look upon you as the only protector which I have in Babylon; as one who is infinitely dear unto me, and as one who is infinitely ser[viceable] unto the King of Assyria, and as one whose vertue is a great consolation unto me; yet I do know that as soon as you are out of the wals of Babylon, you do become one of my most dangerous enemies; since you are one of the most valiant amongst them; and that the illustrious Mazares, whom Mandana calls her dear protector, does endeavour to kill not only that man whom she respects as her deliverer, but also the King her Father. In[deed] (said she unto him) you are very cruel to take away from me the liberty of praying for you, for indeed all that I can do upon this occasion, is, to wish that you be neither conqueror nor conquered by those whom you assault, and who are assaulted by you: you are all goodnesse, (replied Mazares sighing) to say so unto me Madam; but yet honour, Ma[da]m, will not permit me to be continually mew'd up within wals, whilst so many brave men arefighting: when I leave you in Babylon, I do confesse it is with much regret; And it is extreamly against my mind, that I should quit the glorious title of your protector, to assume that of your enemy, but yet reason will have it so, and there is no way to help it; for besides that honour which I told you of, and besides other reasons which I have, what would the King of Assyria think if I should do otherwise? I should become suspected, and perhaps be deprived of the honour and liberty to see you; Therefore, Madam, if I be cull[p]able in any thing, it is not in this; yet notwithstanding, I do confesse, that I am infinitely to be blamed, and the condition I am in is extreamly unfortunate. Alas, said the Princesse, I am very sorry to be any cause of your disquiets, and if could find out any way, to let Artamenes know how much I am obliged unto you; I am certain he would not fight against you, if he did but know you: But rather he would fight against those of his own side, if they should assault you in his presence: I question not Madam, (replied Mazares blushing) but if Artaments did know me by your report, he would esteem me, but if he did know me by my own addresses, he would not perhaps use me so: you are very mo[de]st (said the Princess to him, who did not suspect any hidden sence in his (words) & you make me wonder; but however, said she, I beseech you remember two things when you go to fight: The one is, that there are in the Army which Besiegeth Babylon, two Princes whose lives are infinitely dear unto me; and the other is that in you only is all the con[solation] and support that I have in Babylon against the King of Assyria: As Mazares was making answer, one came to tell him that the King enquired for him, and certainly it was Page 126 advantageous for him to be so interrupted, for doubtlesse he was much nonplust to give a direct answer unto the Princesse without contradicting his own thoughts, which were not very quiet, since I verily believe, that never was soul more passionate then the soul of Ma[za]res, nor any more vertuous, although the violence of love induced the Prince unto some things that were not over just. Mean while, winter, contrary to the common custome of that Country, did draw fast on us, and the weather was very sharp, which did as much joyce the King of Assyria, as it grieved us, out of our fears that the King of Medes and Artamenes would be compelled to raise their Siege. We had then no other recourse, but unto our prayers; and the Princesse, by the mediation of the Prince Mazares, obtained permission, to go unto the Temple of Jupiter Belus every day; which Temple is the most most stately and famous Church in all Babylon: as well because that this god is the protector of the Assyrians, and him whom they pray unto at the beginning of Battels; as also because of the Oracles which are there given by the mouth of a woman, whom Jupiter Belus made choice of to declare his will unto them who would know it: And since, I think, if my memory deceive me not, that you have heretofore told me, how you never was at the place of those Oracles all the while you staid at Babylon; and since there is no likelihood, that you should see it since, considering the tumult and confusion in which you put the Town, at the taking of it; It is therefore requisite, that I represent it unto you in a few words; after one is entered into the stately court of the Temple, and passed through those most magnificent gates of Braffe which opens into it; one shall find the door of that prodigious Tower, which supports seven others above it, unto the top of which one ascends by winding stairs, supported by pillars of Copper: In the midst of every pair of stairs, there are seats to rest upon, and when one is come unto the heighest Turret of all, one shall find a little, but most magnificent Temple, wherein is to be seen a great Statue of Jupiter Belus, made of massie Gold, a Table of Gold also, and a Throne of the same metal, and many both great and rich vessels; there is also a most stately Altar; upon which the Chaldeans who first con[stituted] Ceremonies of Religion in Babylon, did every year at the grand Sacrifice, burn above a hundred Talents of Incense. As one goes out of that, they enter into another, but lesse, in which was a Couch all covered over with gold, and a Table of the same metal, with a great Lamp of gold also upon it, which was alwayes burning. This place was not open on any side but the door, which being shut, there was no light at all; It was in this place, where that woman whereof I spoke, did reside in the day time, and on that Couch sleeps in the nights, after the example of one who is reported to be in Egypt at Thebes, and another at Patares a Town in Licia.: Here I say does the Prophetess live, separated from all the rest of the world, and delivers Oracles unto those who come, and consult with her. After this, Chrisantes, I shall tell you, how being moved unto it either out of devo[tion], or by a kind of curiosity, when we were one day in the Temple of Jupiter Belus, to wit, in the great Temple below, where every one does ordinarily walk, the Princesse had a great mind to go into the top of the highest Tower, and to visit this famous woman of Babylon, and to desire her assistance unto the Gods, without any design of consulting with the Oracle at all: How, Chrisantes, may the chance of things be admired; Mazares, who was then in the Temple, presented his hand unto the Princesse, to lead her up those stairs which were very steep; but both he and we were much amazed, when we came to the top of this high Tower, and found the King of Assyria, without any with him but the Captaine of his Guard, who was come thither to consult with this woman; certainly, if the Princesse had known of his being there, she would not have come thither that day: since he was but only entered into the little Temple, and had not yet spoke with the Pro[ph]etesse, he thought this accident fell out happily for him, and intended to inform him[se]lf what he was to expect, as the event of his passion; but before he spoke unto the Pro[ph]etesse, he addressed himself unto the Princesse, and told her very civilly; Madam, said he, doublese you are come hither to sollicite the gods against the King of Assyria: But be[fo]re the prayers of one so vertuous as your self have incensed the god of this place who is here adored; I beseech you permit him to consult, and in your presence to enquire the in[tention] of the Deity: The Princesse, who though she could expect nothing from heaven which was not advantageous for her, considering the innocency of her life, and purity of her thoughts, told him that she was glad to see such signs of piety in him, and consented unto what he desired: we entered then into that little place destined for Oracles, where the woman who was very fair, and in very magnificent habit, asked him, as she would have done the meanest of his subjects, and with no more respect, what he would know? I would Page 127 have you (said he to her very submissively) supplicated that god who reveals the secrets of men unto you, that he would be pleased to tell me by your mouth, whether the Princesse Mandana will be eternally inhumane, and whether ever those torments which I endure will have an end? At these words this woman opened a great gate of Gold, which was close by her Couch, and kneeling down upon a Cushion, she was a long time, holding up her head unto the mouth of a little obscure Vault, which that golden grate did shut up, and which was hewed out of the thicknesse of the wall: afterwards, being wrapt, and possessed with a divine spirit which transported her, she unfolded the tresses of her hair, which spread about her shoulders; then rising up and turning towards the King of Assyria, with a face quite altered, her eyes sparkling more then before, her complexion ruddy, and her voice more clear, she distinctly pronounced these words.

The ORACLE.

Well mayest thou hope, to make her mourm

For all her cruelty and scorn,

Because hereafter in her arms,

Thou there shalt find such pleasing charms,

As quite shall terminate thy pain,

And turn thy sorrows into gain.

I leave you to imagine Chrisantes, how much was the joy of the King of Assyria, and how great was the grief of Mandana: how deep was the despair of Mazares, though he durst not shew it, and what a wonder it was unto me; the truth is, I cannot expresse it: for we did almost certainly know there could be no cheat in this Oracle, since the King could not know that the Princesse would come thither; and certainly the woman was of a very great reputation, and extraordinary sanctity, so that we could not suspect the least trick in it; also it was by reason of this good repute that the Princesse desired to see her: but oh heavens, how many tears did this curiosity cost her! she went presently out of the Temple, and spoke not a word unto this woman as she did intend, and went unto the Pa[la]ce extreamly melancholly: The King of Assyria went thither with her; and he was no sooner in her chamber, but looking upon her with many signs of satisfaction in his countenance; Well Madam, said he to her, will you contend with the gods? The gods, answered she, are not unjust, and thats all my hope: They are not unjust I confesse (replied he) but withall you must acknowledge with me that they can be no lyers: I know it well (replied she) but I know also that they are incomprehensible; and it is presumptuous rashnesse in men, to think they can perfectly understand their language. They do explain themselves so clearly (replied he) that I can doubt no longer of my good fortune: They explain themselves so unjustly in appearance (answered she) that I cannot believe they are well understood; But Sir (added the Princesse, who desired to be alone and at liberty to bewaile this new misfortune) if it be the pleasure of the gods to make an alteration in my soul, leave all the care of it unto them, and meddle you no more with it; they have power enough to do it themselves, if they please to have it so; and I pray you leave me a little quietnesse; cruel woman (said he in leaving her) do you resist both heaven and earth? but however it is my part to obey you; as he went out, Mazares, who left us in the Temple came in; but so sad, that I wonder we did not suspect the true cause of it, yet we had not the least thought of it: but he disguised his melancholly, under pretence of that which he discovered in the Princess, which was not a little: you are very generous Mazares, said she to him, not to participate of the King of Assyria's joy, or at least to hide it from me at this time; I protest Ma|dam, answered he, you have no cause to thank me, for being more sensible of your sorrow than the King of Assyria's joy, since, to tell you truly, my heart does it without any consultation with my reason, & since I do nothing but what I cannot chuse. Indeed Orsan'es told me afterwards Page 128 that he was no less troubled at the Oracle than the Princesse was; and this conversation at this time was not very regular, for sometimes Mandana would be reserved, and sometimes Mazares would silently entertain his thoughts; and Orsan'es has told me, that when he did secretly call to minde the present condition of his Fortune, he could not deplore it enough: Alas, said he to himself, what can I hope for? if Mandana speak, it is after such a manner as makes me believe that Artamenes is the onely happy man she loves: and if I hearken unto the Oracle, then the King of Assyria must have his hopes satisfied, and Artamenes must be as unfortunate as Mazares: But whilst this Prince was thus ruminating, the Princesse coming suddenly out of her musing; how can I think, said she, that my heart should change its resentments; and how can Mandana, ever resolve to make up the felicity of that Prince, who is the cause of all her misfortunes? which way can I ever comprehend it? If ever this Prodigy come to passe, the King my father must first die; Artamenes must not be upon earth, and I must lose my Reason; for without these I cannot comprehend how Mandana can ever be Queen of Assyria, as she must be, if the Oracle be interpreted after the King of Assyria's exposition. I shall never make an end Chrisantes, if I should repeat all the discourse between the Princesse, Mazares, and my self. The next morning, the King caused a Magnificent Sacrifice to be offered, to thank the Gods for the Oracle he had received. But here, I beseech you, admire the destiny of things; That same thing, for which the King did thank the gods, the same did incense the people; who began to grumble, and say it was fitter to offer a Sacrifice to appease the Gods, then to thank them: That the war was unjust, that the Princesse Mandana was wronged; that the Babylonians ought to restore her unto the King her father: Thus when they began to descant upon the actions of their Prince, they fell to murmur, and from murmur it grew to insolence; and from insolence to sedition, and at the last an absolute Revolt. Mean while Winter came fast on, and all was covered with snow: but all this did not make the besiegers give over their designe, and continued it so close, that notwithstanding the vast greatnesse of the Town, there entred no victuals into it: Yet notwithstanding, the Oracle kept up the heart of the King of Assyria; but for all that he was necessitated a few dayes after; for the famine beginning to encrease, and pinch the people, they began to cast off their obedience unto their King; and in one night, this great Town had more enemies in Arms within the walls, then without; although the King of Medes Army, as you know, was become vastly great, since the defeat of the King of Assyria, because many Princes did then quit him, and joynd themselves with Ciaxares. Never was greater confusion then this of Babylon. Some took up Arms, to force the King of Assyria to restore the Prin|cesse unto the King of Medes: Others were in Arms to keep her, and by her to make an advantageous Peace: Some there were, who being not onely deprived of all reason, but humanity, did speak of sacrificing her; Others, on the contrary, maintained that she deserved to have Altars erected unto her vertue and constancy: Some would now get, to maintain themselves from those who had too much: And others, without any other pretence, maintained they were in Arms to shake off the yolk of Royalty, and make themselves free, since fortune afforded them such a favourable opportunity: And indeed, they all talked so insolently, and high, as I am verily perswaded, that they did contri|bute as much to the taking of the Town by their Revolt, as all the strength of Ciaxares his Army; or to say better, I think the gods intending to protect the Innocency of the Princesse, and to punish their Rebellion, did make use of themselves for that purpose, and blinded them to their own destruction: And although it seemed, that the furie of the people was advantageous unto the Princesse, considering the state of things: yet in lieu of rejoicing her, it did much grieve her; it being most certain, that nothing is more horrible, nor entrencheth so much upon the soveraigne Authority of the Gods, as this rebellious Crime, which entrencheth upon the soveraigne Authority of Kings, who are the Images of the gods. Yet, as the King of Assyria is a Prince of a great heart, and Ma|zares of no lesse to second him, so he hoped to appease this disorder, and resolved to take the onely course by which popular insolencie is reduced unto Reason, which is by example, and punishment of mutineers: But since the thing could not be done without some dan|ger, because if the besiegers should make an assault upon the Town, at the time that the people were so much incensed, it was to be feared, they would yeeld up the Town; and the King of Assyria apprehended, that then he could not save the Princesse, especially in the night, when the besiegers were most busie in giving Alarms, and when the people are aptest to attempt any thing, because they who are most forward in such tumultuous occasions, Page 129 cannot be known in the dark. He consulted then with Mazares upon it, who told him, that it was Prudence in those who do not resolve to flee, yet to know how they may do it, if any necessity should presse them unto it. It is good reason (said the King of Assyria unto him) for all Babylon and my Crown to boot are nothing to me in comparison of Mandana: And at this time, if I should lose Mandana, I should be in danger to lose my Scepter as well as her, it being to be imagined, that the people will not then endure me, nor suffer me to carry away Mandana with my life: The main difficulty will be to finde out a way to escape, and get out of Babylon if I should be put to it: for, as for a place of Retreat, it is easie to finde one; for since Arib'eus is in Pteria, and keeps half of Cappadocia, I cannot wish a safer Sanctuary, This Traitor was so cunning, as to make the people beleieve, that the Princesse was not averse unto such an advantageous marriage; and that it was onely the King her father whom she feared, and caused her to do as she did: But before he could go unto Pteria, he must get out of Babylon, and that was the great difficulty, there being dangers in it both without and within the Town. All this while, the soul of Mazares was in torment, and his minde much divided. As he was good and Generous, he could not without great difficulty contribute any thing unto the misfortune of the Princesse: but as he was passionately in love with her, it was much more difficult for him to consent that ever she should come into the power of Artamenes: and for his own particular interest, he had rather she were in the hands of a hated Lover, then a beloved Lover: Not but that he was terrified at the Oracle, yet the aversion which the Princesse had unto him did make him lesse esteem it: and he found much more danger in Artamenes then in him. Jealousie therefore being predominate in his heart, he applied himself mainly to the King of Assyria's desires, and that with successe, though it was not easie to get out of Babylon unseen: But Chrisantes, I am perswaded, that there is nothing so difficult, which love and jealousy together cannot bring to passe. This Prince then, told the King of Assyria, that he would finde out an expedient for it, and bade him, since he desired him to do his endeavours in it, to command the women which waited upon the Princesse, to let her have no clothes but such as were white, according to the Assyrian fash|ion, which yet she had not worn, and also the like unto Arianta and my self: The King of Assyria urging him to explain himself and his reasons for it; Mazares told him, that the course would prove infallible; and indeed, made the King confesse that it was ingenious; and presently gave orders for it, so that the next morning, Arianta and my self, much wondered when we found all our clothes taken from us, and white ones left in their roomes, such as women of Quality use to wear in Assyria. I asked the reason of it, and they told me, the King would have it so, because if it should chance the sedition increased, he might more easily put the Princesse into the Temple, and for her better security to have them passe for Assyrians: Since Mandana was not yet awake, Arianta and I did dresse our selves in them, thinking indeed, that this way might conduce to her safety: But when she called her women, and went to dresse her self, and when she saw they gave her white garments, after the Assyrian Mode, although they were very rich, yet she had such and ex|tream aversion to them, that I am verily perswaded the gods did foretell unto her, her misfortune: she would not by any means wear them, but when those which waited upon her, told her with tears in their eyes, that it was not in their power to give her any other, she did much against her minde, put them on, and sighing said, that the change of her ha|bit, should never change her heart: I would make her understand the reasons which they gave for it, but she was not satisfied with them, nor any thing pleased with this new kinde of compulsion. Mean while, the King of Assyria, and Mazares, being resolved to punish the people, were very diligent in giving out orders to that purpose. The King in person, with all the Grandees of the Court, was ready to teach the people the duty which they owed unto their Legitimate King: when a Spie which had been in the Army of Ciaxares, came unto him in a great amaze, and told him that within three or four hours within night, he should see the River Euphrates dry, and fourty thousand men enter at both ends of the Town. At the first, the King of Assyria would not believe it, but the Spie did so directly name the place, where Artamenes caused two great Trenches to be digged, and turn the River into them, that he gave credit unto his words; and the example of the River Ginde, rendred this more probable: The Spie further told him, that if the snow had not hindred the Pioners, the designe had been executed before now. But though he was very circumstantiall in his relation, yet notwithstanding the King of Assyria with Mazares, went unto the top of the Tower of Jupiter Belus, the better Page 130 to discover the Works of his Enemies, and when they were there, then the Spie shewed him, though it was far off, the earth which the Enemy had thrown up, as well to shelter themselves from being seen, as to empty the Trenches which were to receive the River Euphrates. You may imagine, Wise Chrisantes, in what a condition this Prince was. He saw from that high Place a whole great Town in Arms against him: and he saw, that he was ready to be assaulted in such a manner, that though the people had seconded him, yet he should have much ado to repell his Enemies: for since the River Euphrates was very broad, he conceived the enemy would enter at both ends of the Town in compleat Battalia; and that he had not time to raise up such works as would prevent them: But this was not the worst he feared; for he thought that as soon as the Enemy appeared, the people would endeavour to take away the Princesse, and make their own conditions with Ciaxares, by rendering her unto him: And seeing himself driven to such a necessity, as that he must defend the Palace where she was, both against the people and the King of Medes, he concluded it to be a thing impossible. At the last, being out of any hopes to keep Babylon, and the Princesse, and love prompting him unto some other course, he endeavoured to execute that designe which he and Mazares had contrived: He went down from the Tower in all hast, and seemed as if he would appease the people by lenity, hoping thereby to gain time, whilst Mazares put all things in a readinesse for the execution of their enterprize at the beginning of the night, if there were any need of it: The King of Assyria resolved not to depart, until the designe of his Enemies was in executing; for he imagined that Artamenes would enter the Town at both ends of it, and that other places would therefore be lesse guarded; because those two places would take up most of their men. But upon a sudden, we heard a terrible noise, for the River being drained in a moment, and the besiegers entred, they caused a most horrible disorder, and confusion. I shall not need to relate any further of it unto you, since I do imagine you were there; but for my Part, I never in all my life heard such an astonishment as this caused in all the streets of Babylon; In the mean time we were in great fears; for although the Princesse did imagine, that perhaps it was Artamenes, who would come and deliver her, yet the danger wherein she apprehended him, caused her fears: As for the King her father, she imagined that he would not venture himself in this attempt. As we were thus betwixt hope and fears, the King of Assyria came in to us; Mazares stayled in the garden of the Pallace; with them who were appointed for our Guard: But the King entring furiously, Madam, (said he to the Princesse, to the end she should make no resistance) the people of Babylon are in great disorder, and since they beleieve you to be the cause of the War, they would have you in their power, therefore I must put you into some place of better security then this. Sir (said she unto him) since I have put my self into the custody of the Gods, it is my duty to wait upon their pleasures, and submit unto what they shall ordain me; and you would do me a great favour, if you would leave me unto their protection; But when she saw four or five men in Arms enter, knowing she was not in a condition to resist, and not knowing that what the King of Assyria said, was untrue, she went with them, and Arianta and I followed her: she asked then, where Mazares was; and he answering her that she should see him presently, she went whither they conducted her. Then were we led into the Garden of the Palace, where Mazares did indeed stay for us: Mandana no sooner saw him, but letting the King of Assyria's hand go, she gave hers unto him, supposing now she had no cause to fear, since he was with her. Then they led us unto a back door, which almost joynd unto the Gates of the Town, which the Troops of Mazares guarded, and who were acquainted with what was de|signed. When we were ready to go out of the Garden, which was of a huge bignes|se, we saw by the help of a candle, which was brought, that the King of Assyria, the Prince Mazares, and ten men who were to be of the Party, took every one of them a white Cassack, which covered them all over, and that they covered their heads also with white. This caused us to think, that the white Garments which they gave us, were designed for the same use: as those which these Princes, and those mens were, although we could not imagine unto what end. Afterwards they brought twelve white Horses; Saddles and Bridles were of the same colour: The King of Assyria got upon one of them, and would have the Princesse to ride behinde him, but she refused, and did chuse Mazares, though with much reluctance: yet the noise in the Town did so encrease, though we were far enough from the place where it was assaulted, that her fear of falling into the hands of rude and insolent people, Page 131 caused her at the last to let Mazares have the care of her safty: Two men of quality of those ten took up Arianta and me behind them: the candle being put out, and the dore open, we went straight unto that gate of the town, which as I already told you was near it: then the King of Assyria and Mazares, commanded a Captain, in a low voice I mean a Captain which guarded that gate, to go and advertise, all the Princes and Souldiers, that they should fight it out no longer, since the town was already lost, and that as many as would might take the advantage of the dark night to save themselves, and take the benefit of this gate: we were not above twelve paces from the walls, but the King of Assyria who went a little before, did ride very softly, lest his horses feet should make to great a noise, more fearing the ears then the eyes of those we should meet: for Chrisan|tes, the ingenuity of this devise was, in that the Prince Mazares considering that all the fields were covered with snow, and because there was a great mist when we went out, it was impossible that Artamenes should make good his round, and therefore he thought it would be no hard matter to pass between two Courts of guard, and never be perceived, since white is not easily discovered in the snow, and in the night; especially since the moon did not shine: This invention of white horses, and white habits made us invisible, to those who met us, and they who we did meet not being in white as we were, were discovered a good distance off, so that we could shun them before they could see us: there was nothing therefore that the King of Assyria feared but the neighing of the horses and the horses feet: as for the first of these he put it unto fortune, but as for the noise of the horses feet, the snow was so soft that they could not be heard: the King of Assyria finding this, went a little faster and presently after we discovered the guard of Ciauxares his Army. To tell you Chrisantes, what the Princess thought, to see her self in this Equipage, and out of Babylon at that time of night, and on horsback amongst a company of men all in white going in such great silence, I should lengthen my story: at the first she was glad that she had escaped the fury of the rude multitude, so insolent as to mutiny against their Prince: and she thought that whithersoever they carried her, it would be incom|parably, more easie for Artamenes to get her out of the King of Assyrias power, then in Babylon which she thought impregnable: therefore conceiving it to be most advantageous for Artamenes, and for her own liberty, she went with them without any resistance; and thinking of nothing, but a ready way how to advertise Artamenes, that she was out of Babylon: but she no sooner discovered afar off the guard which before I told you of, but she changed her mind, for when she saw her self so near relief, she was in a mind to cry out, but thinking that if she did so, she should cause Mazares to perish as well as the King of Assyria, therefore she was silent; but whil'st she was consulting in her mind about it, the King of Assyria turned more upon his left hand, and fortunatly escaped this first danger. Yet notwithstanding, since she imagined that we should meet some other troops, she began to speak unto Mazares, who presently desired her to hold her peace, generous prince (said she unto him notwithstanding his desire, and speaking very low lest the King of Assyria should understand) if you have any reall compassion upon me and my misfortunes, permit me, as soon as we shall meet any of the King my fathers troops, to call them unto my relief, and I beseech you promise me that you will not oppose their endeavours to deliver me: and by that consequence, you will not hazard your own life which is very dear unto me: you may conceive I could have done it, without speaking unto you, but being so much obliged unto you as I am: I should think the gods would punish me if I should cause your death: Madam (said he unto her, lower then she spoke) the gods do know how much I wish you satisfaction: But Madam I only promised you to prevent the King, from attempting any thing against that reverence which is your due: And I promised that without any scruple, because I did him service also by it, in preventing him from committing a crime: And I do againe promise you Madam, that as long as I live you shall not suffer the least violence from him: But Madam can I in honour betray him thus? to let him be killed, and commit you into the hands of his enemies? yet notwithstanding Madam, if you will do it you may, but I do protest unto you before the gods who hear me, that though I do escape from the fury of your souldiers, yet will I run my sword through my heart, to the end I may not be blamed and shamed by such an act which doubtless you have not considered before you did solicit me. Moreover Madam, since it is night, in striking at me they may chance hit you, and so your desires to recover your liberty may become your death: In the name of the gods therefore Madam, do not expose your self unto a danger, whereof perhaps I cannot heal you: the Princess was so Page 132 troubled, and Mazares spake so movingly that she knew not what to resolve upon: sometimes she resolved to cry out: sometimes pitty of Mazares restrained her. Afterwards taking up the resolution to call the first she saw, she found that she had not the power to do it, and that she determined upon a thing which was impossible for her, for my part, I know that it was not in my power to pronounce a word, and when I would have spoke, I trembled out of astonishment and fear: for we saw in the field, many Tents, Sentinels, Courts of guard, men which marched, and others which stood still; But the King of Assyria who was our guide, did sometimes turne to the right hand, and sometimes to the left; and very handsomly avoyded all those, whom the whitness of the snow discovered unto him: But Chrisantes, to leave that place, which troubled us so much, give me leave to tell you, that after we had avoided the troops of Ciauxares above a hundred times, and were not above two furlongs from a wood, in which the King of Assyria feared no dan|ger, because it was very thick and dark, and he was acquainted with all the turnings in it, having been often hunting in it. But the horse on which Mazares and the Princess did ride began violently to Neigh when we were within forty paces from a place, where a company of archers who were horsed, did then quarter, who having received or|ders to come neerer Babylon, did leave that place, and go thither in all hast: some of these Archers, being already horsed, and having heard this neighing, from that side where they were took the Alarme, and went towards the place where they heard the noise; but seeing nothing, they would have returned, had not one of their horses Neighed, in answer as it were unto the first, and caused them to advance further on; mean while the king of Assyria who conducted us, mended his Pace, and we went faster then before: so that sometimes we saw these men come streight towards us, and sometimes againe go from us: for their parts I beleieve they much vexed to hear horses and could find none, but at the last being out of hopes to find us, because we changed our way sometimes on the one side, and sometimes on the other: they shot their arrowes at random and levelled so unluckily, that one of their arrowes did give Mazares a slight wound in his shoulder, and another came so neer Mandanas head, that the extremity of her fears, made her to recover her voice, and to cry out, though she did not intend it: this cry, being heard by those who shot, they galloped directly to the place where they thought they heard it; But in the mean while the King of Assyria shifted places; and in lieu of going forward he went backward, and bad us ride faster. But since we were not above thirty paces from the wood, he caused those eight which carried no women to stand still, until such time as he imagined us to be in the wood, and then he and his men galloped away as fast as they could, and vanished out of the sight of them whom he fought with a while, who doubtless did think there was some enchantment in the place: At his returne, we understood how they saw two of those who assaulted them to fall dead, and one of his troop received a slight hurt. As the wood was dark, and black, the very same whitness which made us invisible in the plaines did help the King of Assyria to dis|cover us againe and to Joyne companies: In conclusion, Chrisantes, being come into this wood as I told you, the King of Assyria did lead us unto a little kind of habitation, where a sort of poor menlived, whose profession was to find out a kind of earth whereof the wonderfull cement wherewith the wals of Babylon were built, is made; and when day begun to break, we lighted from horse, and passed away all the day in that Cabin, where our weariness afforded us more rest, then the accommodations of that place could. But Chrisantes not to spend more time, in relating things of little consequence, we went with much weariness the next night unto a little town which our army had not taken, nor as yet been on that side; neither was of strength to defend themselves if you had come unto it: the King of Assyria there got a Coach for the Princess, where Arianta and I found room also: and, both Princes went on horsback as our convoy. But without any further particularizing the way we went, we came at the last into Cappadocia, and a little after, unto Pteria: at our first arivall the Princess was very much joyed to see it; yet, a while after she found her self much more unhappy then she thought for the thought of being then a captive in that place where she had been so long free and absolute, did extreemly double her sorrow: moreover, the imagination she should so domineer over the King her fathers subjects, was a great vexation to her: but the great torment of all was, that she was still in the King of Assyrias power, and that she knew no way to let Artamenes know where she was: mean while Mazares continued alwaies very civill, obliging, and amorous, and the king of Assyria was still very coarsly treated. A few dayes after when Page 133 the taking of Babylon was more certainly known, he consulted with Aribeus what was best to be done, but when he heard that Ciauxares his army was marching towards Cappadocia, they brought us hither by reason of the conveniencie of the sea, which the King of Assyria thought would be a way to prevent the Princess from ever coming into the hands of Artamenes. Aribeus and he endeavoured all they could to get up fresh troops, mal|king their Rendezvous at Pteria, to the end it might not be discovered we were at Sinope. But presently after, they had intelligence that your army came up so fast, that it was im|possible for them to get any such considerable force together as could give a second battle, which did drive the King of Assyria into extream despair: and spoke with much more violence then heretofore he used: yet whether he was submissive, or whether he was furious, all was one, for he could no way move Mandana, to give him one favourable word. Yet one day, he called Mazares unto him, and layed before him all his misfortunes: truly (said he unto him) I am brought to such a pass, that I have no other consolati|on to hope for in my life, but to make Artamenes as unfortunat as my self, although it is in a different manner: The oracle indeed does make me hope well, but Mandana drives me into utter despair, and fortune has so defeated all my designs, that I am reduced unto such extremities, as are above both my patience and my reason: that which I intend (pursued this desperat Prince) is to make sure of the gallies and ships within this port, so that as soon as I see the army of Ciauxares appear, and find that I am not able to oppose it, I can then embark with Aribeus and the Princess, and be sure to carry her out of the reach of Artamenes. But Sir, (answered Mazares much grieved) what course will you then take? I know not well, (replied the King of Assyria) but if all the Princes my allies do deny me sanctuary within their dominions, I will rather turne pirate, then yield up the Princess unto Artamenes: yes Mazares, I will rather perish a thousand times: And if I see that I am pursued at sea by Artamenes (which as yet he cannot do, having no ships for it) I will rather split my ship against a rock, then be taken and lose the Princess: moreover I must not be far off Mandana, but keep close with her and wait upon the event of the Oracle: As for you, said he, my dear Mazares, it is not just that I should engage you any deeper in my misfortunes; though you would, I would not suffer it. Therefore I wish you to go back unto the King your father, and endeavour to be more happy then I am. Mazares was now put to a shrewd dilemma, for he could not consent to leave the Princess alone with the King of Assyria; and yet he perceived by the Kings manner of speaking unto him, that he would not suffer him to accompany him any longer; yet he pressed him to stay, but the more urgent he was in it, the more obstinate was the King: furthermore, he perceived, that if he departed, the Princess would be the most unfortunat woman in the world; so that both in respect of his pitty, and in respect of his passion, he was infinitely to be lamented: at last being transported with such passions as was unknown unto himself, he came unto the Princess, and ingeniously discovered the King of Assyrias de|signe: you may well imagin what sorrow and despair this newes brought unto her, espe|cially when he told that he would by no means permit him to stay any longer with him: Ah Mazares, said she unto him, I shall absolutely die if you forsake me, and there is no resolution so violent, which I shall not take, if I be left alone under the King of Assyrias protection: In the name of the gods, said she unto him, perswade him, and tell him, that he shall never obtaine the least part of my affection; and by consequence, you will do him no ill office, if you can move him to harken unto my prayers and tears, and if you can procure my liberty: In the name of the gods once more consider what a most lamenta|ble destiny will it be for Mandana to wander upon the seas, with a Prince whom she hates, and shall more and more hate him; and who shall resolve to throw her self into the bot|tom of the sea, the first time that he shall speak of his unjust passion unto her: consider well Mazares what you have to do, and know that the gods will require at your hands, an account of my life, if you be the cause of my death: would you not have me live & acknow|ledg my great obligations unto you? would you have me die the most miserable woman upon earth: Oh Madam, (answered Mazares, with extream melancholy) I wish the thoughts of my heart, and how much I would do for you were well known unto you: I do know (answered she) that you are the most obliging Prince upon the earth, and that nothing hinders you from satisfying my desires, but an ill grounded scruple of generosity: for indeed Mazares I am fully perswaded, that you do compassionate my misfortunes, and that you intend friendship unto me: But yet since you cannot save me, you will suffer me to perish, and all because you are affraid to do an unj|ust act. But know generous Prince, Page 119 that it is no injustice to prevent another from committing a most horrible piece of injustice: In short Chrisantes, the Princesse spoke so prevalently unto Mazares, that he desired two dayes time to resolve with himself what to do; But oh heavens! Orsanos told me, that he verily believed that the turbulency of his thoughts during this time would have cost him his life: Sometimes he resolved to be faithful unto the King of Assyria in spite of his pas|sion; sometimes he would not quench his love, but in favour of Mandana; afterwards not being able to resolve either upon the one or the other; he thought how he might benefit himself by the misfortunes of another: At the last (said he unto himself) I see Mandana does esteem, and is very friendly unto me; yet it is but a bare esteem, and a friendship only, though she must know that I love her: Moreover, there is a great difference between the termes on which the King, of Assyria stands, and those on which I am with her, for there is a natural antipathy between her and him; but she is very friendly unto me, & I am perswaded it is not far off a disposition to receive some impressions of love, as well as much tenderness and esteem; yet I know very well, that there is more likelihood that I shall be unhappy, then he has hopes of Mandana's love: But alas, from what other course can I find any more sweetness and satisfaction from her? If I continue faithful unto the King of Assyria, then he will put to Sea with the Princesse, and if I leave her, I am certain she will hate me for being so inhumane, as to expose her unto so great a torment: I am certain I shall never see her again, and I am sure to endure an intolerable torment, in thinking she is with the King of Assyria, who still has great hopes of her. On the other side, if I betray a Prince from whom I have the honour to be a kinsman, to whom I am (<...> vassal, who has made choice of me to be his confidant, and if I should put the Princesse into the hands of Artamenes, should I not then be the most unhappy man alive? I should commit a crime, and such a one as would make me most unfortunate, there being nothing more insufferable, then to see the party loved, in the power of a Rival who is loved: Oh no, no, Mazares cannot make choice of either, since he sees a crime, and a misfortune on both sides. If he hearken unto reason, it will tell him, that we ought not to betray those who trust us: If he give ear unto his passion, it will tell him quite contrary, that we must never forsake the party loved, and that all one can do to possesse her, is just. Which way soever I carry the matter, I must either betray the King of Assyria, or the Princesse, and betray my self also, since I wound my reputation in it; Therefore if I must needs commit a crime, let me commit that which is most advantageous to me, and which will keep me from dying desperate. In conclusion, Chrisantes, this amorous Prince, in spite of all his virtue, was so transported with the violence of his love, that he resolved not only to betray the King of Assyria, but to delude Mandana also: yet truly, I think, never any did more severely punish himself then Mazares did, by his perpetual remorse of soul; for I never in all my melancholly did equal his; yet since he was fully resolved what to do, he sought out means to assure himself of a Galley, and easily found one; because the King of Assyria intending to make use of all the Gallies and Ships in Sinope, he did put out those who formerly commanded them, and put in others which did more absolutely depend upon him: There was one of these Captains, who knowing certainly he should be put out as the rest were, who grumbled exceedingly at it; and unto him Mazares addressed himself, in whose soul he discovered such adisposition, as was fit for his design: Mazares then having made sure of this Galley, was certain he could carry away the Princesse when he pleased; for his commands passed within the Castle, as well as the King of Assyria's; and since the Castle was so near the Haven, he had not above twenty paces to go before he was at the Galley which this Captaine who was of the conspiracy commanded, for by fortune the Galley was on that side: But since he was an expert man, and used to war, he told Mazares, that the better to secure his design, and also to satisfie his revenge upon his companions, he would set fire in all the Gallies and Ships which remained in the Port, lest they should follow after, and that all these new Captains might not long enjoy their new conferred offices, or at least put them into such a condition as they should not be able to do any execution. Although Mazares did see it was well thought upon, and almost necessary for his design, yet it went against the hair of his disposition, not for fear of the Ships, in which few people would be lost, but lest it should fire the Town: notwithstanding the Captain said thus unto him; Sir, although Sinop* should be set on fire, yet it is a Rebellious Town, and deserves it: And as for the King of Assyria. who troubles you so much, the fire will be quenched before it can reach the Castle: Truth is, this Captain spoke so rationally, that Mazares consented unto him, Page 135 and the Captain took upon him the execution of the enterprize. This Prince intending to gain the heart of Mandana, designed to carry her into Bithynia, where he was in hopes to find some place of security, and indeed he could not make a better choice; for he was kinsman unto Arsamones, and Arsamones was enemy unto the King of Assyria, by reason of the Princesse Istrina, with whom he was in good favour all the while she was in Babylon: Moreover he made war against another lover of Mandana, who was the King of Pontus, and Artamenes having moved Ciaxares to lend some forces unto his enemy, therefore he thought that he could not make choice of a safer sanctuary. At that time there came into Sinope a famous Pirate, who was reported to be a man of quality and great courage, who being much weather-beaten, put in there to repair his Ships; the King of Assyria received him very kindly, and told Mazares that he was even ravished with the happy meeting with him, because that by that time the Ships of this Pirate were ready to make sail, he would put to Sea with him, and be under his conduct, for he was a man whom none ever knew conquered; and knew all the Seas, better then any other man. Mazares, understanding the King of Assyria's design so well, did make more haste to execute his own; and went unto the Princesse, Madam (said he to her, in a most melancholy manner) there is a predominate power, which I cannot resist, and which makes me resolve to betray the King of Assyria, and carry you out of his reach: He has a design to carry you away very shortly; therefore he must be presently prevented; I asked you sometime to resolve with my self, and my resolution is settled; therefore, if you please, there is a Galley ready to receive you the next night: Ah, Mazares, (said she unto him) is it possible it can be so soon? To tell you Chrisantes, all that Mandana said, by way of thanks for the compassion which he had on her misfortunes, would be a very difficult task, so much did she aggravate her acknowledgments unto him. Mazares received her thanks with so much confusion, & turbulency of mind, that she thought her self the more obliged, supposing that the betraying of the King of Assyria was the only cause of it. But Mazares (said she unto him) which way shall we go, to go safely unto some place where the King my father is? Madam (answered he) when we are out of the power of your enemy, we shall then think better upon that: Its true, (said she) and so presently left him: But night being come, and well on, the Prince Mazares, who had not only gained the good will of those who kept the Castle gates which was towards the Port, but also all the Souldiers in the Castle, went to fetch the Princesse, who was much troubled, what to do with Arianta, in whom she did not confide; she thought therefore to carry her with her, because if she were left behind, she would make a great noise of the matter: We told her therefore that the King of Assyria, had sent Mazares unto the Prin[cesse] to tell her, that she must take Ship, and because she should not suspect any thing, we seeming to be very sorry in yielding obedience to him; for we began to think that she kept intelligence with the King. I forgot to tell you, that Mandana, who would as well as she could make it known unto Mazares, that she had a care of his protection, had writ a Letter unto the King of Assyria: but whilst we were staying in the outer chamber, at that hour when Mazares told us we were to depart; the Princesse bethought her self, how she had forgotten to leave the Letter upon the Table, and entreated him that he would take so much pains as to carry it thither, telling him, that if he would open it, he might there find what she had written unto the King concerning him, so that the Prince took it, and carried it unto the Princesse chamber, where, as I advised him, he did read the letter; I will not relate the contents of it, for you will presently after imagine it. So Chrisantes, we got out of the Castle, and we took Ship, and were presently out of Sinope; immediately after, we saw the Port all on fire, and in a moment after that, all the Town also, which did extremely surprise and grieve the Princesse; for her soul was so tender and full of pity, that she would never have consented unto it, if she had known of the project; but yet her joy to be out of the King of Assyria's power, did comfort her in those sorrows which proceeded only from compassion; and she termed Mazares her deliverer a hundred times over: Mean while, the Sea began to be high, and the Mariners told us there was like to be a storm, as presently after it began, and the wind which was so favourable for us, turned quite contrary, and whether we would or no, did blow us above twenty times towards the Port of Sinope: To tell you how the Princesse was troubled at this accident, would make you sad, as we were; It will be sufficient to tell you, how she moved Mazares to promise her, that in case the Tempest was above the Pilots art, or the force of Oars, he would rather split the Galley against the Castle tower, then to land again in the Port of Sinope: at the last, day beginning to dawn, our fears were lesse, as well because Page 136 the terrors of darknesse vanished, as because at the Sun rising, the winds were calm[er]. The Princesse being then upon the deck, discovered that there were Souldiers in Sinope, fighting in the midst of the flames, at the foot of the tower: She no sooner saw it, but looking upon Mazares with extream joy; Ah generous Prince (said she unto him) perhaps the tempest has been our friend, since if it had not been, I should not have seen what I do. See (said she unto him) look upon the Troops which are fighting in Sinope; without all doubt it is the King my father his Army, and perhaps Artamenes is there also; if so, it is easie for him to become master of a burning Town, and to take the King of Assyria also: Therefore my dear deliverer, give command unto the Rowers that they make no such haste away; Let them send one in a little Boat to see whether it be as I say, or no: For if it be, there is no need of going any further, since we have relief so near. Mazares hearing the Princesse say so, began to change colour; and looked a long while upon the Troops which she shewed him, and he knew much better then she, that they were the Troops of Ciaxares; therefore without giving any answer unto the Princesse, he gave command to Rowe away with all possible haste. Mandana being extremely surprised at this command, and believing that she did not well understand him, or that the Prince had mistook himself: My dear deliverer (said she unto him) do you know what you say, and did you hear me? Oh Madam, (said he unto her, and kneeled) bestow no more that name upon me, whereof I am unworthy; and suspend your judgement of me, I beseech you, until you know what I have done against my self, before I will attempt any thing against you: Do not call me either your deliverer or your ravisher, nor pronounce an unjust sentence against him who is the most passionate of all your adorers: How, (said the Princesse, in a mighty maze) can Mazares not be generous, is it possible he should deceive me? Is not then Mandana at liberty? Mazares, (replied the Prince, with unequalled sorrow) was born generous, and has lived so, until love of Mandana did force his heart to degenerate: But Madam (pursued he) you shall be free; and I do protest unto you in the presence of the gods, whom I have incensed, that you shall never have any cause to complain of my violence; I will only carry you unto a place, Madam, where I may perfectly make known unto you, the most respective passion that ever was; you have testified some signs of friendship towards me, and I beseech you do not presently passe from friendship unto hatred; give me a few dayes time to acquaint you with my thoughts of Mandana. No Mazares (sad she unto him) I cannot consent unto your desire: you are now either the absolute master of my hatred or of my friendship: and if you do not immediately repent of your crime, I shall hate you a thousand times more then ever I hated the King of Assyria, and shall esteem you incomparably more culpable, but also (interrupted the Prince) more amorous: No, no, (said she unto him) deceive not your self in that; I shall never terme an unjust passion, love, but will phrase it phrensie, fury, or that which is worse. Why Mazares, (said she all in tears) will you lose my esteem and friendship? you whom I respected as my protector in Babylon, as my deliverer in Sinope: I perceive you had rather be my ravisher and my enemy, and see me die in sorrow, then live a happy life? Do you not see, (said she, in observing how the Seas began to be a little more boistrous) how you do incense the gods, and that if you do not appease them by a speedy repentance, they will with shipwrack punish your crime? Ah Madam, (cried out this unfortunate Prince) so they will be pleased to save you from the shipwrack, how happy should I be, if I perished in it? and how happy should I have been, if I had died in Babylon whilst I was innocent? But Madam, what would you have me do? how could I every day look upon Man[dana], and find her so sweet, so civil, so pleasing, and so fair, and yet not love her? some who never saw you but angry at them, yet could not chuse but love you; and since I found you so infinitely obliging, was it possible but I should be possessed with most violent passion? No, no, it was absolutely impossible: When the Princesse saw that Mazares continued in his resolution, she began to be so desperately incensed, as I never saw her in my life: Alas (said she) into what a pitiful condition am I brought? and what unhappy consequences does this little beauty which the gods have bestowed upon me produce, since it in[fuse]th into those who have any affection unto me, only unjust thoughts? But let me take courage (said she when she saw the Sea more boistrous then ever) I shall presently find an end of all my misfortunes in ending my life; and shall have so much comfort as to perish with one of my enemies: When Mazares, saw the Princesse so very angry, and in so great a danger, and also that he had committed an unprofitable sin; he became so extremely desperate, that he offered to throw himself into the sea; and I think if his thoughts of the Page 137 Princesse and her interest had not restrained him, he had done it. Madam (said he unto her) I am infinitely sorry, that I have exposed your life unto so much danger: No, no, (said she unto him) It is only repentance which I desire from you; and I wish you to steer your course another way, that if I do suffer shipwrack, the waves may waft me unto the Cappadocian coast. But Chrisantes, I cannot repeat all that the Princesse said unto Mazares, nor all his replies, but certainly although he was culpable, yet he expressed such moving language, as made appear he was full of pity: The Princesse also expressed her self in such just and lamentable termes, that she was able to move cruelty it self: Mean while it was not possible to chuse our course, we must now obey the winde and storme: It did often blow us towards the foot of the Tower, and then upon a sudden turning quite contrary, it drove us far off Sinope: We continued all that day, and the night following in continuall tossings upon the surges of the Sea; sometimes to the right hand, sometimes to the left, and which way soever we went, we found danger: Oars were of no use; Sails would not abide the winde, which whifled from all sides; and all this while there was no hopes of any thing but present death. As soon as day appeared and the Tempest still continuing as boisterous as ever, the Princesse desired Mazares to repent of his Act; for as long as it was night, she kept in her Cabin, where out of respect, Mazares would not enter, although he knew Mandana could not sleep: but it beginning to be light, the Princesse as as I told you, renewed her complaints and prayers, with so many Tears, and in such a violent manner, that Mazares without giving the Princesse any answer went unto the Pil[ot];

and whether it was by virtue of his order (as Orsanes beleevs) or else by the force of the windes, we saw the Pilote turn the Galley towards Sinope. But, Oh Heavens, a huge blast of winde, meeting with a great Billow, made the Galley lean on one side; the Rudder broke, and the Galley grated upon the point of a Rock, so that it turned, and broke in turning; I caught hold of the Princesse, Arianta hold of me, and I heard a terrible outcry, amongst which I knew the voice of Mazares, who cried out; O ye Just gods, preserve the Princesse; after this I knew not what became of us: onely this I remember, that in lieu of seeing water, me thought I saw a great fire, which overwhelmed me, and made me lose all my understanding: Yet Chrisantes, the prayers of unfortunate Mazares were heard, and we escaped this great danger: But let me tell you, it was most strangely, and will astonish you, perhaps, almost as much as it did us. Be pleased to understand then, that the first thing I saw after our shipwrack, was as I did a little open my eyes, I saw men who endeavoured as well as they could to make me let go my hold of the Princess (for you know Chrisantes, it is the quality of those who are in water to hold whatsoever they catch at): this sight, and the hurt these men did me, did more revive me then all the remedies they gave me afterwards; so that striving with them, what would you have (said I to them) and who are you? We are such (answered they unto me) as would save the Princess Mandana, and help you: at these words I let go my hold, and loosed the Princess, also told them, that the gods would recompence them for so charitable an office. After this, coming a little better unto my self, I first saw Arianta, and then the Princess, who revived also as well as I, and who after she opened her eyes did call upon me, almost not knowing what she said: I was yet so dizzy, that I had much ado to rise from the bed whereon they had laid me, but her voice did infuse such fresh strength into me, that I came unto her as she was very attentively looking upon a man, who was kneeling by her bed side, and who holding her by the arm, did try by her Pulse, whether she had strength to revive; when I was come unto her, and she knew me; Martesia (said she unto me, and pulling her arm out of the hands of that man who held it, with as much hast as her weakness would permit her) where are we? Madam (replied the man) you are in a place where you have absolute power and authority; the voice surprizing both her and me, she raised her self to look upon him who answered; and then we both together found that he who thus had saved us, was the King of Pontus. The King of Pontus (said Chrisantes, and Feraulas, interrupting him) is he in love with the Princesse whom Artamenes took Prisoner? Oh heavens, can such a most prodigious accident prove true?

Yes Wise Chrisantes (said Martesia) and see how it fell out: You very well know, I beleieve, the ill successe which he has had in his Wars against Artamenes; and how in both his Kingdoms he has but one Maritime Town left, in which he was besieged. But I beleieve you know not, how when he saw this Town was ready to be lost, he resolved to convey himself out of the victory of his enemies, and flee away in a ship, as he did. That which is the greatest wonder is, that this Prince not knowing where to finde any safety Page 138 for himself, and perhaps being pressed unto it by the violence of his passion, which in the midst of his misfortunes did not forsake him: did intend to come and offer himself unto Ciaxares, to help him in regaining his daughter from the King of Assyria; for he had intelligence of her being taken away, before he was besieged: So that embarking himself with that resolution, he came upon the coast of Cappadocia to informe himself in the state of things: and he came thither just in the nick to save our lives: his ship which the tempest had tossed as well as our Galley, was not far off us when we began to suffer shipwrack, although his Pilot endeavoured the place where we were. This Prince being ever very Generous and Noble, and seeing us ready to perish so neer him, commanded that all those who appeared above water, should be saved if it were possible: for as ships do better endure a storm then Galleys can, so he might do it without any great danger unto himself: Presently, as if the angry waves were appeased by our shipwrack, there happened a sudden calm at Sea, the windes were hushd immediatly; and all the mountainous waves levelled in a moment; so that the King of Pontus putting a small boat into the sea his men saved many others, amongst which Orsanes who came now with me was one: As they were all busied in this charitable office, and this Prince being upon the Deck of the ship, and perhaps, thinking himself more unfortunate in the losse of his two Kingdoms, then those men whom he saw floting, were in the losse of their lives, he discovered amongst the waves some women, whose clothes kept them above the water: This object moving him unto much compassion, he commanded in all hast that his men should save them; though no other interest in the world did move him unto it, but his own naturall pity: But imagine you Chrisantes how this Prince was surprized, when after they had took us out of the water, and brought us into his Cabin, he knew the Princesse Mandana. He presently forgot all his losses, and thought upon nothing but saving that life, which had long since made him lose his liberty. These were this Princes cogitations; when, as I told you before, he assured the Princesse, that she was in a place where she had absolute power, and authority. Mandana, knowing his voice as well as I, Sir (said she unto him) you see that you are not misfortunate alone: But to acknowledg the good office you have done me, I wish that you would make such use of this opportunity, which the gods have given you, to assist an unfortunate Princesse, as that you may oblige her to assist you again: Madam (said he unto her) I will complain of my destinies no longer, but I think my self obliged to thank the Heavens for the losse of my Kingdoms, since if I had not lost them, I should not have had the good fortune to save your life, and should not have hindered the Universe from losing her fairest Ornament: But Madam, you are not now in a condition to be spoken unto without troubling you; and since Martesia is with you, also able to help you, the respects which I owe you, bids me withdraw: All my men has Orders to obey your Women, said he to Arianta, and my self: they need but ask what is wanting, and follow the advice of a Physitian, who is here with me, and who has already begun to assist you; And indeed by good fortune, there was a Graecian Physitian, who followed this Prince in his flight, who was very helpfull unto us; for certainly he was a man very knowing in his Art, being a Practiser under that famous Hippocrates, who is so cried up thorowout the whole World. This Prince being gone out, and his men supplying us with all necessities, we undressed the Princesse, and got her into bed: and afterwards Arianta and I having dried our clothes, and taken an admirable water, which the Physitian gave us, whose vertue was to comfort the heart, and temper the agitation of the blood, we passed away all that day and the next night in very good rest; for to tell you truly, our fears of death, and the wearinesse of our bodies, did whether we would or no, cause sleep to suspend our unquiet thoughts. The Princesse she sighed very often, and could not chuse but admire at the prodigiousnesse of our chance; so that after she waked, and saw I was there, and that Arianta slept on, she called me; as our bed by her order was in her Cabin, I no sooner heard her, but I rose, and dressed my self hastily, then went unto her: I found her indeed not ill, considering the illness of the accident, yet I found not her minde very Serene. Well Martesia (said she unto me) what do you think of our Fortune? where is our hopes? Madam, said I unto her, there are such miraculous accidents which do befall us, that I do think it much rashnesse to judge what our future events will be; for truly Madam, since the Prince Mazares has deceived me, I can trust no more in any one, but must needs mistrust all, yet I am most certain we have escaped a most miraculous danger, which seemed inevitable, and I hope that the same gods who saved you, will protect you: For my part, I beleieve the tempest did onely rise to punish the unfortunate Page 139 Mazares. Perhaps (replied the Princesse) he is escaped as well as we; for when our Galley was split, and after we were in the water, I either saw him, or imagined that he held me up by a scarf, which I then had about me; but when I resisted him, and did strive to be loose from him, the scarf did loose of it self, and after that I lost both my reason and my understanding faculties: Madam, said I unto her, that which you tell me is more then an imagination, for your scarf is not to be found, and therefore it is to be thought, that the unfortunate Mazares is perished, and therefore the Tempest, as I said, did rise onely to punish him: And perhaps also (added the Princesse) that the gods have preserved me, to make me more miserable; for truly Martesia, it is very strange, that these two, the King of Assyria, and the King of Pontus, whom of all men living in the World I most feared to fall into their power, that one of these Princes, whom I thought engaged in a troublesome War, and who perhaps, never was at Sea but this one time, that this Prince I say, should lose both his Kingdoms, and fleeing from a Town (which as his Physitian told me) he could not keep, he should take the direct way to meet me; and that his ship, which in all reason, should have shun'd the Land, should get no further from it; and that he should come just at the minuit of our shipwrack; that he should save me, and keep me in his power; I tell you Martesia, these prodigious casualties make me all fear. But, Madam, (said I unto her) the misfortune of this Prince will be your security: for what can a King without a Kingdome do? and what Sanctuary could he finde if he should offer any violence unto you, or detain you against your minde? I know not my Martesia, (answered the Princesse) but I am sure my fears are above my hopes: not but that I have prevalent Reasons to induce the King of Pontus to do as I would desire; but Martesia, my Fate is to make all men I deal with to lose their Reason: I banish vertue out of the souls of them who love me; I alter all their good inclinations: And I think it a miracle, that Artamenes in loving me, should retain his Generosity. Then Chrisantes whilst the Princesse was thus discoursing with me, the King of Pontus, who had changed his course, and made towards the main Sea, was no lesse unquiet in his minde then the Princesse was; and going into another chamber with one of his servants, called Pharnabases, in whom he had great confidence, he began to relate the present state of his soul unto him. Orsanes who is here, and who endured the shipwrack better then we, because he could swim, was in another little Room neer them, where he could hear all they said, and all which he related unto me the next morning: for although he had been the servant of Mazares, yet he was so serviceable unto us whilst we were in Babylon, that we did not use him ill: Orsanes then being in that place I told you of, heard the King say unto the man; It must be acknowledged Pharnabases, that my destiny is odde, and that the gods do treat me in a rigorous manner: For besides the consideration of the ancient misfortunes of my House, if I call to minde all which hath happened unto me by reason of my passionate love of Mandana, may I not well beleieve that I am reserved for crosse adventures. I was left as a Hostage with Ciaxares, and I became enamoured with Mandana his Daughter: I durst not then declare it openly, because that then there was no hopes of my being King: Yet I was no sooner out of that Prison, but I was presently in the Throne, and then I demanded the Princesse Mandana of Ciaxares her father, by way of Marriage, and he denied me: I began a War, and was unfortunate in it: I was taken Prisoner, and did passionately love my vanquisher: I came out of prison by the assistance of his Generosity: Then did I enter into a Civil War; not being able to break those chains which tied me unto Mandana: What should I say Pharnabases? I have been beaten, pursued, besieged, and persecuted by them who my Father left subjects unto me, and who are now become my mortall enemies: I had once two Crowns upon my head, but now I am forced to flee in one single ship, as my onely safety and retreat: I am reduced unto this extremity; I finde Mandana, whom I ever adored in my heart, at the very point of death; It was my hap to save her, and now I have her in my power; Ah Pharnabases, how much would this last adventure advantage me, if I could make good use of it? I should value the losse of both my two Kingdoms at a low rate, if I could but conquer the heart of Mandana. But alas, that likelihood is there, that the gods will ever permit me to so glorious a Conquest? If ever they had intended me such a happinesse, they would never have taken my two Crowns from me: But also what likelihood was there to finde this Princesse in such a deplorable condition? or that they should ever afford me so much joy, as to have her in my power; surely they intended me some consolation for the losse of my two Crowns: No, no, I will still hope that since they have given me possession of such an unestimable Treasure, which Page 141 does not belong unto me, and which I am unworthy of, they will render me that which does belong unto me. But oh heavens, I am not rightly amorous to remember any crowns, at the feet of Mandana: no proud passion, which vaunts and domineers in the hearts of all men, thou shalt not do so in mine, and love shall surmount thee: yes, in spite of all my losses, all my disgraces; and all my ambition, this very one thought that Mandana is in my power, shall joyce me, and make me willingly forsake them all: But yet, thou unfortunat Prince, what canst thou do? Is it possible that a King who is turned out of his dominions, whose imaginations can think of nothing but, subjecting thrones, Broken Scepters, and Crushed Crowns, can be sensible of any delights? but on the other side? is it possible to see Mandana, and Mandana risen from the dead, and risen by thee, and not be sensible of so much Joy as may comfort thee in all thy sorrowes? No, no, this is a priviledg of love, which ambition cannot dispute for: The Joyes of ambition are not alwayes serene; and the remembrance of my losses do sometimes trouble me: but the Image of Mandana no sooner comes into my memory, but all those melancholly thoughts forsake me, those mists vanish and, I see nothing but Mandana; yes Pharnabases, I no sooner apply my self unto this pleasing thought, but I know not whether I am still upon a throne, or whether I be thrown out of it; whether I be upon the sea, or whether I am upon earth: I know only that I never think upon regaining my kingdomes, nor of revenging my self upon my enemies: All my thoughts are how to vanquish the civility of my Princess. But Pharnabases the enterprise is extremely difficult, and I shall have much a do to find out such reasons, as can give me any hopes of softening the severity of Mandana. The obligation Sir, which she owes you, (replied Pharnabases) is argument sufficient to move her mind; and I think that such a one as owes unto you a life were extremely unjust, if she did deny you her affection: alas Pharnabases (said the King unto him) it seemes you are not acquainted with Mandana: yet know thus much, that although I should expose my own life a thousand and a thousand times to preserve hers, yet would she owe me nothing; for it is no more then duty of all such as have the honour to know her, to do as much, out of their love unto her, and I should do as much, although I were certain to be extremely hated eternally. But Pharnabases, my Joy to have such a treasure in my possession, which I value at a far higher rate than the empire of all Asia, is both a most sweet, and a most bitter, grief unto me, since I shall not now be troubled by the misfortune of any Rival; for I understand by one of them who escaped the shipwreck, that the Princess was ever very averse unto the King of Assyria; and that though he had her in the prime town in the world, yet could he not move her at all: what can I then hope to do? who cannot present her with any crowns or scepters and has nothing left in my power to give her but that same heart which she has so often refused: Ah Pharnabases! Ambition is a great incitement unto love, Crowns and Scepters moves hearts which are most insensible: I cannot think, a Prince who is driven out of his dominions, and can present nothing but a share in his misfortunes, is in a condition to strike deep into the mind of Mandana: For my part, (said Pharnabases) I think you complain of this accident, which you rather ought to rejoice at, because if you restore the Princess Mandana unto her father, I am certain that the same army wherewith he intended to take Babylon, and since is master of it, and which as these men who have escaped from the shipwreck, do say, will be presently returned into Cappadocia, shall be employed to reconquer your estate againe: and I am certain, that Artamenes who you so much speak of will not deny you his assistance: I do confess Pharnabases, and am fully persuaded that it would be more prudent and Judicious to take the course you speak of, rather than to humour my extreme passion: But yet in doing so, I should be more ambitious than amorous, and love a crown better than I do Mandana, and not prefer her as I do above all the Crowns and Scepters upon earth: for although he do give me his army, yet will he not give me his daughter: so that if I part with her I shall be almost certain to regain my Crown, but then I shall be certain also to lose Mandana: Ha Pharnabases there is no comparison in the choice of these two; and I had much rather never get my Crown, then never see Mandana againe: But Sir, answered Pharnabases, all your thoughts of ambition and Crowns will be but thorns in your heart, and you would be still unhappy unless you were loved: and I do make it a grand question whether you ever will be so: as long as you are without a Crown, without a Scepter, without a habitation, but as thus a wanderer, a fugitive, and an unfortunate man: consider Sir, I beseech you, that by restoring this Princess you will gain a potent protector, and find a safe sanctuary: and that if Page 142 you do not restore her, then you know not where to find a place of retreat in all the earth: and you will ruin your self under the arms of an enemy, who in the turning of an eye can command two hundred thousand men: I do confess Pharnabases (answered the King) that all you say is true: But I know also that I have a more formidable enemy in my own heart which I know not how to overcome, and who I should be sorry if he did so: yes Pharnabases, the sight of Mandana has so much inflamed my passion, that I can harken unto nothing but what will satisfy it. I know that in lieu of a gallant act, I shall commit a crime; but what should I do? It is the violence of love enforceth me to it: and I conceive it a thing absolutely impossible to have one who is beloved as I love Mandana in ones power, and voluntarily to part with her: moreover there are not the same reasons why she should hate me, as there are why she should hate the King of Assyria; for I did not take her away as he did, but on the contrary I saved her life, and rescued her out of the arms of death: she cannot therefore without great injustice call me her Ravisher, since I did only preserve that treasure which the gods did send me as a cordiall after all my losses: But alas, how can I keep this unvaluable treasure in a poor single ship without any refuge or retreat? and can I find in my heart to make her unto whom of all the earth I wish most happiness, so infinitely unhappy? Truth is, Chrisantes this Prince after such an extreme agitation of his mind, could not resolve upon any thing; but when he understood by the physician that the Princess was in so good a condition that she might be seen, he sent, to desire permission that he might visit her. At his first approach unto her, he expressed much Joy, to see so many signs of health in her countenance, considering the accident; not but that there was much melancholy in the eyes of the Princess; but since she was ever so fair that she could not ever look ill, he thought better of her then indeed she was: moreover, the King, seeing her the day before in a worse condition, did think, she looked well then: The Princess, as owing her Life unto him, Received him with a Civillite, and after she had caused him to sit down, she said unto him with as much spirit as sweetness: you see here Sir a wonderful effect of fortunes inconstancie: for when you Left me last at Sinope, I was in a condition then to doe you a favour; but now, I am in a condition to Receive one from you: War, brought you into my fathers prison, and fortune has brought me into yours: and I rejoice in my captivite, since I have an opinion that he who has saved my life, will suffer me to enjoy it; and perhaps will remember that he went out of Cappadocia without any ransom; but Sir, I do not speak this with any intention to quit my own; but on the contrary, I am certain that the King my father will both pay it, and also if you please, assist you in the reconquest of the kingdoms of Pontus and Bythinia: I am at this present Madam, (replied the King) so rich, since I have the honour to see you in a place where I have power, that I cannot think of any conquests: and if you had not remembered me of my misfortunes, in speaking to me of my prison, I think I should have absolutely forgot all my losses and disgraces: But they are so considerable (replied she) that they cannot chuse but be remembered at all times, and in all places: yet generous Prince, there wants a remedy, against them: doubtless Madam, you may, (said the King sighing) if you please, yes, (answered the Princess) but it must be by the valour of another: therefore Sir, I beseech you make towards Sinope, that we may send one of your men on shore to get information where the King my father is: my designe was, (replied the King) to go and offer my self unto him, that he would be pleased to accept of my assistance, in recovering you out of the King of Assyrias power; but now the course and end of my voyage is altered: you may better proceed in your voyage (said the Princess) since in rescuing me from death, you have done that alone, which you could not have done with two hundred thousand men, if you had been to deliver me out of the power of the King of Assyria: so that Sir you shall come into the camp of Cixares as a Prince who has done more then a puissant army could do: yes Madam (answered he kneeling notwithstanding the opposition of the Princess) but Madam do you know my thoughts? and if you do know them, can you think that the loss of my two kingdoms, can alter them: I think Sir (replied the Princess) that if you did esteem me, you will do so still; and you may in all reason think, that since you have not changed your thoughts, no more have I mine, but that I continue still the very same I was; oh Madam (replied he) will you continue so insensible, and so inexorable for ever? did the gods send me to raise you from the dead, that you should so cruelly give me my death? I do confess Sir, (answered the Princess raising up her self a little) that I owe my life unto you; but if you gave it me, with any intentions it should be a torment unto me, I do freely permit you Page 142 to take it again when you please: No Madam, replied he, you shall never lose it that way, for it is a jewel which I will ever defend with the hazard of mine own. Sir, (answered she) do you think that there is neither fire, nor sword, nor poison, can send me to my grave: No, no, you deceive your self if you think it, and there are other kinds of death more cruel then they, though they do not look so horribly: yes Sir, said she, I do prefer the most violent death above a servitude; and I shall think you more innocent in killing me, then keeping me by force, or in making me die by despair: but generous Prince, I cannot believe you have any such design, and when I remember how bravely you treated a man, who did every day endeavour to catch you into his power; when I remember, I say, how you advertised Artamenes of the conspiracy against his life, and how you did command he should not be shot at; I cannot think that since ambition left you your reason free, love should so deprive you of it, as not to consider in what state your business is in, and though you were not generous, but prudent only and interested, yet would it be very advantageous for you to restore me unto the King my father, and absolutely prejudicial unto you to retain me long: I see very well Madam (answered he) that all you say is most reasonable, yet I must be master of more reason then I am, before I can execute it: That which most comforts me in this adventure, Divine Princess, is, that I see you never were in love, so that I have no other impediment to remove, but that of insensibility: For indeed Madam, if you did but know what it was to love, you would never speak thus unto me, and you would know that all other passions in comparison of it are nothing: But Sir (replied she and blusht) I think that they who love, desire to be beloved again, and that it is a general rule, all lovers would not incur the hatred of them they love: if so, then consider if you please, that by restoring me to my father you will at the least obtain some of my esteem, and perhaps my friendship; and that if you do not restore me, I shall then hate you above all comparisons, more then I think you love me. Your esteem, Madam, and friendship (answered the King) are two things which are infinitely pretious, and ought fully to satisfy such as do only esteem and honour you: But love, Madam, is a passion, much more tyrannical, and will be satisfied with nothing but the same; think it not strange then, I beseech you, if the hopes which you give me to enjoy your esteem and friendship, do not move me to forsake the interest of my love: But Sir, replied she, then in lieu of obtaining my love, you will find my extreme hate: who knows, Madam, (answered he) whether a little time may not move an alteration in your heart? and whether pitty may not procure that from you which nothing else can? Consider, I beseech you Madam, that he whom you see here before you, has a soul so possessed with violent passion, as never man had the like; and if you will know it, be pleased to consider but two things: First, that one only favourable look from you, does comfort, more then the regaining of my two Kingdoms would: Secondly, that though perhaps, I might obtain sufficient forces from the King your father, to reconquer them, if I should restore you unto him; yet I had rather chuse to lose them both then be deprived of you: Take heed Sir what you say, replied the Princess; for in restoring me my liberty, you will only want the sight of me; but if you do not restore me, you will not only lose my esteem, but also in a few dayes my life; whereas on the contrary, if you please, you may sit in your Throne again in glory, and have this satisfaction to boot, that I shall be most extremely obliged unto you: A Throne, Madam (answered he) is not necessary for that Prince who cannot live without you; and if during my late wars I had not retained some hopes, to find out wayes whereby I might move your heart by my perseverance, I should not have so obstinately disputed the victory with those who have vanquished me: not Madam, but that I know you have great reason to despise and scorn that Prince whom fortune has forsaken: But yet Madam, it is worth consideration, to think how inconstant this fortune is: who one day, perhaps courts him, whom the next day she cruelly persecutes; and this very accident in meeting with you, perswades me that all my misfortunes are blown over, and that a serene calm will follow my boisterous storm; yes Madam, the sight of you speaks serenity unto me, and infuseth lively hopes into the souls of them who before were sunk in sorrows; I hope therefore Madam, that good fortune will follow, as long as I am with you, and that there is no Country, I shall not find a sanctuary in, as long as I carry you thither; yet notwithstanding Madam, I do promise you, never to use any thing but my tears, and sighs, and prayers, and perseverance, wherewith to overcome you: fear not therefore Madam, to be engaged in my fortunes; and believe it, that when I see I cannot obtain your love by these innocent wayes, you shall then receive your liberty by the end of my life: Page 143 How Sir, (replied the Princess, with her eyes full of tears) must I not have my liberty till you die? I beseech you do not force me to desire it, it is a thing I never yet wished unto my most mortal enemies; and I should be very sorry to be compelled to wish it unto a Prince who has so many excellent qualities, to one who has saved my life, and one who doubtlesse will never forsake the wayes of vertue, <◇> persecute me; moreover, Sir, into what part of the world soever you shall carry me, <◇> King my father will follow you <...> Artamenes, whose valour is not unknown to you, will perhaps compel you to do <...> now will be a favour, if you will be pleased to do it: If I could Madam, (re <...> in a most passionate gesture) doubtlesse I would do it, and prevent <...> ous and menaces: But alas, Divine Princess, I cannot; all that is in my <...> s to tell you, that if it be your pleasure, I will cast my self into the Sea, or run my <◇> through that heart which I have dedicated unto you; I shall do it willingly at the very same minute you command it, and so by my death set you at liberty; it is not the will of the gods (replied the Princess) that we should expiate one sin by committing another, and therefore I shall never bid you die in that manner: But Sir, I do intreat you with all the affection which I am capable of, that you would not make me unhappy by making your self culpable, or by making me bear the burthen of your misfortunes; when the King <◇> that all he said, did but more incense the Princess, he rose up, and in all reverence co <...> eeing, said unto her; We shall see madam, whether the gods will change my heart, or pitty move yours: after this, without giving any time to answer, he went out of her Cabin, and presently after Orfanes entred, who not knowing what the King had said unto the Princess, came to tell as what he had heard. Mandana thanked him, and told him that his masters crime should not be imputed unto the servant, but that if ever she came into a condition to be able, she would requite him: My master, Madam, (said he unto her) was so infinitely respective of you, that if he were alive, certainly he would repair his fault; and I verily believe we had not suffered shipwreck if he had obeyed you, and changed our course when you desired: However Orsanes, replied the Princess, if I have any need of your help, I believe you will not deny it; you may command me Madam, the the most difficult services, (answered he) and shall certainly be obeyed. And truly I think there was not a more officious man in the world then this, nor more understanding: it was by his reports I came unto much of what I have related unto you. Orsanes being gone out, the Princess began to lament her misfortunes, and Arianta also began to repent that she had been a cause of them, and that, with such extreme sorrow, as she almost lost her reason; for this woman, though none did think of accusing her, did begin to accuse her self, and beg the Princess pardon, with a promise hereafter of inviolable fidelity: She told her further, how she conceived it would have been a good piece of service unto her, to contribute all she could to make her Queen of Assyria: and truly, she spoke so ingeniously, and with so repentant a sorrow for her fault, as the Princesse pardoned her. Mean while the King of Pontus had his share in sorrow; he neither durst visit the Princesse, nor could for bear it: fain would he deliver her up to her father, and fainer would he keep her; and not knowing whither to go, or what to do, we wandered many dayes together upon the Seas, and the Pilot received no other orders, but to keep far from any land, and avoid meeting with any Ships. You may judge unto what patience we were put; I spoke often unto the King of Pontus, but all in vain; and the three last days which we were upon the Sea, he came not into the Princesse chamber: But at the last, when the King bethought himself, how the King of Armenia would pay no more Tribute unto the King of the Medes, since the death of Astyages, he believed that he might find a safety there, for there was alliance between them: So that one morning as our Ship lay at anchor, close by the mouth of the River Halis, the King sent a little Cock-boat to procure a greater boat, to Rowe up by strength of Oar the said River; and one was presently gotten, so that then he came unto the Princesse Cabin: Madam (said he, with a disordered countenance) it is not just to let you any longer endure the inconveniency of the Sea, you will find lesse discommodity in a River. I shall suffer equall inconveniency in both (answered she) as long as you continue thus unreasonable. Madam, said he unto her, my design is to carry you unto the King of Armenia. The Princesse was glad when she saw that we were indeed to leave the Sea; and she hoped for more help upon Land, or in a River, then in a Ship on the midst of tossing waves: And although she knew that the King of Armenia had an ambitious and stirring spirit, also would be glad of any pretence for a war; yet the Prince Tigranis his son, who was very vertuously disposed, and who she had heretofore seen at Sinope, did comfort her a little: She went therefore whither they carried her without any Page 144 contradiction: It was the Princesse desire that Orsanes and two others might go with which was all we could obtain, of fifteen or twenty which were saved from shipwrack, and the King of Pontus took only thirty of his own men; but we knew not what he did with his Ship: Then began we to boat up the River by force of Oar, but because the River did run there with a very swift current, it was a long time before we could get into it, and we were almost always upon the Land, because the middle of the River did run more rapidly: As we looked about us, the Princesse esp Page 144 Ortalques upon the River banks, and knew him at the first; but I suppose that I need not particularize any further concerning this passage, since Page 144 imagine that you already know them by him, for Artucas told me, that he came hither: sh Page 144 sooner saw him, but pulling out a little inkhorn, which she ever carried about her, and hiding her self behinde Arianta and my self, she writ what doubtlesse you have seen, or at least heard of it by Ortalques: but as ill luck would have it, the King of Pontus, who was busie in seeing them Rowe, turned his head towards us, as she was writing, so that she had not time to end her Note, but gave it unto me; I lapped it up in my hood, and as the Boat almost touched the Land neer Ortalques, I threw it unto him, as if the winde had carried it from me, and seemed as if I did not care whether or no I had it again; so that they stayed not the Boat for it, for if they had, the current of the water would have driven the Boat back again into the Sea: Without doubt Chrisantes you know that this River has its originall among the Mountains in Armenia; that it runs along by the side of Lydia; and that it spreads it self upon the right hand towards Mantiana, and on the left hand towards Phrygia: that afterwards on the right hand it moistens a great part of Cappadocia, and on the left hand Paphlagonia; so that there were some places by which we were to go, that the King of Pontus feared very much, and which the Princess also feared, because it was on that side of Cappadocia, where the people by the perswasions of Aribeus were revolted, and took part with the King of Assyria: But as soon as we were past Cappadocia, he suffered us sometime to stay in the night time, that the Princess might more quietly take rest and sleep: and to that end, they made her a Cabin in the Boat, which separated us from the rest of the company, and where none but her own servants entered, excepting the King of Pontus: At last Chrisantes, as necessity is alwayes ingenious, the Princess did not apprehend it an absolute impossibility for us to make an escape, so that I consulted with Orsanes, and we resolved to endeavour it: The Princess would have a candle burning alwayes in the night time, in our Cabin; but the better to execute our designe we put it out: And prosecuting our resolution, one night when we were neer a great Wood, Orsanes who lay on the outside of our Cabin, came under the hangings on our side, and went quietly into the water, which was not very deep in that place, intending to take us, one after another, and carry us ashore, and then to hide our selves in the thick of the great Wood, which we observed very neer us: And since the night was very dark, and we but two to be carried, the Princesse would not be carried first, because she should then be alone upon the Banks, so that she would have Orsanes carry me first: But Oh Heavens, what ill fortune was it that I obeyed her? and how much injury did the Princesse do her self in commanding it? For Orsanes and I were no sooner at Land, but the King of Pontus waking, and seeing no light in our Cabin, cried out to him that stood Centinel (who had not perceived us because it was very dark) and bade him look well to the Princesse; so that at this Cry, the Watermen who alwayes kept a dark lanthorn, did bring it, and there they found the Princesse all alone in a great amazement. Orsanes and I, seeing this, would have returned what danger soever would hap unto us: but the Watermen Rowing away with all their strength, by order from the King of Pontus, Cry and call as long, and as loud as we could, they would not stay to take us in: The King questionlesse imagining, that we had got some considerable strength upon Land to execute our designe; We heard the Princesse call sometimes Martesia, and sometimes Orsanes: but presently after we neither heard nor saw any thing, although the Moon presently after began to break out, and the River in that place did so turn and winde, that it was impossible for us to see the Boat: You may well imagine Chrisantes, how great my sorrows, and my fears were: First, to see I was separated from the Princesse: Secondly, to finde my self alone with a man upon the banks of a great River, neer a great Wood, in the midst of the night; The rest of the night we passed away and followed the River side, hoping alwayes, that the Moon would shine so cleer, that we might once more discover the Boat: At the last, we being very weary, and having found a little habitation of Fisher-men by the water side, we stayed there, and found there more helps then we could hope for from men of such Page 145 Quality. We told them our adventure, disguising our names, and the qualities of the persons, because we were in Paphlagonia, and desired them to informe us, whether it were possible to overtake the Boat we told them of: they told us that it was absolutely impossible to overtake them with another Boat, considering the number of their Oars, and the time we had lost to follow them: nor was it more easie to follow with Horses, because the River doth turn and winde very much: and their Boat taking alwayes the middle of the River, has by consequence lesse way to go then they who go by the sides: Moreover, not far from thence the River divides into two, and who can tell which way they would take? In conclusion Chrisantes, we had no other course, but to finde out some way how to come hither; where I did suppose I should finde the King. I had by good fortune the Picture of the Princesse about me, in a very rich box, which upon this occasion did us very good service: for when I had taken out the Picture, I sent Orsanes unto the next Town to sell it, and to buy a Coach and Horses, whilst he left me amongst the fisher-men: At his retorne we did recompence those honest men for their courtesies, and came in all haste hither, where we thought verily to finde Artamenes also, but little did we think to finde him a Prisoner. Now wise Chrisantes you know thus far of the Princesse her fortune: and I did very much desire to relate it unto you, before I spoke with the King, to the end that when you were informed of our adventures, and my self also better instructed in the state of things, I might more judicially know what to say, or not to say.

Martesia having ended her story, Chrisantes and Feraulas thanked her for the pains she had taken, and began to consider the wonderfull passages she had told them. They could not sufficiently admire the constancy of the Princesse, and her immoveable vertue wherewith she acted throughout all her adventures. They considered her as carried away by the greatest King of all Asia, whom she hated: they then looked upon her as in the power of a Prince, whom she very much esteemed; and yet they think upon her, as she is in the power of a King, without a Kingdome: They observed the greatnesse of the first, did not terrifie her from treating him lesse rigorously; That the esteem which she had of the second, did not alter her heart; and that the misfortunes of the third, did not move her to treat him lesse civilly, then if he were upon his Throne: The truth is, they saw Mandana was so worthy of Artamenes, and Artamenes of Mandana, that when they considered how they were separated, and how both of them unfortunate, their conversation could not chuse but end in sighes and teares, and all other signes of compassion: First, for so many misfortunes as the Princesse had been exposed unto; Secondly, by reason of that strange Oracle which threatned a greater misfortune unto Artamenes, then his imprisonment. Feraulas was over-joyed to see Martesia again; and Chrisantes, who did very highly esteem her virtues, did bid her very welcome back: yet before they parted, they made a short relation according to their promise, of all the adventures of Artamenes: As well his voyage unto the Massagettes, as his retorne to Cappadocia: and also all the Assyrian War: They related also the lamentable encounter that Artamenes had with Mazares, when he was dying, who had from him the scarfe whereof she spoke in her relation, and which Artamenes knew to be the same which Mandana had refused him, a little before he went to fight: But (added Feraulas) I am certain he was much more sad, when he received it, then he was when it was denied him: Truly (said Martesia) the destiny of that scarfe is very strange; for I beseech you consider by what an odde way Fate has brought it into Artamenes hands: First you know that it was of most rare Golden Tissue, and admirably wrought by the Princesse her self, for her own diversion, and that that was the reason why she valued it so much, though she had other reasons to deny it Artamenes, when he desired it from her at Anisa: But as if she valued it at a higher esteem, because Artamenes had desired it, she commanded me to have an extraordinary care of it, and would wear it no more. Afterwards when we returned to Sinope, I carried it thither, and when we departed from thence, and went unto Amasia, and from thence to Themiscira, I left it there amongst a hundred other things which belonged unto the Princesse; so also, when we returned thither again with the King of Assyria, there I found it; for Aribeus did not suffer any disorder in the Castle: and that same night we went away, this scarfe, I know not how, fell out of my hands; and immediately, being moved unto it, by I know not what conceit, Madam (said I unto the Princesse, who came in as I took it up) shall this scarfe which you value so much, and which you denied Artamenes, remain in the hands of the King of Assyria: No Martesia (said she unto me) it shall not: for if Artamenes should hereafter see him wear it in any combate, he would imagine perhaps, that I Page 146 gave it him: In conclusion, Feraulas, she took it, and wore it, and see by what Fate Mazares came by it; and how Artamenes received that from one of his Rivals, which the Princesse had refused him. Last of all, Feraulas and Chrisantes, resolved that Martesia should stay a day or two before she shewed her self, to the end they might have leasure, first to relate what she had told them unto their dear Master, and whilst they had consulted with his friends, when would be the fittest time the King should see her. Martesia desired Feraulas to assure Artamenes that she would most seriously interest her self in his fortunes; and that she did most passionatly wish, that this little shadow of liberty which was permitted him of late, might be speedily seconded by an absolute freedome, so as he might be in a condition to go and relieve the Princesse. After this, Chrisantes and Feraulas left her, and went to give Artamenes so much satisfaction, as to hear of Mandana's Fidelity and Constancy.

ARTAMENES, OR Cyrus the Great. THE SECOND PART. BOOK III.

These two faithful servants of a famous Master, could not satisfie their desires until the next morning; because it was not possible to find Artamenes alone by himself, since Ciaxares had given this liberty to visit him, unless it were in a morning before he did rise out of his bed: for every one did earnestly desire the benefit of that priviledge; and every one to make this priviledge to continue longer, told Ciaxares, that Artamenes did bend at last, and would discover what he desired: This generous prisoner was extreemly impatient to be at liberty, that he might free Mandana; but although love took up all his soul, he did not forget that Araspes was in prison as well as himself, and he sent very often to see how he did; and did apparently testifie that his imprisonment did augment the rigor of his own: He was extreemly ravished with admiration, when Chrisantes and Feraulas came unto him as he was in bed, and told him Martesia was come to Sinope; the name of Martesia caused him to leap up for joy, imagining that Mandana was not far off; and the relation which afterwards they made unto him of Mandana's adventures, and of her fidelity to him, made so great a rapture in his soul, as he was not able to receive such good news in its full delight; for indeed Chrisantes and Feraulas told him also of that Oracle which the King of Assyria had received at Babylon: And also, to hear that the Princesse was in the power of the King of Pontus, whose excellent merit he very well knew, was another means to moderate his excessive joy. Do you admire Chrisantes, (said he unto him) the humorous disposition of Fate, which procures me the most accomplished and most reasonable men in their loves, to be my Rivals? For truly if Mandana had been courted only by Princes of brutish passions, such as would speak of nothing but violences, of sword, or fire, or bloud; who would make themselves to be loved, by such courses as commonly procures hatred; such as pretend only unto vitious favours, and ask them with daggers in their hands, and fury in their eyes, then I would not fear that the Divine Mandana would prefer them before Artamenes. But Chri[s]antes, I have much reason to fear what now you come to tell me; and as you relate the story unto me; the ravishers of Mandana are a hundred times more to be feared, then if Page 148 they were less reasonable, & not so submissive. But Sir, (said Feraulas) I beseech you consider, that the King of Assyria is now not with Mandana: Also you are certain, that Mazares is not alive, and she is only in the power of a King who has not a kingdom: It is true, replied he, but this King without a Crown, deserves a hundred, and that is it, which makes him terrible unto me, yet notwithstanding, he was sometimes very glad to know that the Princess was in Armenia, and sometimes againe he would be sorry for it; for though the virtue of Tygranes was a comfort unto him, yet the violent and ambitious disposition of the King his father, caused some sorrow in him. Feraulas then presented Martesia's complement unto him, which he received very kindly, and sent back Feraulas presently unto her, to testifie his thanks, and sorrow that he was not in such a condition, to come himself and tell her what he thought; and also to let her know, how much he thought himself obliged unto her, for acquainting him with the Princess thoughts: he also sent Chrisantes unto the Princess which had interested themselves concerning his liberty, to consult with them upon the return of Martesia: and all of them conceived that the soother she shewed her self unto the King, it would be the better; for they thought that the certainty of the Princess fortune, and the infallible appearance of a new war, would much conduce unto his freedom. Chrisantes then, advertising Martesia of the resolution, she appeared the same night, and said she came but then to town. The King received her with extream joy and shed many tears of tenderness, for he knew how the Princess his daughter loved her? she acquainted him with all the removes and rapes of Mandana, and with every passage excepting what related unto Artamenes, which she handsomly concealed with much care, naming him but once in all her relation: nor did she mention the Oracle received at Babylon, lest it should trouble him, and displease Artamenes, and as she was very witty, so she did deliver every thing or pass it over, as it might be either advantageous or prejudiciall: Cixares was glad that the Princess was in the King of Pontus power, supposing that a Prince who was deprived of his own kingdoms, would hardly find protection in another. He beleaved that the King of Armenia would be glad to have a new pretence for a war, and upon that thought he sighed, and could not chuse but secretly wish that Artamenes would put himself into a condition to relieve her, by confessing what he desired to know from him. After the King had welcomed Martesia, he would have had her lie in the Castle, but she beseeched him to let her return back unto her kinsman; whither she went accordingly, and was visited by all the Ladies of the town, and also by all the Princes and men of quality in Sinope: mean while, all the friends of Artamenes were continually soliciting the King in his behalf: and indeed the King did seem much to desire it, yet was very obstinately resolved to know either his innocency, or his crime: yet he had such confused thoughts, that he himself knew not well what to resolve upon, untill the return of Megabises whom he had sent into Armenia, for if by it, he found that his daughter would be restored, then would he be less indulgent towards Artamenes; But if on the contrary, she were refused, and that he must be forced unto a fresh war, then he knew how necessary the liberty of Artamenes would be unto Mandana's; thus being in himself irresolute, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, and all the rest of the Princes who were advocates for Artamenes, could not get one peremptory word from him: As they were upon a day altogether about him, intelligence came, that there appeared many strangers and forraign troops upon the plaine coming towards Sinope: and presently after, Thimocrates and Philocles came in and told the King, that the Prince Philoxylpes a favorite unto the King of Cyprus their master, and an ancient friend unto Artamenes, having married the Princess Agarista his sister unto the Prince of Sicily, had obliged him upon the marriage to send ten thousand men unto Artamenes, to the end he might present them unto his majesty; and that he would be so pleased as to permit them to have some part of that honour which these troops would get, under the command of so great a King, and by the valour of so gallant a man as Artamenes. Cixares blusht at the discourse, and somewhat wondred, that he who was to present the Sicilian troops, was himself in such a condition as to need the help of another, also he very civilly accepted all that Thimoerates and Philocles said unto him; and permitted him who commanded these souldiers, who was brother unto the King of Sicily, to enter. Cixares himself to do him the more honour, would go upon the wals of the town to see these troops, come in, which he found to be very gallant, composed of handsom men, well armed, and accoutred: and the Prince who commanded them, young and handsom. After the King had viewed these Sicilian troops under the wals, and had ordered them to encamp close by the troops of Cyprus, Page 149 they two being in amity one with another, the young Prince who was their General, called Artibies, was brought by Thimocrates and Philocles unto Cixares, who told him that Artamenes was not in a condition to be present. Artibies enquiring the cause, was much surprised at it, and made some doubt whether he should continue his offer unto Cixares, considering Philoxypes would never have moved his brother to send these troops, but only in favour of Artamenes. But Thimocrates and Philocles conceiving that in case of necessity they might be usefull unto Artamenes, told him, that he ought not to decline from his offer unto the King, but that he should when he spoke unto the king acquit himself of his commission, and tell him, that it was the interest of Artamenes which moved Philoxypes unto it. This young Prince was no sooner come before Cixares, but after he had saluted him, Sir (said he unto him) I was in hope to have been presented unto you, by one who ought to be very dear unto you, and one who has made himself most illustrious throughout all the world; but I see that Thimocrates, and Philocles have great need to comfort me in my sorrowes to be deprived of that advantage: For indeed, although the Prince of Sicily my brother and soveraigne, and the Prince Philoxypes, have sent me for the service of your Majesty, and accordingly I have obeyed them, yet for my own particular I must confess unto you, I should have been extremely Joyfull, if I could hope to learn under the Illustrious Artamenes that mystery in which he is so exactly knowing. You may find so many other expert commanders in this army (said the King and shewed him all those about him) that though my affaires will not permit me to set Artamenes at liberty, yet you will find no cause to repent you came amongst us; Sir, replied the King of Phrygia, we are all but Schollars unto Artamenes, and this Prince has great reason to grieve, as he does, for the privation of so great an advantage. Since this discourse was not pleasant unto Cixares, he turned it to something else, and asked very inquisitively concerning the health of the King of Cyprus, and of Philoxypes, and also of the Prince of Sicilie: but say what he would, yet Artibies would alwayes bring in Artamenes. If the King spoke concerning the King of Cyprus, he would then answer that this Prince had ever a good opinion of his prudence, since he understood how he had committed the conduct of his army unto Artamenes: If Cixares asked him any thing concerning Philoxylpes then he would answer him, that Philoxypes had a great desire to come himself, and command in the room of Thimocrates, only that he might learn of Artamenes; if Cixares spoke any thing concerning the Prince of Sicilie, then would Artibies tell him, that if he were not so infinitely uxorious, & loving unto the Princess his wife, whom he had newly married, he would have come hither himself purposely to be acquainted with Artamenes, of whom fame spoke so loud: at the last, when Cixares saw that no discourse though never so far off the matter, but still the name of Artamenes was in the mouth of Artibies, he told him, that it was not just he should be kept any longer from his rest, and commanded him to be lodged in the best lodgings, and treated with all possible civilities: But before, Artibies left him, he desired permission to go and see Artamenes in prison, whom he hoped to have seen in the head of an army: unto which desire Cixares consented: then he went immediately unto the prison of Artamenes, conducted by Aglatidas, Andramias, Thimocrates, and Philocles. Artamenes, at the name of Philoxypes, and the Princesse Agarista his sister, did express much friendship unto Artibies. This Prince presented unto him one of his Captaines named Leontidas, who Artamenes knew to be an especial friend unto Philoxypes, who at his coming from him did charge him to present unto Artamenes the continuance of his friendship, and to deliver a letter unto him. Artamenes receiving it with much Joy (for he did infinitely esteeme Philoxypes, although he had not been long in the Isle of Cyprus) desired Artibies that he might read it: The contents were these.

PHILOXYPES UNTO ARTAMENES.

I Am very glad that fortune was of my opinion, and has given you that which I ever thought you most worthy of, since the first time I had the honour to see you: I wish, that since she was not blind in serving you, so she may not be inconstant in continuing it; but that you all your Page 150 life enjoy that hapiness, which none who knows you, can without injustice envie. Moreover, I had not married the Princess Agharista my sister, but upon condition that the Prince of Sicilie her husband, should send some Troops unto you: and I hope, that for my sake, the Prince Artibies will be welcome unto you; and that after he has purchased your esteem by those rare qualities whereof he is owner, you will admit him some part in your friendship; But to tell you something which is more delightful, that I may thereby the more oblige you, be pleased to know, that the same famous man, whom you came into our Isle to seek, out of your desire to be acquainted with his virtues, is in love with yours: And if the good of his Country had not called him back unto Athens, he had done that for Artamenes, which Artamenes did for Solon. If you desire to be further acquainted with my fortunes, I have entreated Leontidas to inform you; and to assure you that I am not more in love with the beauty of Policrite, then I am with the glory of Artamenes.

PHILOXYPES.

After Artamenes had done reading the Letter, he redoubled his civilities towards Artibies, shewing unto him the Letter of Philoxypes; you see, (said he unto him) how the wishes of that Prince, are not effectual, and how fortune whereof he speaks has forsaken me: But (said he in turning towards Leontidas) it is from you Sir, that I must receive much consolation in my misery, in relating unto me, what concerns the Prince Philoxypes: for truly, if I be not mistaken, there must needs be a great alteration in him, if it be so as he sayes in his Letter, that he hath been in love, since when I was acquainted with him, he was in love with nothing but books, pictures, musick, and such excellent arts, and if he had any mistresse then, certainly it was the vertue of Solon, whom I heard him often speak of: Oh Sir, (replied Leontidas) there is indeed great alterations in the life of the Prince Philoxypes, such as doubtlesse will much surprize you, as they did not only the Court, but all the Kingdom of Cyprus; since I believe there was not one in all the Towns of Pathos, Amathuses, Salmes, and Citherea, who has not without admiration heard of his adventure: Artamenes then seeming to be desirous of knowing the fortune of so famous a Prince: Leontidas promised him to come unto him the next morning, and satisfie his desire. The rest of this day was spent in civilities to Artibies; and the next morning Thimocrates and Philocles being desirous to know what accidents had happened in the Court of Cyprus since they left it, waited upon Leontidas unto Artamenes, who as soon as they came in, because they would lose no time, did sit down, Leontidas being in the mist of them, began his discourse thus.

THE HISTORY OF PHILOXYPES AND POLICRITE.

SIR, since your abode in this our Island hath not been long; that you may the better understand this Story, it is requisite that you know part of the Customes of this Island, the which I will in a few words acquaint you with, that my ensuing Discourse may appear lesse tedious to you. You must then know, Sir, that this good Island, which for its precinct situation, fertility, for the beauty and greatnesse of its Towns, and its Magnificent Temples, passeth for the most famous and most considerable of as many lie on the Aegean Sea, hath alwayes been consecrated to Venus; and that love, which every where else is a passion, which hath no particular privileges, is in this place accounted a religious act. All that are borne here, seem as if they were bound to love from their very birth; all the Temples are dedicated to Venus, under several names; all the pictures and statues here, represent only this Goddess, and depend only upon her. You shall find here Cupid set out every where, and those who instruct us elsewhere virtuously in our youth, by teaching us how to overcome our ambition, anger, hatred, envy, and all other passions; deal otherwise with us here, perswading us only how to love innocently. But as there is nothing so pure or refined, which meets not with alteration and corruption at the last; a strange disorder crept in long since amongst us: for you must know the first Temple which was consecrated unto Venus, was that of Venus Urania, who we say, is the daughter of Heaven. This Venus, as we believe, inspires only rational resentments, and virtuous passions: whereas on the contrary, there are some Temples on the utmost borders of the Isle towards the South, built long since the former, which are dedicated unto Venus Anodema, as much as to say, to Venus coming forth from the foam of the Sea. Now Sir, these Temples do differ very much, as do their resentments, who offer sacrifices at them; yet as those Religions wherein Libertinism passeth for a vertue, are grounded with most ease, the Religion of Venus Anadiomena, hath for a long time prevailed over that of Venus Urania; and our Island hath seen things which makes those even blush with confusion, who remember they have heard them spoken of by their forefathers: but thanks to Heaven, a virtuous Queen, who lived some sixty years since, did re-establish all the Temples of Venus Urania; made almost all those of Venus Anadiomena, be beaten down; abolisht all the shameful customes which were introduced in Cyprus, and left only pure resentments amongst us of that passion, which is the soul of the Universe, and which is the sole entertainer of civil society. We are now taught <> love our Goddesse, our Princes, our Laws, our Countrey, our fellow-Citizens, our Parents, Brethren, wives and Children; and lastly, to our selves, to the end that we may do no shameful act. We are taught also to love Glory, Sciences and Arts; to love innocent pastimes, and to love beauty and virtue above all that hath been spoken of: in fine, we are taught that he who loves not, is not rational; and that not to have a sense of all these aforementioned things, is to be very much to blame. You may easily imagine then, that Page 152 this being a belief generally held amongst us, the Court of Cyprus must needs be a pleasing abode, since every one there loves handsome actions, and handsome personages. True it is, that according to the rules of Venus Urania, the love by her permitted, is so pure, so innocent, so free from having any thing to do with the senses, and so free from fault, as she seems to suffer us to love others only, that we may make our selves become the more lovely, through our care of meriting true glory, of becoming accomplisht, and of getting that Courtly Air, and pleasing conversation, which is only inspired by love. This Sir, is the present condition of our 'sland: all delights are here, but all innocent. Love is the predominant, and universal passion in it, but such a passion, as is not incompatible with virtue and modesty, and which hinders not many lovers from complaining of their Mistresses rigour. Publique feastivals are here frequent, conversation free enough, but wholly spiritual, games for prizes very usual, pleasing Bals, excellent Musick, and Women in general infinitely handsome, full of gallantry, and perfectly virtuous. But of all the rest, the Princesse of Salmis, sister to Philoxypes, was the Court-Star, till such time as she withdrew her self from thence. The Princesse of Agharista, now Princesse of Sicily, is also very taking, and the famous Artaphil doubtlesse bears a great renown. To boot with these, there is one called Timoclea, and an hundred others, of somewhat a meaner condition, which are wonderfully handsome. But Sir, lest I may prove too tedious, I will briefly tell you that the King who now reigns in Cyprus, is but two years elder then Prince Philoxypes, who is descended from the Race of Demophon, son to Theseus, who is held in great esteem amongst us. Philoxypes in his younger years, you may easily judge was one of the loveliest personages which could be seen; for though he be now twenty eight years old, he continues to be so extraordinarily handsome, and so well behaved, as it may easily be guest what he was when a childe; and though he were wise even from his cradle, and knowing, even from the time he began to speak, yet ceased he not to be of a pleasing humour, and comportment, such as is only infused by youth, and the air of the Court, and which is the charm of conversation amongst Ladies. In fine, set one article aside, Philoxypes may be truly said, to have fully satisfied and made good all the precepts of Venus Urania.

He revered the Goddess, he loved his Prince, kept the Laws, he loved his Country, his fellow-Citizens, was ambitious of glory, which he went in quest of at fifteen years of age in the Milesian War, wherein he gave singular testimony of his carriage. He loved the Sciences, and all the liberal Arts; delighted in innocent pastimes, and loved virtue above all things; but as for beauty, he had only a general admiration for it, and never felt in himself any particular addition or adhesion to any whatsoever handsome Lady. You may imagine Sir, how strange this sensibility appeared in a Court where it met not with any example, and in a man so fit to occasion love. Yet was he so lovely, as he was not for this the lesse beloved; he was so liberal, so magnifical, so full of complacency, and so civilly behaved, as he was the wonder of the world.

When Solon after having establishd those famous Laws at Athens, went from thence, resolving to forgoe his country for ten years, to the end that he might make no alteration there, he came to our Court; Philoxypes, who was then but eighteen years old, had a great affection for him, as he had likewise for Philoxetes; insomuch, that as long as Solon abode in our Isle, Philoxetes gave over all his other delights, and the frequenting of the Ladies companies to fasten himselfe totally to him: whom that he might enjoy with the more freedome, he caried him to a Town of his which is called Apia; built by Demaphon in a very strong, but rocky situation, and of hard accesse, all the Countrey about it being craggy, dry, and exceeding barren. Solon being come thither, shewed him how that they that laid the foundations of that Town, might have made it much more pleasanter, if they had built it upon the banks of the River Claria, in a spacious and fertile plain, which lies at the foot of the Mountaine, where the other Town was situated; hardly had Solon spoke his thought, when Philoxypes resolved to put it in execution and began already to give all necessary orders for it. And indeed Solon was the Architect who guided this great enterprise, Philoxypes giving him the glory thereof, for he called this new Town Soly, to perpetuate the memory of the name of Solon. This place being not far from Paphos, one of our Kings most usual abodes, they went oft to the Court; where our Ladies complained sometimes of Solon, who by bereaving them of Philoxypes, bereft them of their fairest ornament; and to shew you how great this Princes inflexibility was, Solon whose virtue is not austere, to justifie himself to those that blamed Philoxypes for this, telling him that love Page 153 was a passion which sweetned all other passions, and which did sometimes exceed them all. That for his part, he confest he would never set his whole heart against it, & that he thought it no shame to be once in his life overcome thereby. Philoxypes said in his defence, that he lov'd all that was lovely, that he had a passion for all beautiful objects, and that no man ever lov'd so much as he. But notwithstanding all his universal affections, there was no one so fair in all the Court, who could boast in her particular to have intralldhis heart; & who peradventure had not more then once consulted with her glass, to know by what innocent art this so famous heart might be taken: but at last, after having staid a good while, Solon went his way much taken with Philoxypes his virtue, and made some verses in his praise before he imlbarked for Egypt. He who was commended by all Greece, did highly commend this young Prince, saying, that Nature had taught Philoxypes in eighteen years, what Art could not teach in an Age, and that a man might see in him by way of prodigie, all the ages of man put together; that is to say, the innocence of infancy, the charms of youth, the fortitude of a more advanced age, and the wisdom of old age. After his departure, Philoxypes was somewhat melancholly, but this humour being over, he spent some time in travel, and did not only see whole Greece, but likewise the famous City of Carthage, which did then wage war with the Massilians, who inhabit a place which they have of late made famous, by a cry'd up Academy, wherein eloquence, and all the Grecian Sciences are rarely well taught.

I will not relate unto you all the gallant actions he did in Africa, nor what befel him during that Journey, which continued till some moneths before you came to Cyprus; where Solon stayed awhile again, not suffering himself to be seen almost by any one. But I will tell you that Philoxypes at his return to Court, charm'd all the world; and that the King himself grew so far in love with him, as never was known so great a favour as his, nor yet so little envied; neither did he make use thereof, for his Masters glory, and to do good to as many as he could; he received no rewards, but to enrich such as stood in need thereof; all the advices he gave, were good; he did none but good offices: and thus he stood fair in the opinion of the great ones, and of the people, as well as in that of the King; and there were none but our Ladies who continued to accuse him of inflexibility. Thus did he live amidst delights, in the stateliest and most gallant Court of all the world, without envy, without love, and without melancholy. But the King was not this mean while so happy as he; for after having had some flitting passions, which had notwithstanding much disquieted him, he fell mightily in love with the Princesse Aretephile, who certainly is very beautiful, and hath an hundred good qualities; but who with all this was extremely ambitious. The King was no sooner aware of the violence of this his passion but that he discovered it to Philoxypes, and entreated him to intercede for him with Aretephile, who at that time did often visit the Princesse Agharista, sister to Philoxypes. You may imagin this Prince did not refuse to assist him, since his affection was innocent; yet did he sometimes crave pardon of the King, if he did not much bewail him in his disquiets: For Sir, said he, love being a malady which I am not acquainted with, and which I have much to imagine is so great, as man would have it thought, I confesse I do not so much compassionate your Majestie, as peradventure I ought; and consequently, I may perchance not so fully exaggerate your sufferings as I should do, when I speak with the Princesse Aretephile. Fear not Philoxypes, said the King, that I complain of your inflexibility; on the contrary, if you had a more tender heart, I would not have chosen you for the confidant of my passion: and did I think that you could become my rival, I would not give you Commission to speak so often with my beloved Princesse. But my intention not being to speak of the Kings love, otherwise then as it relates necessarily to Philoxypes adventures; I will only tell you, that though Aretephile were ravisht to see her self beloved by the King, yet aiming at the Crown of Cyprus, she thought she was a little to disguise her sense thereof, and to make it a harder matter for the King to win her, then she had found it to win the King: So as this Princesse behaved her self with much discretion and reservednesse, and mingling continually severity with mildnesse, the King stood long in need of Philoxypes assistance, whom Aretephile, who knew what power he had with the King, used with all possible civility. Philoxypes was notwithstanding sometimes much troubled at the continuance of this passion, which made him for his recreation, go to a very stately house, which the famous Solon had caused to be built for him near Soly, and wherein he had made a collection of whatsoever Greece had of most rare and curious, were it either for pictures, or statues. In this place it was, which is called Claria, where wondering sometimes at the Page 154 Kings passion, he did me the honour to bemoan himself to me of his employment, and he himself gave me a thousand pleasant marks of his inflexibleness, by those things which he uttered against love. This mean while, though the King were much in love with Aretephile, yet he had somewhat to do to perswade himself to marry her, because indeed, in reason he should much rather have married the Princesse Timoclea, by reason of some claim she pretended to have to the Principality of Amathusa; Insomuch as the King being yet unresolved what to do, had not as yet acquainted Aretephile, nor let her be acquainted that his love tended meerly to set her upon the Throne; but onely following the custome of Cyprus, he had sufficiently witnessed his service, and to purchase her esteem, had done whatsoever a handsome and ingenious Prince seconded by Philoxypes, could do, who though he were himself insensible of love, was notwithstanding a very great gallant; so as Aretephile who was absolutely resolved never to part with her heart for lesse then a Crown, treated the King sometimes severely enough, insomuch as the whole Court was troubled thereat, and Philoxypes delight lay onely in Hunting, and in his stately Countrey-House. Some other times Aretephile fearing lest she her self might extinguish the fire which she had kindled in the Kings heart, was somewhat more kinde unto him, and by the Prince his Joy, rejoiced the whole Court. 'Twas then in one of these pleasant conjunctures of times, that Philoxypes to oblige the King, made the Princesse of Salamis his sister, and the Princesse Agharista, do him the honour to entertain the King, upon a day that he invited the King and all the Court, to go from Paphos to Claria, and to passe one whole day in his retiredness, which indeed deserved to receive so Princely a company. Never was there so gallant an Assembly as this; It was wholly composed of young and handsome personages, of great birth, and understanding: and one would have said, that fortune had favoured Philoxypes, in ordering it so as that all persons of Quality who were peevisch or of ill humour in the Court, were either sick that day, or busied about some important affairs, so as this well compacted company was not troubled with the importunity of any of their companies: On what side soever they did cast their eye, they met with nothing but goodly objects, there was no fear of being wearied or annoyed, Philoxypes had taken such excellent order for all things; were it either for the stately furniture of the House, for the magnificency of the Feast, or the excellency of the Musick, as the King to give him the highest praise he could, said aloud, that if Philoxypes had been in love, and that his Mistress had been in that company, he could have done no more then he did. On the contrary, Sir, said Philoxypes, I think that if I had been in love, all things would have been much more in disorder, then they are; it seeming impossible to me that a man should lose his reason, and yet have leisure enough to think of such trivial affairs. The King began then to oppose Philoxypes, and to tell him, that he did little know the effects of this passion; and this he did more then once, as well for that he could hardly finde a more pleasing entertainment by discourse, as also that by reproaching Philoxypes with his ignorance of love, he thereby found an opportune means to make the Princesse Aretephile, who listen'd unto him, know that the passion he had for her, had made him very expert therein. Philoxypes did defend himself the best he could; Sometimes he said the fear of not being beloved kept him from loving; sometimes that he had so nice a soul as did avoid such pleasures as could not be purchased without pain; and consequently that love not being a voluntary thing he was not to blame for that he did not love: and for his last reason, he said that the difficulty of the choice made him that he neither did, nor could resolve on any; for Sir, said he to the King, how is it possible to have the affrontednesse to prefer any one of so many handsome personages as I see before all the rest? Ah, Philoxypes, said the King, the more you speak of love, the more pity do you move in me; and (speaking low in his ear) the more said he, do you make me see that my Confidant will never be my Rival. After this, all the Ladies, and all the men of Quality, began to argue the matter with him; he did sometime almost hate them all for their reproaching him with his inflexibility. When they had dined, Philoxypes led all this fair Assembly into a stately Gallery, painted all over by the hand of an excellent Master, named Mandrocles, who is of the Isle of Samos, and who having finishd this rare work, some few dayes before this great Feast, was returned to his own Countrey.

The story of Venus Urania, was the subject of all those pictures, in whom nothing but modesty was to be discerned. The Painter had not drawn the Graces all naked, as they usually are drawn, but had clothed them in transparent Tiffeny, which rendred all those Page 155 figures very delightful: In one of the draughts, you might see Venus descend from Heaven in a Chariot, all of burnisht Gold, drawn by Swans; a thousand little Cupids seemed to hover about her, and to be the first that lighted in the Isle of Cyprus, which is represented in the same piece, to prepare all things to receive her: In another piece, all those little Cupidons, erected unto her an Altar of Turfs, and made dressings of flowers to adorn her: In another piece, this goddess teacheth Cupid how to chuse his golden shafts, which he meant to use; and in another, she put a Torch into his hand, and shewing him the Sun, which is painted at the top of that piece, seems as if she would tell him, that she would have the flames wherewith he sets hearts on fire, to be more pure than the beams of this glorious Constellation. In fine, Sir, this goddess is represented in above twenty parts of this Gallery; but though in different postures, you may still discern the same countenance. Though all in this Gallery be beautiful, this Figure is incomparably beyond all the rest: all the rest are pictures, but this seems to be effectually a divine Personage; for certainly there was never any thing seen of so much handsomenesse; all the fair Ladies who Philoxypes had brought thither, were amazed to see it, and maugre themselves confesse that their Glasse shewed them nothing like it. All their eyes were fixt upon a face so full of beauty, and they all agreed in one, that the Painters imagination had far out-done what ever Nature had done of most accomplisht. After they had well eyed this Venus, for my part, said the Princesse Aretephile, I would fain know whether Philoxypes heart could resist a personage who should perfectly resemble this picture? Since I have been able (replied he) to behold all these Ladies that are here, without daring to professe my service, it is to be believed, I should be as insensible for her, or rather as full of respect for her, as I have been for all the rest that I see, who are no lesse fair than this Venus. 'Tis not notwithstanding (said he smilingly, and without any other designe, then to say somewhat of gallantry to entertain conversation) that I am not glad that this picture is only the effect of the famous Mandrocles imagination. For I confesse unto you, there is a certain charming, modest, and passionate air in the eyes of this goddess, which would peradventure please me too much, were it a living beauty. Philoxypes had no sooner said this, but all the company began to smile at this first mark of his tenderness, which they had never before observed in him. There was not any one of them who would not willingly, if it had been possible, have inspired life into this picture, that they might see whether Philoxypes might be bent by her or no; and whether his rebel heart to love, would prove proof against her extraordinary charms. If this could be, said Princesse Thilmoclea, I wish at least that this fair personage, should have as much sweetness in her foul as in her eyes, to the end that nothing might be wanting to Philoxypes happinesse. On the contrary, said the Princesse of Salamis, me thinks it were to be wisht, that (to punish my Brother for his inflexibility) she were as cruel, as fair; and I doubt me, added Aretephile, whether for his greater punishment, she were not to be wisht to be proud and stupid: or rather, said Princesse Agharista, inconstant, fickle, altering her humour every day; and for his yet further punishment, added the King smilingly, that she were all that you all have said. At these words Philoxypes desired so much favour of them, as that they would suffer him to enjoy that quiet which liberty bestows on them who possesse her: But the Sun being already low, he mentioned a walk to this fair company, who without resistance gladly accepted thereof. He led them into a large plot of ground, which makes an Island; for he had drawn a branch of the River of Claria round about it. Passing from thence over a little bridge, with ballasters of brass, he led them into an Allie of Orange Trees, twelve hundred paces long, which the Sun could never get into, so large are those Trees, and so thick covered with leaves and flowers. Amidst this Allie there crosses a Channel of running water; at last you come to a place where eleven Allies crosse one another; at the end of which, the River is every where seen, as if it were so delighted with that place, as it were loth to leave it. All these Allies are either of Orange Trees, or Ciltron Trees, or Myrrhe, or Lawrel, or Pomegranats, or Palm Trees: but after being come to the end of one of these Allies, into which Philoxypes sent them, they found themselves in a large Meadow, which is cut thorow in the middle by the River, which gathered together in that place, seems to be a great Channel, which hath on its Banks neither Canes, nor Rushes, nor Reeds, nor little Shrubs, but is onely bordered by thick Turf, and all besprinkled over with Flags of differing colours, with Narcissus's, with Lillies, and all other flowers, which love moisture and freshnesse. There are likewise on this River, great store of Swans, which swim so demurely, as you would think they were afraid to trouble Page 156 the water which bears them up: and that there might nothing be wanting to this entertainment, Philoxypes had so ordered it, as this River was all covered over with Boats, made like Gallies, painted with lively colours, and guided by young Boyes in Maratin apparel, but very handsome; who rowing gently with Oars painted red and green, came to the bank to receive this gallant company, who were played unto on rustick Musick by young Shepherds very quaintly clothed, who drove herds along that Meadow on the other side of the River. Their Shepheards crooks were all trimmed with brass guilt over, and strewed over with cypers; their Flutes and little Baggpipes were as well deckt as were their sheep, all whose homes were loaded with flowers. In divers parts of this Meadow, were a hundred lovely Shepherds, clothed in white, with hats of roses, who to make the place the more pleasing, mixt the melody of their voices to the rustick Musick aforesaid. So sweet a place being doubtlesly proper to infuse joy, and pleasure, being no disposition to cruelty; the King found Aretephile a little more gentle; and all the worst treated lovers of this company, found at least some truce to their sufferings, and were maugre themselves delighted with so lovely a place, which was bounded about by a very high Pallesade, wherein Niches placed at equal distances, were statues of white Marble, the rarest that were ever seen in Greece.

But I may seem to be my self enchanted in a place so full of charms, since I stay so long thereon: I must then haste to make this fair company depart, whom Philoxypes waited on back to Paphos, after having offered them a famous banquet. Some few days after, being returned home, with intention to entertain himself alone there for two dayes, he spent all that time very contentedly: But Philoxypes his humour lying rather to like general beauties, wherein art hath nothing to do, then those where art undertakes to perfect nature, went out of his Park, and unaccompanied by any save one servant, he went to the River side, intending to walk along it till he should come to the head thereof, which is not far from thence, and which certainly is one of the goodliest things in the world: For this miraculous Spring-head, which of it self makes a River, is inclosed by Rocks of an inaccessible height; at the foot of the greatest, and highest whereof, is a large cave which extends it self even to the loss of sight, both on the right hand and on the left, under inaccessible Rocks. At the bottome of this Cave, is a silent spring, which sometimes riseth up to the top of the den, and sometimes falls so low, as it is not above five or six foot high. This inequality is the cause why the River of Claria, as well as all the others of Cyprus, pass rather for a fair Torrent, then for a River; though this be not positively so, for it is never altogether dried up, as are all the rest. As he went towards this Cave, he got off horse-back, leaving his horse with his servant, commanding him to wait his return, and not to follow him.

Thus did he walk all alone, along these Torrents, with the sight and noise whereof, he he was much delighted, when raising up his eyes, he might see some twenty paces off, a very handsome woman, though in mean habit, who was sate upon a Rock, all covered over with moss; and who seemed to take pleasure in eying attentively the fall of waters which came rushing at her feet, as if to do her homage. At first Philoxypes thought not to trouble the contentment of one whose humour was so conformable to his, to sit musing upon the River side, and to turn a little aside, that he might not interrupt her. But being come a little neerer, and seeing that her apparel though clean, and handsome, gave her not out to be a personage of quality, he went directly towards her, because that was the easiest way. But being come very neer her, and the noise his walking made, having made this woman look about, he was strangely taken; not only to see the handsomest creature in the world, but to discern perfectly that, that miraculous Venus which he had in his Gallery, and which he had always taken onely for the effect of a handsome imagination, was really the picture of this personage; Philoxypes, ravisht at this so strange apparition, changed his colour; and saluting this maid with more civility then her condition seemed to require, he advanced yet neerer her; but she rising up in haste, and having not without a blush paid him his salute, as if she had been troubled to be seen alone in that place, she hastened to go unto an old man and a woman well advanced in years, who were not above twenty paces off her; yet fearing by like to be followed, she turned her head twice towards Philoxypes, who was still the more dazed with her beauty, and more confirmed in his opinion. This Prince surprised at this encounter, had a great desire to know who this young and so wonderfull handsome maid might be; and to know also how Mandrocles could come to draw her picture; and why Mandrocles had always told Page 157 him, that the picture which he had drawn, was only an effect of his fancy: He followed her with his eyes as far as he could; but having stood still a pretty while, not knowing why he did so, he lost sight of her amongst those Rocks after she was come up to those she went unto, so as he could no more discover her.

Philoxypes did not overmuch endeavour it, though his minde led him very much thereunto, but coming neer the River side, instead of continuing to walk towards the Spring head, he went down the stream; and were it by hazard, or out of designe, he happened to rest himself upon the same Rock covered with moss, on which he had seen the fair maid sit. Philoxypes being there, could think on nothing, but on this fair unknown one, and upon the pleasing adventure which had befallen him. He then remembered the discourse which had past in the Gallery, and what he had said of that picture which every one so much commended; and delighted to entertain himself upon this subject, how glad said he unto himself, would Princesse Aretephile be, if she knew what had befallen me, and how would the King mock me if he heard it? They would certainly say, that the Goddess had wrought a miracle to punish me, by making me meet with a Country wench, of whom to make the object of my choice. But said he, presently after, this Country maid is fairer then whatsoever there is of beauty in the Court; and I shall sufficiently revenge my self of all our Ladies, if I can once more meet with her, and let them see her. He then resolved to return the next day to the same place, and in the mean time not to speak of her till he had found her again. He then returned home, but full of amazement; at his first arrival, he went strait to his Gallery, and grew so confident in his belief, that his Venus Urania was the very picture of this fair unknown one, as he doubted no more thereof. He compared all the features of this picture, with the image which he bare about in his mind, not finding any difference between them save that the original was farre above what ever Mandrocles with all his art, could represent. He seemed to have observed in her face, a much more pleasing youthly aire, a much more majestical modesty, and a sweetness infinitely more alluring. In fine, the Prince Philoxypes, who had wont to be more in his Closet, then in his Gallery, perceiving that the sight of this picture detained him there, whether he would or no, went forth much perplexed to see that once in his life time, he could not master his affections. He past the rest of that day, and all the next night, not being able to eface this pleasing phantasm out of his minde. The next day he returned to the same place where he had seen that fair one, still thinking how he should be pleased to cause her to be seen by the King, and the whole Court. But though he went up the River, even up to the head thereof, he could not finde her; he sought her long in vain; and being angred thereat, he sought whether he could not finde some little track about that place where he had seen the fair unknown one; but it being all Rocky, no impression of footsteps could be seen there, nor could there be any track found amongst the Rocks. Desperat then, as he was, not to finde any knowledge of what he so much desired, he returned back, absolutely resolving not to return any more to that place: yet was he no sooner at home, but that he wisht to be at the River side; he enquired of all his servants, if they had never met any body thereabouts, which resembled that Venus; and askt them very particularly, in what places, and into what houses Mandrocles went when he painted with his Gallery? They answered, that they had never seen her whom he spoke off, and that Mandrocles was a solitary man, who saw no body, who spent all his time in designing amongst those Rocks; and that he took almost alwayes the way towards the head of Claria. Philoxypes not able to learn any more, did what he could to think no more thereon; but though he had resolved to return next day to Paphos, he stayed at Claria, (for his house bears the name of the River which passeth by it) and whatever designe he had, never to return to seek out the fair unknown one, his feet maugre himself, bare him alwayes towards the place where he had met her. He returned often from thence, not knowing why he would not willingly go thither, nor why he went thither, not having any thought of so doing. But at last yeelding to his curiosity, he returned towards those Rocks, resolving to suffer himself to be guided by fortune; leaving always his servant and his horse where he left them the first time.

He wandred then long amongst those Mountains, when being weary, he sate himself down, which he had hardly done, upon a neighbouring Rock, when he might discover afar off a little Cottage, in a place which appeared very savage unto him: so as rising up, it may be, said he unto himself, 'tis here where the Gods have hidden the Treasure, which I seek for. And indeed he had not walked far, when he saw the fair unknown one, Page 158 accompanied by the same old man, and the same woman which he had formerly seen, and by three or four others all meanly clothed, which seemed to take a by-way which led to a little Temple, which lies towards the Sea side, and which was built for the accomodation of strangers, who traffique in that Island, and land on that side. The Temple not being above six furlongs from this little rural habitation, 'twas but a walk to go thither on foot.

Philoxypes ravisht at this encounter, went towards them; and addressing his speech to the old man, after having saluted, and looked on the fair unknown, with more admiration than at first; Father, said he, know you who they be that live in that little house which I see yonder amongst the Rocks? Sir, said he they are people who merit not the honour you do them in speaking to them; nor do I know how my Cabin should cause curiosity in a man of your condition.

Whilst the old man spoke, Philoxypes had his eyes fixt upon the fair unknown one so attentively, as he made her blush, and forced her to turn her head aside; he willingly would have spoken to her, but that (as he told me afterward) hee was afraid to ruine himself in so pleasing an enchantment; and that he would finde as much rudenesse in her conversation, as she had sweetnesse in her eyes; to boot, that he saw her to be so modest, as he easily imagined she would not speak long unto him in her parents presence, (for he perceived she behaved her self as if she were the old mans daughter) he enquired also of the good old man, if he went oft to that Temple? whether his abode there had been long? whether he were of Cyprus, or no? whether that were his whole family? and a hundred other things to continue the conversation. To all which, though the other answered exactly, Philoxypes did hardly hear any thing he said; and thus they parted, after he had tane his leave of them all, hardly knowing what he said.

Not having learnt any thing, but that he had once more seen the fair unknown one, that she was much more lovely then he had thought her to be, that he knew her abode, and the Temple whither she somtimes went. He pursued her with his eyes as far as he could; but at last being ashamed of what he did, and seeking a reason for it, he returned back the same way, and went into his Gallery, it being the only place in all his house, wherein he pleased himself. When he was come therinto, he began to walk with more disquiet then he had wont to be acquainted withall. And far from his former design of bringing the fair unknown one to the Court, he did as far as in him lay, put on a resolution of never seeing her more himself: so much was he affected with this second sight.

To this purpose, he went forthwith out of his Gallery, got on horse-back, and returnd to Paphos; the King who loved him dearly, and who had as much of friendship for him, as of love for the Princesse Aretephile, complained of his so long abode in the Countrey, and made as much of him as could be. He immediatly entreated him to visit the Princesse Aretephile, because there had been some little quarrel between them, which he acquainted him withall, making the most he could of it.

Philoxypes obeys him, visits the Princesse, and makes them friends: but let him do what he pleaseth, or go whither he will, his thoughts are still busied about the fair unknown one; he compares her with all the beauties that he sees, and whether he behold Aretephile, Thimoclea, Agharista, or whosoever else, he can see none but his sister, the fair Princesse of Salamis, who comes any way neer her for beauty; but he preferred the other a thousand times before her, as being a thousand times more beautiful then whatsoever the world hath of beauty. Two dayes after he returned to Claria, and the next day he went to the aforesaid little Temple, whither those that were of the Island went selldome or never, it being only built for strangers.

And this was the reason wherefore the beauty of the fair unknown one, had not been noised abroad, neither in Apia, which is not far from thence, nor in Soly, which is very neer it, nor in Claria which joynes upon it. Philoxypes, then maugre himself, went thither, whether he was no sooner come, but he saw the fair maid still accompanie with the same company, who devoutly prayed to the Goddess that is there adored. In fine, Sir, to keep that no longer from you, which Philoxypes had much adoe to acknowledg to himself, this last sight fully conquered him; for the sacrifice being somewhat long, love had time enough to fasten him with his chains not to be untied. You may believe it had been easie for Philoxypes to have spoken to this maid, as she came out of the Temple, and to have followed her home, if he had pleased; but though love had already gotten the upper hand in his heart, yet had it not Page 159 driven out shame from thence. And Philoxypes did me the honour to tell me afterwards, that he was so ashamed of his own weaknesse, and of the meanness of this maids condition as he sometimes wisht to be dead.

This little assembly being gone, and he being returned home strangely perplext, what said he to himself, is it possible that Philoxypes, that unflexible Philoxypes, who could never be wrought upon by all the fair Ladies of Cyprus, should be in love with one born in a Cottage, bred up amongst Rocks, and savage people? Ah, no, no: it cannot be. I would rather rip out my heart, then suffer it any longer to retain so mean, and so unworthy an affection. But (said he presently afterwards) there is somewhat of Divinity in suprem beauty, which is not to be resisted. And if this unknown one be more fair then all the Princes of the world, she better deserves the love of the inflexible Philoxypes, then all they do. Yet I am sure, said he, when the wise Solon told me, That a man might without shame be once in his life time overcome by love; he understood it not to be by the love of a shepherddesse, as doubtlesly she is—at these words not having power to end his speech and say, Whom I love; shame stopt his mouth, and for awhile he said nothing.

Then suddenly re-assuming his speech, No, no, said he, Solon would not approve the folly which possesseth me: For in fine, to love a person so beneath ones self, a person, whose name one is afraid to ask; one to whom one hath never spoken, and to whom I dare not speak, for fear of finding her mind unworthy of her beauty, one who peradventure will not understand my language, who peradventure hath neither vertue nor goodnesse, and whom the Gods have endowed with extraordinary beauty, only for my confusion, and to make me despair; once more it cannot, it must not be; so dreadful an evil must be early withstood; and as there are some venomous whose mischief is only cured by themselves, the fair unknown one must cure me of the malady she hath caused in me.

I must once more see her, and speak to her, to the end that the blemishes of her mind, and her rude conversation, may drive that beauty from my heart, which her charming beauty and pleasing eyes hath placed there. But good Gods, replied he unto himself, is it possible so fair a personage should have any defaults? Think Philoxypes what thou wilt do; and fear lest whilest you think to finde a cure for your evil, you render it incurable.

Thus Philoxypes reasoned with himself, who in effect resolved to go the next day to the Cottage, where the fair unknown one dwelt, with intention to speak unto her, and so to cure himself, imagining that his shame to see himself in that Cottage, and the maids gross conversation, would infallibly salve his passion. But he knew not that 'tis an usual effect of love to make those who are in love, make use of all pretences, whereby they may come near those whom they love, not knowing themselves why they go thither.

Philoxypes failed not then to go the next day towards the rocks, at foot whereof according to his custome he left his servants: But as he went, he was much disquieted; sometimes he wisht this young maid might neither have wit nor attraction; and by and by, desired again he might meet with nothing in her which might detract from her beauty. In fine, not knowing whether he desired to be sick or cured, whether he would be free or a captive; and not knowing also under what pretence to make this odd visit, he marcht on till he came to a little Valley, seated between Rocks, stoln as it were from the world, and very fit, to say the truth, to hide so infinite a precious treasure. At the foot of this little Valley, there lies a pleasant Meadow; and upon the side of these Rocks, a little Wood of Myrtle, and wild Pomegranats, intermingled with some Orange Trees. At the bottome of this Wood, there stands a little House very low built, but in indifferent good repair: As Philoxypes drew near it, his troubles re-doubled, and he was almost tempted to turn back, so ashamed was he of his weaknesse. But at last being forced on by love, he entred into the fore-Court of this house, closed in with Lawrels no higher then ones elbow, which are verry common in this Island. At last seeing a door open, he came into a little Chamber, decently, though but meanly furnished; in which he found a fair unknown one, and two other women who made Garlands of flowers, intending to carry them the next day to the Temple, and give them to the Priest who lived there, to adorn the Victime, which was to be offered, there in sacrifice. You may imagin, how much astonished this young maid might be, to see such a one as Philoxypes enter her Cabin, who is alwayes richly clothed, and who as you know, is of a very stately behaviour; she no sooner saw him, but rising up in haste she let all her flowers fall, thereby affording Philoxypes occasion of commencing conversation, who stooped down to gather up the fallen flowers: Sir, said she, endeavouring Page 160 to hinder him, pray trouble not you self, for our Woods and Meadows abound in the like, so as I may easily repair this losse, if these were spoiled. Those which your Woods and Fields produce, said he, are not of such worth as these, which I restore you, because they have not been gathered by so fair a maid as you. Sir, said she, blushing, the Goddesse to whom I intend to offer them, will look more upon the intention of my heart, then upon my face, which certainly hath nothing in it, which may occasion you to speak as you do. But Sir, said she, (not giving him leave to interrupt her, to the end she might change the discourse) you have perhaps somewhat to command my Father, who will be very much troubled that he is not here, that he might have the glory to obey you: but he is gone forth with my Mother, and will not return till night.

Philoxypes hearing her speak with so much judgement, and such civility, he having at most expected nothing but innocency, and simplicity in her conversation, had hardly the power to answer her. He beheld her with admiration, and listened to her with astonishment; he observed a decent negligence in her apparel, and her tone of speech so excessively charming, as he was ravisht; she spoke not only Greek, but with all the Attique purity, and Courtly smoothnesse; her action was moreover infinitely becoming, having nothing in it, neither of affected, nor yet of Clownish. He found such modesty in her looks, and so lovely a freshnesse in her complexion, as he had hardly liberty to reply; yet after some strivings within himself, 'tis true, fair maid, said he, I had somewhat to say unto your Father, but till such time as I shall see him, give me leave to ask you why he makes choice of so solitary an abode. Sir, said she, such is my respect unto him, as I never informed my self of what you desire to know; but I have sometimes thought that this place is not of his choice, and that he lives here, only to fit his mind unto his fortune, which not having destin'd him a Palace, hinders him not from thinking himself happy in his Cottage.

But is it possible, said he, that this austere solitarinesse should not seem tedious to you? Sir! (replied she with a modest smile) you will doubtlesly think me very rustick and savage, when shall dare to say, that the only trouble I have met withall amidst these Rocks, since I have lived here, is that wherewith I am now possest, to see you in a place, where I use not to see any one; and where certainly I would not see you, were I in a condition to do otherwise; it not appearing seemly to me, that one of your condition, should busie himself in talking so long with such a one as I am. I should be very unhappy, said Philoxypes, if should have offended you, or have appeared too importunate: but lovely personage, tell mee I beseech you, your name, and your Parents name, and tell me what God or Goddess 'tis that comes to instruct you in these Woods? Sir! said she, my name is Policrite, my Father is called Cleanthes, and my Mother Megisto; but as for those Gods which you say do teach me, they have as yet taught me so little, as I am ignorant even of civility: to witnesse which, I shall take the boldnesse to say, that since those on whom I depend are not here, I shall desire you not to take it ill, if I intreat you not to tarry any longer in a place, wherein you will find more of incommody, then content. I shall not alter my mind, replied Philoxypes for what you say, but must once more affirm, that doubtlesly the Gods have in a moment inspired you, with what others have much ado to learn in their whole lives. For that you should be the fairest maid in all the world, and fairer in a Cottage, then Queens are in their Palaces; though this be very much, yet it is not impossible, but that living amongst Woods and Rocks, you should behave your self, and speak as you do, 'tis this fair Philocrite, that I cannot comprehend; nor can I imagin that you were born here amongst these savage Rocks; 'tis true, Sir, said she, I am not of this Island by birth; but was so young when I parted from Creta, as I hardly remember any thing thereof. 'Tis true, the conversation which I have here, cannot have given me the accent of the Countrey, for I speak with none but those of this family, who are no more of Cyprus then I.

What, Policrite, said Philoxypes, do you spend your whole time without speaking, and yet speak as you do? Once more, this Cottage is unworthy of you; and some means must be found out to draw you hence. I am so well contented here, Sir, said she, as I should thereby receive an injury; and I imagin you have no such design; therefore I conjure you to leave me in that solitarinesse that you found me; for neither will I say much more unto you, not being able to speak any thing of mine own experience.

Philoxypes, who observed that this young maid was indeed troubled to see him tarry so long with her, though it were in no dis-obliging manner, was loth to anger her; so as Page 161 with much violence used upon himselfe, after having saluted her with such reverence, as if she had been upon a Throne, he offered to be gone. But, Sir, said she, with much candour, you know my name is Policrite, and I cannot tell my Father what his name is, that hath done him the honour to inquire after him; replied this Prince, transported with love, my name is Philoxypes. Alas, Sir!

answered Philocrite, I beg your pardon, if I have not used you with such respect as I ought. Is not then, said he, my name unknown unto you? No, Sir, said she, and I have heard my Father, though he knows you not himself, say such things of you by the report of others, as I am sure will make him rejoice exceedingly when he shall know that you will do him the favour to command him any service. Philoxypes, enchanted to hear Policrite speaking in such sort, said unto her a thousand passionate and obliging things, if she would have understood them; to which she still replied with such readiness and modesty, as he still became in love with her more and more.

He then took his leave of her, and departed from this Cottage, with an unconceivable sorrow; being come to the same place where he first saw her, he stayed; and beholding on the one side his goodly and magnificent Palace of Claria, and on the other side this little Countrey Cottage: Ah, Philoxypes, cried he, who would believe, that in the condition thy soul is in, thou canst prefer this unluckie Cottage before that stately Palace? and that thy heart so insensible of love, and so ambitious of true glory, can abase it self before Policrite's feet? But then, said he again, is it possible that Philoxypes should love any thing which is not the handsomest thing in the world? And if it be so, Policrite ought to be the object of his desires and love. I say, Policrite, in whose looks is no Art, whose words are sincere, all whose thoughts are innocent, who knows not what a sin is, whose heart is not prepossessed with any passion, who as yet loves nothing but the Woods, Fields, Flowers, and Fountains; who is hardly conscious of her own beauty, and whose inclinations are doubtlesly all vertuous. But when all is done, said he, after a little pause, love is a weakness, from whence I have till now defended my self, only because I did verily believe, that it was handsome not to be capable thereof; but to love a personage of so unequal birth, is a folly, which I ought by all means to withstand. For in fine, with what face shall I dare to appear at Court? How fair soever Policrite be, I dare not shew the irons she makes me wear; they must either be broken by force, or so cunningly conceal'd, as no man may ever discern them.

With this resolution did Philoxypes return home, and from thence to Paphos; but he was so possess'd with melancholy, as he was forced to fain himself sick. The King, who saw him that very night, both with himself, and with the Princesse Aretephile, perceived his perplexity, and pressed him to know the cause: But Philoxypes answered him as he had done the rest. The Court was very great that day, and all that was gallant, was there; which occasioned Philoxypes in his ravings, to enquire of himself an hundred and an hundred times, why, since he was to love, it was not some of those illustrious personages? Yet though he would use violence upon himself, and endeavour to love by reason, he could never compass it. And Policrite's image was so deeply imprinted in his heart, as nothing could deface it. He passed over three dayes thus with very much disquiet, and on the fourth mauld himself, he returned to Claria, and from thence to Cleanthes, whom at his first approach, he found leaning upon a little Pallisado of Lawrels, which encompassed his Court. As soon as this wise Old man saw him, he stept unto him, and received him with such Civility as had nothing of Rustick in it. Sir, said he, I thought my Daughter had been deceived when she told me your Name, which kept me from coming to Claria to receive your Commands; to boot, that 'tis hard to imagine, that a Man of my Fortune and Age may be any wayes serviceable to such a Prince as you. Vertue and Worth, said Philoxypes, makes friends unto it self of all Ages, and of all conditions. But Cleanthes, the only thing I desire to know of you, is whether it be out of necessity, or out of choice, that you inhabit this little House? for, if it be the former, you shall not tarry long here; and if the latter, I will come and live with you sometimes; at which Cleanthes smiled, and said, Poor Cottages, Sir, are no proper abodes for great Princes. 'Tis very true, said Philoxypes, neither ought great Worth to be confin'd to little Cottages, but doth much better become great Palaces: I therefore proffer you my House Claria, where you and your Family may live more commodiously then here. Sir, replied Cleanthes, 'tis handsome for a personage of your condition and worth to be willing to relieve the distressed, but it were not just to abuse that goodness, which may be better employed on some better occasion. For, in fine, Sir, I suffer no want in this Cottage, my mind being no greater then it; I here live Page 162 in quiet, and finding in this little corner of the earth sufficient to keep me from being troublesome to any body, I live here much more happily then those who live in Palaces, and whose desires are not therein bounded. But wise Cleanthes, said Philoxypes, will you not tell me what Fortune 'tis that hath brought you hither, and acquaint me precisely with your condition? Sir, said the good Old man, I am descended of honest Parents, of an indifferent Fortune; for mine, you see it is mean enough, and I assure you my worth is not extraordinary. I was forc'd to forgo my Countrey, for many reasons, too long now to tell, and to seek out a place of Retirement in this Island, where I have lived a good while; but said Philoxypes, are you not afraid lest Policrite, who may justly be termed a Treasure, may not be safe in such a place as this? if I should grant, answered Cleanthes, that Policrite should be what you say, since this Treasure is only known by Prince Philoxypes, I should think it safe enough; you have reason, Father, said he, for what you say, for I engage my self to protect you, against what, or whosoever shall go about to injure you. After this Cleanthes led him into his House, where he found Megisto, Cleanthes wife, who received him so Civilly, as he easily discern'd that there was nothing of Rustick nor savage in this family. She had by her young Policrite, and another maid handsome enough, whom Policrite called Sister, and whose name is Dorida: But, good Gods, how fair did Policrite appear to Philoxypes that day? Her hair which hung careless over her neck, and which were the one half covered by a thin Tiffany, were tied back behind her head, with a Garland of Orange and Pomgranate flowers, over which hung a thin Veil, with which she covered her Face when she went in the Sun, and which very well became her Dressing: The rest of her Apparel was white, of a handsome shape; her Sleeves, which were very large, were trust back with Ribbons of several colours; and though there was nothing of stately in this habit; and that instead of Pearls and Diamonds, she was only deck'd with flowers, yet was there somewhat of so handsome and so comely in her dressing, as she never appear'd so fair to Philoxypes, the more he saw her, the more he was in love with her; and were it that he entertained Cleanthes, that he spoke to Megisto, that he addressed himself to Policrite, or that he said somewhat of civility to Dorida, he was still more and more taken. What did he not do to make them tell him somewhat more then Cleanthes had told him, and to perswade them that he might fit them with a better Lodging? He offer'd Cleanthes Jewels to dispose of at his pleasure; but let him do what he could, he could learn nothing, nor obtain nothing, save only leave to come and visit them sometimes, which they granted him, meely because they knew not how to deny it him. I will not stay to tell you how frequently Philoxypes returned thither during twelve Dayes space which he staid at Claria, without returning to Paphos; but I will tell you, that Cleanthes, who had understanding enough, & Megisto who wanted not any, easily perceived that it was Policrite's beauty which occasioned this Prince his so frequent Visits, he read her a long Lesson, and wisht her to have a care of her self, and that she should consider that Philoxypes his affection could not but redound to her prejudice: and that therefore she should live with him, as with one whom she should never look upon but meely with respect, not suffering him to engage her in any particular affection. This mean while Philoxypes, who perceived he should never have the Freedome to speak to Policrite in particular, unlesse it were by chance, came so often thither, as he met her once unaccompanied by any save the young Dorida. This being too fair an occasion to let slip, he drew near unto her, and expressing much Love in his looks, Think not, Policrite, said he, that I have any thing of miss-becoming to say unto you, though I have diligently watched to entertain you alone; 'Tis only that not knowing how you will receive my affection, I was not desirous to have any witnesses of my misfortune or happiness. Sir, said she, with a Maidenly-blush, before you speak, consider I beseech you where you are; mark well the Cottage wherein I live, and see what clothes I wear. No, Policrite, reply'd he, I see nothing but your Eyes, and had you a Crown of Diamonds on your head, I should no more minde it then what you speak of; so firmly are my looks fixt upon your Beauty. Permit me then, Sir, said the discreet and fair Maid, to teach you another thing, which it may be you are ignorant of, and which ought to keep you from saying any thing of unfitting to me. 'Tis, Sir, that this very Policrite, whom you see in this Countrey Cottage, who is thus simply attir'd, who is only known to these Woods and Rocks hath notwithstanding her meanness and simplicity, so tender a sense of Honour, that should you offend her never so little therein, she were able to die for sorrow and dislike. Be careful then, Sir, to say nothing which may make Policrite believe, that you know her not; for, in fine, she hath such a passion for Vertue, Page 163 as she should have much ado not to hate those who should say any thing unto her in opposition thereunto. Fear not, said he, fairest Policrite, that I shall say any thing to you, which shall offend you, at least, which should offend; for I protest unto you in the presence of the gods, who hear me, that the passion which you have for flowers, fountains, and for these inamell'd fields, is not more pure, nor more innocent, then that which I have for Policrite; and if there be any difference between them, 'tis that the affection which I bear to her, is so violent and strong, as there is nothing which I shall not willingly undertake to witness it unto her. You cannot better do it, Sir, said she, then in doing me the favour to say no more such things unto me, which will only serve to trouble the quiet of my life, since if I should not believe you, I should certainly be somewhat troubled to think you would laugh at my simplicity; and if I should beleieve you, I should almost despair, for being the cause why a great Prince should contract a passion so unworthy of him, and from whence he can never reap any advantage.

For in fine, Policrite knowing her self, and knowing you also, would not her self commit a fault, nor yet cause you commit one for love of her; do not therefore ingage your self Sir, in so angersome an adventure: Let me alone (said she, looking upon him with an eie, which did rather detain him then drive him away, though it were done without art) let me alone I say, amongst our Woods and Rocks, and get you to your Palaces, where you will be much better then here. Philoxypes was astonished to hear Policrite speak thus, when throwing himself at her feet, No, no, divine Policrite, said he, you are not what you appear to be; and though you were so, yet would your vertue place you in a degree above all the Queens in the World. Sir said she, raising him up, think not that I am to be won by flatteries; for though I know not the World by mine own experience, I know it by my Parents relation. I therefore know that love is a dangerous passion, and not knowing precisely what it is, I know it ought to be avoyded; and that I ought rather to apprehend that love which you say you bear me, then any other. And wherefore, Policrite, said he, do you thus treat that innocent passion, which you raised in my heart? Because said she, it cannot be but injurious to Philoxypes, or to Policrite. But say for God's sake said he, suppose that Policrite were a Princesse, or that Philoxypes, were of the same condition that Policrite is; what would you then think of him? I cannot tell said she, but this I know Sir, that though I should esteem him never so much; nay, though I should love him very much, Cleanthes and Megisto should always absolutely dispose of me. Say then said he, if they should be favourable, would you without any repugnancy obey them? Sir said she, smiling a little, I have been so told that I must not lightly trust any one, as I think it not convenient to reveal so great a secret to you. Hereupon Cleanthes and Megisto returned, and broke off their discourse; Philoxypes presently observed that these two persons were troubled at his visits; he therefore resolved not to be so frequent in them, lest he might for ever lose a happiness, which now he might sometimes enjoy. Thus, Sir, Philoxypes after some short discourse departed, and returned not onely to Claria, but to Paphos, whither the King had also sent for him; not being able to let him be so long alone and solitary, all the Ladies, and the whole Court complained of him, and could not comprehend the reason of his so long retirement; The King continued to give him new testimonies of his affection, by bestowing on him the government of Cithera, which was false void by the death of the former Governour. He acquainted him with what had befallen him during his absence, with Princesse Aretephile, and conjur'd him to speak always to her in his behalf. For said he, Aretephile hath taken a phancy to be sure of the Crown of Cyprus, before she give me her heart, and I will have her give me her heart, before I give her the Crown. Philoxypes promised the King to speak to Aretephile, but it was with such sadness as all the Court took notice of it. He did almost always little better then rave, he would mistake, and say one thing for another, he shunn'd company, and as soon as he could, he returned to Claria. He found more resistancy in Policrite, then he thought to have met withall; for she, fearing all things, durst hardly look upon this Prince; the difference of his condition, though it made her more obliged unto him in her soul, yet was it the reason why she treated him so coolly. Philoxypes would have presented the whole Family, but they all refused to receive any. This mean while he was still more unhappy; for though he loved Policrite passionately, and that he valued her more then all the world besides, yet could he never put on a resolution of making any one acquainted with this his so meanly placed passion: He would certainly have been able to live with Policrite in any desert Island; but he knew not how he could avow the marrying a Maid of her condition, to the Page 164 world; yet did he still love her with a respectfull affection, not giving way to any sinfull desire: That pure and unartificiall vertue which he saw in Policrite, infused into him a greater respect for her, then if she had been seated on a Throne; he then perceived he loved, without hope of ever finding a remedy for his evil, upon lesser termes, then resolving to abandon the Court, and Kingdom, and to ask Policrite of Cleanthes upon so vexatious termes; but that which most of all afflicted him was, that he knew not how he stood in Policrite's affection; he found her milde and civil, he observes no marks of hatred in her countenance; but there was therein also so great a reservednesse, and so exact a modesty, as he could not penetrate her thoughts: He thought also, that Policrite was grown somewhat more melancholy then she had formerly been, and indeed he was not mistaken, for Philoxypes his handsomenesse, his good behaviour, his wit, and civility, being things not to be seen without liking; young Policrite could not see her self belov'd of such a Prince as he, without having her heart a little toucht with acknowledgement; yet seeing her self in a condition so far beneath his, and out of a sense of vertue she must resist this budding affection, she could not but be afflicted at this conquest which she had made; and to belmoan her self thereof to her dear Dorida who had wit enough. Sister, said she unto her, how happy are you in comparison of me, who can take pleasure in walking abroad, in gathering of flowers, in hearing birds sing, and the fall of waters, and in not being reJduced to a condition of complaining of too much good fortune: For in fine Dorida, Philoxypes heart is a conquest which I am sure the greatest Queens would be proud to have made; yet whilst they might innocently rejoyce thereat, I must be therewithall afflicted: I could wish I had never seen him; or at least I think I could: For when all is done, though me thinks I could heartily desire that he would love me no more, yet am I glad to see him. But if love, replied Dorida, be so powerfull a thing as it is said to be, how know you but that Philoxypes may love you well enough to Marry you? Ah sister, answered she, as I would do nothing misbeseeing me, so neither would I that Philoxypes should do any thing that might misbeseeem him to do: But, said Dorida, belike then you love Philoxypes, since you interest your self in his honour, against your self. Policrite blusht at this discourse, and looking confusedly upon Dorida, if you were better acquainted with this passion then I, said she, I would tell you whatsoever my soul is sensible of, to the end she, I might know what to think of it; But I cannot yet believe that this dangerous disease be yet got into my heart; for if you remember well, we have heard Cleanthes say, and we have read it more then once, that love makes one lose their reason; that it causeth a thousand pains, and vexations, that it sometimes makes people do amisse; and I thank Heaven, I do not yet feel any of all this; Me thinks my reason is free enough, and I am well enough pleased with the melancholy which possesseth me: For tis true, I oft times talk I know not what, but I delight in doing so; and though I would not love Philoxypes, yet there are certain moments wherein I am well enough pleased that he should love me: But as for any thing of fault, so far am I from being willing to commit any, as I protest unto you, that were it for no other reason, then not to lose Philoxypes his esteem and good opin[i]on, I would die a thousand deaths rather then do any thing that should be unjust. You may then believe, that whilst I love vertue, and would become worthy the affection of so great a Prince, I will never do any thing contrary to reputation. I believe you, answered Dorida; but for all this Sister mine, you deceive your self, if you believe you love not not Philoxypes: For in a word, you do not love what you lov'd before you knew him, you are somewhat more comely, you consult oftner with the Christall fountains, and you are quite another thing then you were. Ah Sister, replied Policrite, if that were true which you say, I would quickly take order for it, I would never see Philoxypes, but to use him harshly: to the end, that he hating me, I might no longer love him. These two young people having entertained themselves thus upon the bank of a little rivolet, Cleanthes and Megisto, who had altered their mindes, came thither; and bidding Dorida withdraw a little; Megisto began to say; Policrite! it is not many dayes since I told you, that in respect of your condition, you should never look upon Philoxypes, but with a great deal of respect; but fearing lest through that inequality which you may believe to be between you and him, you may not appear to be so much obliged to him for his affection, as indeed to put somewhat too great an estimation thereupon: Cleanthes and myself have resolved to tell you, that your true condition considered, you are not bound to behold Philoxypes at any time, but with a great deal of indifferency: For in a word, said Cleanthes, not to disguise the truth from you any longer, you are what you think not your self to be, Page 165 and we are likewise that which you know not, and what you shall not as yet know; because the Gods have not permitted us as yet to let you know it: But to shew you how much you are more obliged then you think for, to be vertuous, know Policrite, that you are of as Noble blood as any is in all Greece: And how answered Policrite, interrupting him am I not what I alwaies thought to be? No daughter said he; to number Kings amongst your Ancestors, is not the greatest mark of honour that you make boast of. There is somwhat of more August in your race, then what I speak of: Therefore that I might raise up your heart, I thought it good to trust you with this important secret, (which I charge you not to reveal to any one) as also to let you know the better how much bound you are not to doe any thing unworthy of your Fathers house, nor of the condition you are borne in. Policrite was exceedingly joy'd to hear Cleanthes speak after this manner, though her joy was not over quiet; for she was in trouble to know more precisely what was told her. Father said she, leave me not in such perplexity; tell me a little more plainly, I beseech you, so pleasing a truth, and let me know who I am.

The Gods have forbidden us it, my daughter, answered he, by the mouth of an Oracle: you must be content with what you have heard: but make use thereof to defend your self against Philoxypes love; and far from looking on him, as on a Prince who hath done you too much honour: look rather on him, as on one whom you shall favour by your permittance.

This is not, said Cleanthes, to deny, but that Philoxypes is endow'd with all the virtues and qualities requisite for a great Prince; but tis, my childe, to let you know, that there is a certain pride which doth not mis-become a young maide to defend her self there|by against love, when we have an esteem; for those that are above us, tis hard to gain|say, if they intreat. And on the contrary, when we beleve them to be beneath us, or at least but our equals, we stand not much upon denying them unjust things. Policrite assured then Cleanthes and Megisto, That though she had known nothing of what they now had told her, she should never have done any thing contrary to that decency which she had learnt of them. But how much were they mistaken, if their design were to hin|der Policrite from loving Philoxypes.

Sometimes she was filled with joy, to know that she was of Noble descent; and after|wards, being willing to make use thereof, to drive there by the beginning of affection which Philoxypes worth had already raised in her, out of her heart, she found it the more fortified by this knowledg. For said she, the knowledg of what I am, doth not take from the obligation which I ow him; since he knows not that I am any thing more then what I seem to be.

But for me, who now know what I am, why should I not hope that the Gods permit|ting Philoxypes to know my true condition, may not so order it, as that I may love him and be blameless, and be beloved by him innocently? No, no, Policrite added she, let us no longer defend our heart any longer with such opiniatrecie; let us content our selves with concealing our resentments, and do nothing that shall be faulty: and let us not reject, as a mischief the love of a Prince, to whom the wisest King of the world would not refuse to give his daughter. But it may be, said she, that Philoxypes doth but coun|terfeit, that he hath sinfull thoughts towards thee, and that thy simplicity abuseth thee.

Stay then, said she, to be resolved herein, and make triall of his constancy and fidelity, by an appearing indifferency, which may leave him without hope.

Thus was Policrite minded, when Philoxypes came to her as soon as she saw him she began to go towards her Cottage; but he, advancing hastily, stayed her; yet not being above twenty paces from it, and there being two of her womenservants at work in a Close hard by them, she stayed. What, Policrite, said he, you shun a Prince, who shuns all the world for love of you? Sir, said she, (after somewhat more an imperious manner then before, though she intended not so to do) I do what peradventure you ought to doe: For in fine, what advantage can you hope for by your visits and solicitations? The con|tentment said he, to hear from your fair mouth, that you do not hate me: If that be all you desire to be satisfied in, replied she, you may easily compas your desires; but ask no more, upon pain of refusal. What, lovely Policrite, said he, will you never love me, and shall all I can do to win your affection, prove useless? no, 'tis impossible, were you as insensible, as those pictures which I have of you. My pictures, replied Policrite? Yes, added Philoxypes, I am not so unfortunate as you think for; in despite of you, and Page 166 without your consent, I have the contentment of seeing you dayly.

Ah! said Policrite, I perceive Mandrocles hath <...> etrayed me, and hath falsified his word. Philoxypes askt her then, how she came to know Mandrocles? She told him how that famous Painter walking dayly when his leisure would permit him, amongst those rocks to draw some landskips, had one day by chance light upon their house: where, having seen her, he had begg'd leave of Cleanthes to draw her picture, which Cleanthes would have refused him, but that seeing his importunity, he was afraid lest he might speak of her to him at Claria, and that therefore he gave way unto his desire, upon condition that he should not make use of this picture, in any of his pieces, but as of a head made by fancy and imagination, and making him take a solemn oath, never to speak with any body whosoever, of any acquaintance he had with them. That since that time, as long as Mandrocles tarried at Claria, he came to teach her to designe, and had drawn her picture in twenty several postures. She then enquired of Philoxypes, whether Mandrocles had spoken to him of her, or no? And he told her the whole truth: but you may perceive, said Philoxypes, that the Goddess whom you represent, intends not that you should all|ways be inhumane, since she would her self appear in your vizage.

Sir, said she, not being of your Isle, my devotion leads me rather to be a Votress to Diana, then to worship Venus Urania, therefore it is not this your reason that will prevail with me: to boot, that his Goddess approving only of such passions as are innoc|ent, will certainly never counsel me to admit of yours. Verues self, replied Philoxypes, would advise you to it; and did you know my heart, you would need no other Coun|cellor then your self. It would take up so much time, replied she, to make me know it, as I shall advise you not to undertake the work. But said he, if I do undertake it, and if I make it evident to you, that never man loved any thing as I love you, what will you then think? I would think, said she, that you were very unfortunate, in having so passionatly loved one, who is unworthy of so much honour. But said he, would you think your self any waies obliged unto me? I should be sorrie for you, said she, and would wish your cure either by absence, or by forgetfulness.

Ah! cruel maid, said he, wish it rather by your compassion and charity; and promise me only that you will afford me leisure to perswade you, that I am the most in love of all men. To do as you say, said she, would be to be somwhat perswaded thereunto already; therefore (and with this, she walked towards her Cottage) I will listen no longer to you. After this manner did Philoxypes pass away his time; having but very few moments of delight, amongst many houres of anguish.

This mean while, he could not endure to tarry at Paphos, and when he went thither, all he could do, was only to visit the Princess Aretephile, which the King compelled him to do; but he appeared so melancholly, and so changed, as he was hardly to be known. The King, who loved him dearly, was much afflicted to see it; he together with the whole court, sought what might be the occasion of this alteration; but they could not find it. The King, askt it of Philoxypes self, but could learn nothing. Philoxypes answering alwaies, that it was some melancholy, which proceeded certainly from his temper, and from some little indisposition of health.

But said the King, solitariness is no usual cure for such incommodities; wherefore you ought not to go any more to Claria: Yet affairs went still on thus, yea even when Win|ter was come, which did the more astonish the whole Court; they knew he built no more at Claria, that the Painters and Engravers, who had been so long there, were all gone; that the season was foul; that when he went thither, 'twas but with a small traine; and that he walked alwaies alone: they saw a strange sadness in his face, and a wonderful alteration; and all this without any appearing cause. The King heaped favours and ho|nours upon him; he askt him an hundred times, what he would desire of him: he had not any one enemy; the whole Court loved him; he was exceeding rich; he appeared not to have any sickness, as the Physitians could perceive: In fine, his melancholy and retiredness, were things which could not be guest at. The whole Court talkt of nothing else; and the King was strangely troubled at it; who, not knowing how to inform him|self of what Philoxypes ailed, he be thought himself of me, whom he knew this Prince did love particularly, and in whom he did more confide, then in any other.

Thus upon a day, when Philoxypes was gone to Claria, the King sent for me; and after having assured his Majestie, (as it was true) that I knew nothing of particular concerning this Prince his melancholy, he did me the honour to command me to go to him, and to Page 167 use all my cunning to discover what it was that was in his minde: For, said he, Leontidas, I do so love Philoxypes, as I cannot live content unless I see he do so likewise, and were it to give him half my Kingdom, I would doubtlesly do it, rather then not to give him satisfaction.

I then departed, reallie intending to endeavour to satisfie the Kings curiosity, who certainly stood in need of Philoxypes presence, to counsel and comfort him concerning Aretephiles behaviour; for I think there was never known a stiffer combat between am|bition and love.

I went then to Claria where I found Philoxypes in his usuall melancholy; the which I made the greater, because I hindred him from going that daie to Cleanthes. At first sight of me, he endeavoured notwithstanding, to inforce himself to honour me so much, as to seem glad to see me; but it was after a fashion, which made me easily see that his heart gainsaid his words; and that notwithstanding any friendship he had for me, he wisht I had tarried still at Paphos.

Leontidas, said he, I am much beholding to you for coming to visit me in a season, when the Countie hath lost all its ornaments; and when the Court is fullest of diversions. Sir, said I, you commend me with less reason, then the Court complains of you; for to forgo Paphos for Claria, when you are there, 'tis to forgo the Court, for the Court; nay, for the most pleasing part of the Court: but to forgo Paphos, only to seek out solitaires at Claria, as you do, Oh, Sir, said I, (not suspecting him notwithstanding of any passion) 'tis all that a Prince in love, who is upon bad terms with his Mistress, can do. Philoxypes blusht at these words, and looking upon me with a kind of smile, which did not, notwithstanding drive the melancholy from his countenance; I perceive, Leontidas, said he, I am not so much beholding to you, as I had thought, since doubtlesly you are come hither rather to chide me, then to visit me. I am come, Sir, said I, to trie whether I may not be able to serve you in a time when all the world believes that somewhat of great importance, which they cannot guess at, doth afflict you. Leontidas, said he, I am much bound to you, but I should be so more, if you could hinder the Court from looking so far into my heart. For I confess said he, I finde it somewhat hard that a man may not look inwards sometimes, though whilst he does so, he is hardly master of his own minde.

Sir, said I, were you less beloved, you would not suffer under this persecution which you complain of: This kinde of Love, replied he, causeth in me no small suffering: For what can I more rationally do, then to conceal my Melancholy in a retiredness, to the end that I may not trouble the joy of others. But Sir, said I, tis the cause of this Melancholy which every body seeks after, and none can finde: as for my particular, I must crave your pardon if I do. For Sir, tis not ambition that torments you. No, Leontidas, said he, if I were sick of that disease, the King would quickly cure me. Neither is it revenge, said I, for not being hated by any, it is not to be believed that you are possest with hatred. You have reason for what you say, said he; and sighing added, I think I am mine own greatest enemy. It is not said I again the passion which you have for books, for that passion may cause solitariness, but not such melancholy as you are possest withall. And morelover, you have had that passion a long time, without the product of so bad an effect. It is not books, certainly said he, which cause my trouble, which were I capable of reason, would rather be my comfort. It is not Love said I, that torments you, for you see none that can cause it in you. Conclude then, said he, taking me in his armes, that there is no more to be said, but that I hate my self, that I have lost my reason, and if my friends be wise, they will let me alone, and will leave the knowledge, or cure of my malady, to the process of time.

Sir said I, shall Leontidas, who hath so particular an affection for you, be dealt withall as others are? shall he have known nothing more of your concernments, then do your enemies, if any such you have? Ah, Sir, said I, you must if you please do otherwise, & to prove to you that Leontidas doth in some sort deserve you should do so, know Sir, that hitherto I have spoken unto you as a spie, sent by the King, who will know at whatsoever price, what tis that afflicts your minde. But after having bootlesly acquitted my self of my commission, I speak no longer Sir, as one sent by the King, but as one who is resolved to serve you with his life, if it shall be needfull; and never absolutely to give you over till he know the cause of your Melancholy: for Sir, if there be no cause of this Melancholy, and that it be but a Page 168 distemper of humours, I must stay here, that I may endeavour, maugre your self, to divert you; and if there be any cause for it, Leontidas must likewise serve you therein, if there should redound no other benefit to you thereby, then to help you to keep it concealed from the King, and from the whole Court, if you desire it should be concealed from them.

I do not know any way, said he, to keep it undiscovered better, then to tell it to no body.

But Sir, said I, if you treat me with this indifferency, when I shall returne to Paphos, and the King shall ask me what I think of your Melancholy, I must needs say something to him. And what will you say to him, replied Philoxypes? I think Sir, said I, that to revenge my self for the little confidence you have in me, I will say what I do no wayes believe, to wit, that you are in love; and that the shame of you former inflexiblenesse, or of your new weaknesse, hinders you from avowing it: nay, I will peradventure tell him, said I, in mockery, that that Venus Urania, which people have so much quarrell'd with you about since the great Feast which you made here, and which did precede but a few dayes your melancholy humour hath struck you effectually in love. In fine Sir, there is nothing so odd, which I shall not say to revenge my self for the wrong you do the passion which I have to your service.

During this discourse, Philoxypes changed colour twenty times; and were it out of friendship, or out of my importunity, or that indeed those that are in love, love naturally to speak thereof, he took me by the hand, led me into his Cabinet, and after having made me take sundry solemn Oaths, never to discover what he should say unto me; and all this with as much ceremony, and pressure, as if he had some conspiracy to discover unto me against the state, or some attempt upon the Kings person; he told me that he was in love.

What Sir, said I, these retirements, these Melancholies, and this impenetrable secret, which all the world in vain seeks to finde out: Is it onely that you are in Love? Ah, Leontidas, said he, mock not at my misery; for it is greater then you can imagine. But Sir, said I, I have much ado to imagine that you can be so unfortunate as you say, since I can not conceive that there is e're a Princesse in the Kingdom (except Ambitious Aretephile, who will be Queen) who will not favourably entertain your affection, when you shall make it known unto her. Alas! said he, with a sigh, Love hath dealt much more cruelly with me then you are aware of; and since I must discover unto you the secret of my heart, know that I have met with an invincible resistance in one who lives amongst these Rocks, and dwells but in a Cottage.

Yes Leontidas, I have found a maid, or to say better, I have found Vertue it self, wholly pure, and under the visage of Venus Urania, which hath, and doth yet resist me. A maid who is not touch'd with Ambition; in whom beauty causeth no affection, nor pride; who hath simplicity and wit, gallantry and sincerity; and who in a sandy and desart place, which the gods alone have pointed out unto me, speaks better then all the wittiest Ladies in the Court.

But when all this is done, she lives in a Cottage, her condition appears to be very mean, if I consider all that is about her; and when I consider onely her self, or do but hear her speak, she appears to be upon a Throne: Her Governours are vertuous, and discreet; but still Leontidas they live in a Cottage, and will not abandon it. At last, said he with tears almost standing in his eyes, I am the most unfortunate of all men: I have a passion which I cannot overcome, and which I will not have known: I too much respect Policrite's worth (for so is she called of whom I speak) to have any sinfull desire towards her, which though I should have, it would be to no purpose: I likewise am too great a lover of Glory, to resolve to marry a maid of this condition without much repugnancy; Yet can I not live without her: my sufferings are such that I cannot expresse them; and seeing no remedy for my Malady, I bear it patiently without complaining of it, and void of all hope but death. Philoxypes told me this in so feeling a manner, as I much pitied him: He then told me all that had befallen him: How 'twas he met Policrite, how he was surprized, that it was she by whom Mandrocles had drawn the picture of Venus Urania, and all the rest which I have told you. I was somewhat surprized at this fantastick passion, chiefly when I call'd to minde Philoxypes former inflexiblenesse; Yet did I endeavour to comfort him. Sir, said I, such a beauty as that is which you represent unto me, and such a one as I have Page 169 seen in the Venus in your Gallery, bears some excuse with it, of what condition soever the possessors are, especially when it occasions onely some passing passions, and which are of no long durance, as I will hope yours will prove. No, no, said he Leontidas, do not deceive your selves; I will love Policrite till death. But Sir, not to abuse your patience, perceiving Philoxypes grievance too great to be cured, I smothered it, and sweetened it as much as possible I could. He then led me into his Gallery to shew me his excuse, though I had seen his pictures many times before: we afterwards walked abroad, but he being able onely to walk one way, we were soon amongst the Rocks, in a place from whence we might uncover Policrite's habitation, which we no sooner saw, but blushing with confusion, he said, 'tis there my dear Leontidas where she that I adore doth live; 'tis underneath that roof, which I prefer before the proudest Palaces, that Philoxypes findes some moments of content: and 'tis there in fine that all my joy and happinesse is circumscribed. Sir, said I, there needs no greater proofs of Policrites beauty, then the smalnesse of her Cottage; and whosoever shall imagine that Philoxypes affection is placed therein, cannot doubt but that he hath argued the matter with himself as much as he was able.

In fine, Sir, after that he had enlarged himself in expressing Policrites charming beauty, not suffering me to see her for fear of offending her: I must think of returning to Paphos, for I had promised the King to return that very night. I asked Philoxypes what I should say unto him; any thing said he my dear Leontidas, rather then the truth of my adventure: For in the minde that I am of, I think that I should run mad if the King should know it.

I then left him after he had made me swear a hundred times, not to discover the least part of his misfortune. I went to finde out the king, who expected me with much impatency, and who had purposely withdrawn himself early, to the end that I might speak with more freedom to him when I should return.

And how, Leontidas, said he? what doth our solitary companion do?

Sir, said I, terming him as you do, your Majesty may easily guesse at what he does. He muses, he walks, he reads; looks upon his pictures, and statues; goes from one place to another, and seeking ease every where, he findes it no where.

But Leontidas, said he, you speak to me as Philoxypes doth, and 'tis not that which I expect from you.

Sir, said I, I have done all I am able to satisfie your majesty; but I confesse my journey hath not been so successfull as I hoped for: For all that Philoxypes sayes, is onely that he findes himself somewhat ill disposed, and that he is possest with a Melancholy which he cannot master.

Did you ask him said the King, whether it were not that he did wish for somewhat which I have not bethought my self to give him, because I knew not that he did desire it?

Oh, Sir, said I, (thinking I had done well) it is not Ambition that torments Philoxypes, who is so satisfied with your Majesties goodness, as he desires nothing more then what he hath.

Have you then discovered, said he, that he hath any thing of private discontent against any one of this Court? For if it be so, I will make his interest mine, and will as severely revenge any injury done unto him, as if it had been done unto my self.

Sir, said I, Philoxypes appears to be so well beloved of all the world, as 'tis hard to think any one should injure him. I know not then what to imagine, said the King; but if Philoxypes's Ambition be satisfied, and that it is not hatred nor revenge that doth trouble him, he must needs be in Love.

Your Majesty, Sir, said I, doth too well know Philoxypes's inflexiblenesse, to suspect any such thing in him. No Leontidas, said he, Philoxypes's past obduracy, is not a Reason strong enough to perswade me that he is obdurate still. I am almost confident that 'tis this passion which robs me of Philoxypes's company; For in fine, he hath all the marks of one in Love. His countenance is altered, he not having been sick; he is melancholy without any appearing cause; he doth little else but rave; he cannot stay long in a place; he conceals his melancholy from us; he cannot endure that one should take notice of it; he gives over thinking of his affairs; he visits none but by constraint, and unlesse it be the Princesse Aretephile, whom he hath seen by my command, he hath not visited any one Lady since we were at Claria.

Sir, said I, part of what you alledge to prove that Philoxypes is in Love, me thinks Page 170 makes for the contrary: For if he were in Love, he would certainly seek out the party beloved; we should never see him from her: instead of being melancholly, he would study to play the Gallant more, and would be the more sociable: and instead of seeking out solitariness, as he doth, me thinks he should rather adde to the Court diversions: and that his chiefest employments should be musick, Baals, conversation, and going abroad.

You say well, answered the King, for what concerns ordinary passions, or such Lovers as have been fortunate in their affections; but there are certain giddie-headed passions out of the common road, which arising from a melancholly anguish, feed themselves therewithall, and shun whatsoever affords delight. But that which doth a little trouble me, is that I cannot imagin who 'tis that Philoxypes can love, and be hardly dealt withal by, for certainly there is never a Lady in all my Court, who would not glory in having won his heart: and moreover I have not observed that he hath applied himself to converse with any one in particular, yet doubtlesse Philoxypes is in Love.

Sir, said I, be not so resolute in your assertion, till you have stronger proofs thereof, and tell you may at least conjecture who it is he is in love withall. The King began then to number over all the Ladies of the Court, one by one, and found not any one of them that he was likely to be in love withall.

He then began to walk not saying one word: soon after I saw some colour come in his face, and presently, me thought, he was much disquieted.

Leontidas, said he, you know more then you will tell me.

Sir, said I, I have said nothing but truth unto your Majesty. For in fine, Philoxypes his ambition is satisfied; he hath no enemies that I know of; and if I be not deceived, the fairest Ladies of the Court have no great power over him.

Ah! Leontidas, said he, you conceal the truth from me; but I know it without your telling. Yes, Leontidas, said he, Philoxypes doth Love, and so love, as doubtlesse he is much afflicted thereat, and which he will withstand and overcome: were not my thought true, he would not make his passion so great a secret. But good Gods, said he, how unfortunat am I? and to what strange extremitie am I reduced; for in fine, Leontidas, said he, confesse the truth, Philoxypes, mauger himself, is become my rival, and his grief for it is the cause of his melanchollie.

Ah! Sir, said I, (not having leasure to think of what I said) I know not the cause of Philoxypes his melancholly; but I very well know he is not in Love with the Princesse Aretephile, and that he too much respects your Majestie to suffer such a thought enter his brest.

Think well Leontidas, said he, on what you say: you assure me you know not the cause of Philoxypes his melancholly, and yet you know he is my rival: once more Leontidas, if you know the businesse, let me know it: or if you know it not; confesse my suspicions are well grounded, and fear not for all this, that I wish any harm to Philoxypes: on the contrary I shall be beholden to him for it.

I was extreemly troubled to hear the King talk thus; for without violating what we hold most sacred, I could not reveal Philoxypes his secret, which he had made me swear above a hundred times not to do.

To consent likewise that the King should suspect him to be his Rival, me thought it was a businesse of too great importance to leave him in that opinion; but the more I perswaded him to the contrary, the more firmly did he believe it. No, said he, I am cause of mine own misfortune, and of Philoxypes his misfortune too: 'tis I who made him visit Aretephille more then any other; 'tis mine own hand that has enthrall'd him, and 'tis I who am the cause of all his sufferings: For, said he, I easily comprehend he seeks out all this solitarinesse only to rid him out of this passion: nay, I have observed that of late he hath been troubled as oft as I have spoken to him to speak to Aretephile, that he hath shun'd such Commissions as much as he could; and I am too much perswaded that he hath argued the businesse stiffly with himself, and I am the only cause of what he suffers.

Good gods, said he, how great is my misfortune? there is not any one man in all my Kingdom, whom I should not hate if he were my Rival, unlesse it be he; and there is not any Lady in the Court, in whose Love he would not have been happy, except Aretephile.

But Sir, said I again, I protest unto you he is not in love with her; and I protest to you, replied he, expressing an extream grief, that Philoxypes is my Rival; for were it not so, he would not conceal his passion from me.

The respect he bears to you, said I, ought to hinder him from so doing, if he were in Love.

Page 171 No, no, replied he, you shall no longer abuse me; and I am equally perswaded of Philoxypes his love, of his innocency, and of my misfortune. For in fine, that the man in the world that I love best, should fall in Love with the onliest Lady that I can Love: and that I should see my self cruelly necessitated, either to forsake Aretephile, or to see Philoxypes die, it is an unsufferable adventure.

Sir, I beseech you, said I, expect till she hath once more seen Philoxypes, and have absolutely commanded him to discover his heart unto her, before you resolve on any thing; and if you please I will bring him hither to morrow morning.

No, no, replied the King, you shall not stir out of the Palace this day; nor shall you see Philoxypes before me. In effect this Prince gave one of his servants charge over me; and commanded me to withdraw into a Chamber, which was appointed for me in the Pallace.

'T would be too difficult a thing to represent unto you my vexation, and the Kings disquiet: since to tell you true, he had as much friendship for Philoxypes, as Love for Aretephile.

Who ever saw, said he, (for he himself told it afterwards) an adventure like to mine? I have a Rival whom I must love in despite of me, and who gives me more occasion to love him, for the affection he bears to my Mistressse, then for all the service he ever did me; and then for all the good offices he hath done me to her, it being certain that I need only look upon him, to see what he suffers in my consideration; and that I need only consider what life he leads, to see how much I am beholden to him. I observe in his eyes a melancholly, which makes me apprehend his death: and I see in all his actions, visible signs of his love to Aretephile, and of his respect to me. What shall I do, said he? shall I seem not to know this passion, and let Philoxypes die? But 'tis no longer time to conceal what I think, since Leontidas knows it. Leontidas who is so much his confident, and shares so deeply in his friendship: shall I also tell Philoxypes that I know his love, and not complain of him? and if I should complain, how weak a succour would this be? I should peradventure hasten his hour of death, by making him despair. But shall I quit Aretephile, and and let my friendship exceed my Love? Philoxypes his passion is unjust; but passions are not voluntary, and he hath done what ever he could, or ought to have done, since not being able to keep from loving; he hath yet kept from making his love known; and hath rather chosen to hazard his life by his respectful silence, then to preserve it by making his passion known, which he knows will displease me.

The King past the night in this manner very unquietly: sometimes he was agitated with anger, and hatred, not knowing whom he hated, or on whom he desired to be revenged: sometimes he did a little blame Philoxypes, for not having at the very first acquainted him with his passion: sometime he betook himself to Aretephiles beauty; but at last he blamed himself.

Then suddenly considering the pittifull condition into which Philoxypes was brought, and what an unhappy life he led, his heart was so touched with compassion, as he did almost love his pretended Rival, better then his Mistressse. He then called to mind, how that all the favours he had received from her, had been husbanded, and obtained by Philoxypes his means. He past the next morning in like perplexity, and strange irresolutions; at last having dined somewhat early, he went well accompanied to lie that night at Claria, not affording me any opportunity to give any notice thereof to Philoxypes; for he into whose custodie I was given, thinking it had been for some businesse of another nature, treated me as a prisoner of the State, and would not give me the least liberty.

The King commanded me to follow him, so as I came with him to Claria, he not halving spoken one word all the way long, but musing still on his adventure: But when we were come thither, Philoxypes's people told the King, that their Master was not at home; and that according to his custom, he was walked out all alone. The King informed himself carefully of one of his servants, who had a long time waited on him, whether he knew not the cause of his Masters melancholly: this servant who loved his Master dearly, that he might make use of the honour the King did him in speaking to him, said;

Sir, I know not what my Master ailes, but this I know, that if your Majestie out of your goodnesse find not some means to cure him of the melanchollie which possesseth him, he will certainly live long; For he eats little, hardly sleeps at all, does nothing but sigh, cannot endure that one should speak to him about businesse, wanders whole dayes in the fields; and I once heard him cry out, when he little thought I did so, Good gods, what would the King say, Page 172 if he saw how great my sadnesse is! and how hardly would he guesse at the cause of my death?

In fine Sir, said this man, with tears almost in his eyes, I know not what to say, but I am very certain your Majestie will lose the faithfulest of all your servants, if you lose the Prince my Master.

Whilst this man spake thus, I was strangely in pain; for I saw all that he said tended to confirm the King in his opinion: I was much the better for beckning unto him, he never looked on me, so intent was he to what he said.

The King on his part sighed, and having left the other, well, Leontidas, you will not have it that Philoxypes is in Love, nor that it is Aretephile whom he loves? Sir, said I, I confesse I am still of that belief, and I would your Majesty could resolve to be so too.

O Unfortunate Philoxypes, cried the King! (not answering me) how sad is this distemper? and how unfortunate am I my self, that I cannot absolutely cure thee of the malady that possesseth thee. I would then have gone to find out Philoxypes, that I might acquaint him with the Kings sense before he saw him, but the King would not suffer me: but making the way be shewn unto him, which Philoxypes most usually went, we went directly towards the head of Claria.

Philoxypes was this mean while gone to Cleanthes his house, where the face of affairs was a little altered; for Policrite knowing that her condition was not what she believed it to be, Philoxypes his desert had made a further advancement in her heart then formerly: neither could she so well hide her affection, but that Cleanthes and Megisto were much to their grief aware thereof.

Yet was Philoxypes never awit the more happy: for Policrite having tane a Fancy to make trial of his affection by an appearing indifferency, did very carefully conceal from him, the affection she had for him.

And in truth that very day that the King came to Claria, where we mist of Philoxypes, she had caused as much trouble in him, as admiration. For being gone to her, and having found her at the root of a tree, where she was designing out a corner of the Countrey which pleased her, he began to entertain her with his passion, and to tell her how it grew still more violent upon her.

Sir, said she, if I may be permitted to do so, I should tell you, That if you desire to win my good esteem, you should do better to tell me, that your passion grows every day more moderate: for to tell you the truth, I do somewhat apprehend these extravagant passions which I have heard spoken of, and which they say, does disorder reason, makes men lose the respect they owe to vertue, though it inhabit in a Cottage, and which occasion a hundred strange things, the very hearing whereof causeth horror; Therefore, Sir, if you would oblige me, you will satisfie your self with telling me, you have affection enough for me, to wish if it were possible that Fortune had been more propitious to me, that I had been born of a higher condition then I am, or at least this not being so, I might rest content with my own condition, without envying others.

To love you with indifferency, said Philoxypes, (who acquainted me afterwards with this their conversation) your beauty should be indifferent, your vertue and discretion should be so also: in fine that inexpressible Charm, which I find in every of your words, looks, and actions, ought not to enchant me as it doth: But divine Policrite, apprehend nothing from the violence of my passion; for the stronger it is, the fuller of respect shall I be, and the more obedient to your will.

Sir, said she, if what you say be true, speak no more thereof I beseech you; for not comprehending that I may lawfully give you any part of my affection, me thinks I ought intreat you to entertain me no longer with yours.

But Divine Policrite, said he, for whom do you reserve that glorious affection, which you cruelly affirm I shall never enjoy?

At these words she blusht, and modestly bowing down her eyes, I reserve it said she, for our woods, fields, rocks, and fountains, whereof Sir, said she, smiling, I think you will not be jealous.

I shall not be jealous of them said he, but I shall envy them, and I shall not easily endure that you should love things to my prejudice, which cannot love you again. But cruel maid, will you say nothing to me of more obliging? and forgoing the Court as I do for love of you, and renouncing what ever is in the world, except it be Policrite; is it possible you should not deal with me a little lesse severely? I do not desire you to love me, say only that Page 173 you are not sorry that I love you; and add if you please, that if I be not beloved, tis because you neither do nor will love any thing.

For what's to come, said Policrite, tis a thing to which I ought not to answer with such assurance; and as you knew not the day before I had the honour to be known unto you, that you should so oft forgo your Pallaces to come to this Cottage wherein I live: how do I know whether the resolution which I now take of suffering no affection to enter my heart, will still continue? No, Sir, we must not trust so absolutly in our selves; nor can I answer otherwise then for my present opinions.

Shew me then, replied he, what they really are; to the end I may know what to do.

Sir, said Policrite, having much esteem, and much of respect for you, I must confess I should be sorry that you should love one long, whose condition were not answerable to yours, and that I could not receive a much greater displeasure.

Philoxypes, who knew not the hidden sense of these words, answered, That supream beauty had in it, somewhat of Coelestiall, which did ennoble all those that were there|withall indued.

In my opinion said she, a certain proportion is requisite in all things to occasion love, therefore do not deceive your self; and if I were at any time to love any body, it should certainly be one of my own condition: nor should I ever resolve to marrie any one that were not so.

What Policrite! said Philoxypes, much afflicted, do you speak the truth?

Yes, Sir, said she, and time will make you finde it so.

But Policrite, replied he, you remember not that you are a miracle, and that there are no men of your condition amid'st these Rocks, who deserve so much as to look upon you.

I will then love nothing, Sir, said she, and so she rose up, for she saw Cleanthes and Megisto coming, who much troubled at this Prince his so frequent visits, especially, halving observed what they thought they had done in Policrites behaviour, desired him not to give himself the trouble to come so often thither.

Philoxypes, who was somewhat moved at those cruel words (as he understood them) which Policrite had uttered which made notwithstanding so much for him, could not with his accustomed moderation receive the discourse of Cleanthes and Megisto, but an|ger might easily be seen in his face, and grief in his eyes.

Cleanthes, said he, since I come not hitner to rob you of the treasure which the Gods have given you, withstand not the satisfaction which I finde in admiring that virtue in Policrite which you have infused into her.

Sir, said Cleanthes, though I very well know your worth, I cannot but fear lest Poli|crite, who hath not yet lived long enough to know precisely what bounds to put to the re|spects she owes you, may be failing in something either to you, or to her self.

No, no, said Philoxypes, somewhat roundly, you need not fear what you say, you may rather fear lest her severity and yours make me lose my reason. In fine, this conversati|on, though full of respect to Policrite, was so passionate, as Cleanthes and Megisto were much troubled at it, and Policrites self was sufficiently disquieted thereat, and was sorry that she had spoken so despitely to Philoxypes. But at last this Prince departed much dis|contented, and much in love: and as he returned back with intention to get on horse back where he had wont to leave his followers, he met the King who was lighted on foot, and on whom I had the honour to wait.

You may imagine how much he was surprised at this sight. As soon as he saw the King, striving as much as he could to hide his Melancholy, he mended his pace. And having done his obeysance, Sir said he, your Majesty quits Paphos in a season wherein you are not much accustomed to seek out solitary walks.

You have a reason for what you say, said the King, but it seems less strange to me that I should come to seek for Philoxypes at Claria, then that I should finde him amongst the Rocks. The day being fair enough, though in Winter, the King who could no longer stay from acquainting Philoxypes with what he had in his heart, made a signe to the few that waited not on him to stand off, and commanded me to stay.

There remained none then with him but Philoxypes and my self; we all stood silent for a good while, and certainly had all of us much differing thoughts. The King seeing Phil|oxypes so altered, so melancholy, and so perplext, endeavoured to make his friendship Page 174 out-go his Love: Philoxypes would have found by the King's eyes and mind, what the King had to say to him, and why he had taken this journey, fearing by the signes which I made, lest he had discovered his passion.

For my particular, I was ready to go wilde, to think I could not advertise Philoxypes, nor durst not tell the King what I knew of his love, whom he took to be his Rivall; but at last this long silence wherein every one of us said several things unto our selves, was first broke by the King, who looking in much obliging manner upon this Prince, im|braced him, and said, be not offended that I know the secret of your soul, and that I am not ignorant of the passion which torments you.

Philoxypes surprised to hear the King speak thus, looked with a blush upon me; & the King imagining (as it was true) that he thought I had betrayed him, looked upon me too: & to punish me (as he told me afterwards) for not having told him the truth, not giving me leave to speak, & not disabusing Philoxypes, In what he had conceived of me: once more said he, my dear Philoxypes, be not afflicted that I have discovered your love, and believe I esteem you never a whit the less.

Sir, replied Philoxypes, me thinks if your Majestie did know the true cause of my afflict|ion, you should be so good as to bewaile me, and not to speak of it.

No, Philoxypes, replied the King, my goodness shall extend it self much further then so, for you: I am come hither expresly to accompany you in your solitariness: for since I cannot make you happy, I must at least make my self unhappy with you.

Sir, said Philoxypes, you altogether confound me; take no such resolution I beseech you, leave me to bear the punishment of my weakness alone, believe me I shall infinitely praise your goodness, if you will suffer me to die in peace a midst these woods and Rocks.

The King touched with extream compassion, once more straightly imbraced Philoxypes, and looking upon him with a very sad look, I crave your pardon said he Philoxypes, if I cannot as yet absolutely yield Aretephile to you: but I am come hither to endeavour to gainsay for your sake the passion I have for her, as you have stroven a long time for my sake to suppress the passion which she hath occasioned in you.

Philoxypes surprised at the Kings discourse, felt two contrary agitations at the same time: he was grieved to finde his odd opinion, and joyed that he knew not the true cause of his love, as he thought he had done. And believing that he might easily disabuse him in a thing so false as the former was, he resolved to continue the concealment of his true passion.

The King then had no sooner said what I have told you, but Philoxypes stepping back a little, said, what Sir <◇> does your Majesty suspect me of so much boldness as to be your Rivall? Confess, said the King, for I know your misfortune hath been such, as not to be able to resist Aretephiles charms. But Philoxypes, I blame you not for it; twas I that first made tryall thereof; I know how inevitable they are; you have done more then I my self should have done: it may be had I your Part to play, I should have betrayed my master, instead of resolving to die of grief and sorrow, as you have done for my sake. Thus Philoxypes, I am not displeased with you for loving Aretephile.

Sir, said Philoxypes, to witness unto you that I am not in love with her, I promise you never to see her more, nor yet ever to come within Paphos, or at least never to speak to that Princess.

I very well know said the King, your Generosity rather leads you to resolve on death, rather then to be failing in your duty. But Philoxypes, to the end you may not object unto me, That I have done nothing to vanquish my self, I am come to stay at Claria, as well as you, that I may endeavour to cure my self of this passion, and to yeild up Arete|phile to you. You on your side shall do the like, and he that is first cured, shall surrender his part in her to the other.

But my dear Philoxypes, said he, you are yet more unhappy then you think for, for when I should cease to love Aretephile, you would not have won her heart: you know how ambitions she is, that her soul is only sensible of greatness: and when I should have yielded up my mistress to you, unless I should also yield my Crown unto you, you would not winne much upon her inclination.

But in fine said he (not affording Philoxypes leasure to answer him) if I yield up Arete|phile, to you, it will not be hard for me to yield you up my Crown. And in a word, I will not be upbraided with your death.

I will do what I can to cure my self, to the end that you may cure your self; and if we Page 175 can neither of us cure our selves, we will at least die together.

Sir, said Philoxypes, I vow by whatsoever I hold most sacred, and most holy, that I have not the least pretence to the Princess Aretephile.

What then said the King, who did not believe him, is the cause of your retreat and Melancholly? I confess Sir, I was a hundred, and a hundred times ready to break my word which I had past to Philoxypes; but seeing the trouble he was in, and that in fine he could not resolve to tell the King the truth, I withheld whilst Philoxypes answered, That what his Majesty did command, did not deserve his curiosity, and that he could not tell it him.

Being by this time late, we returned to Claria, where the King spoke still after the same manner to Philoxypes, as Philoxypes did also to him. Having found a moment of time to entertaine Philoxypes alone, I would have perswaded him to have acquainted the King with the truth; but he could never resolve to do so, saying it would be sufficient to let him see he was not in love with Aretephile, if he should never see her more.

This mean while, the more obstinacie and grief the King found in Philoxypes, the more did he compassionate him, and the more he laboured to overcome his own passion.

And to this purpose he stayed eight daies at Claria, all which time Philoxypes was ready to go mad, as well in consideration of the Kings opinion, and more for that he could not get to see Policrite. I do not think the King would so soon have left this retiredness, had he not been advertised that an Ambassador from Amasis King of Egypt, was come to Paphos, which forct him to return.

But Philoxypes, do he what he could, must needs go along with him: Not said the King, I will not see Aretephile, without seeing you at the same time. The Me|lancholy which I shall see in your eyes, must be to me an Antidote against the Charmes which I shall see in hers.

We went then to Paphos, but good gods how little delightfull was the Court then, and how much troubled did the Ambassador finde the King, who was three daies without seeing Aretephile, and Philoxypes being in unimaginable paine for the above said reasons, seemed to grow still more Melancholy, whereat the King was still more and more afflicted.

Ambitious Aretephile was this mean while not without her perplexity, as well by reason of the Kings journey to Claria, as that he came not to visit her; and for that she heard he was returned wonderfully sad.

But at last the King desirous still to confirm himself in his belief, brought Philoxypes with him to Princess Aretephile, hoping to discover his passion better there, then in any other place.

Philoxypes, who thought there was no better means to undeceive the King, then in letting him see that he took no pleasure in looking upon this princess, was stil carefull to look another way; but that which he did to dis-deceive the King, did the more deceive him: for said he to himself, unfortunate Philoxypes cannot indure the sight of her whom he loves, and whom he will not love.

He accused himself then of too much inhumanity, in exposing him to so great a punishment, and seeing how strangely perplext he was, his visit was not long.

This mean while, he having during this visit eyed his pretended Rivall, as much as his mistress, and having been much disquiet, the Princess was not much satisfied with his conversation, and knew not whereunto to attribute the cause of the change which she saw in him.

At his coming forth he said a thousand obliging things to Philoxypes, and Philoxypes made as many protestations to him of his being unconcerned in Aretephile. But at last, that I may shorten my discourse as much as I may; Philoxypes being persecuted by the Kings conceit, anger'd at Cleanthes discourse, much afflicted at what Policrite had said, and much more that he could see her no more, and that he durst not return to Claria, fell dangerously sick, all the Physicians gave up their opinions, that unless some cure were found for his Melancholy, he would infallibly die. The fever continued seven daies upon him very violently, during which time the King was greatly disconsolate; and during which time I had tane a little journey to Amathuse, about some business that I had there, for I think if I had been at Paphos, I should have had much adoe to have kept Philoxypes his secret from the King.

Page 176 As oft as the King came into his chamber, and saw him in that pitifull condition, he resolved to think no longer on Aretephile, but as soon as he came from him, or that Philoxypes grew any thing better, this resolution slackned a little.

Nor was he yet resolved what to do, but the fever having at last left Philoxypes, and the Physicians continuing still to affirm that he would infallibly die, if the cause of his Melancholy whence his malady proceeded, were not taken away: The King seemed to have put on a very strong resolution to pluck from out his soul the passion which possesst him.

He then resolved to visite Aretephile no more, who not knowing what to think of this change in the King, thought it might be he was offended that she had not all this while been to see Philoxypes, whom he so dearly loved, especially since almost all the Ladies of the Court had been to visite him. For during his sickness, the Princesse of Salamis, and Princesse Agharista had never left him, so as the Ladies might with decency enough go thither.

Yet so it happened, that the day that Aretephile came thither, Philoxypes being much better then he was, they were gone forth, so as Aretephile going accompanied with four or five of her women, found him all alone. 'Tis true, she was not there long without company, for the King came thither presently after. Philoxypes blusht when he saw him come in, and seemed so amazed at this encounter, as if he had been really in love with Aretephile; the King who observed this his change of countenance, being much concerned to see that he should be the cause of Philoxypes danger: after a great strife within himself; drew near to Princesse Aretephile, who out of her respect would have given him her place, which he would not accept of: and after having looked upon her a while without speaking, he sighed, and said, Madam, will you not cure Philoxypes?

Sir, said she, if his health depend on me, your Majesty should soon be eased of the grief his sickness causeth in you.

Philoxypes, who found a great alteration in the Kings countenance, was afraid lest he might say somewhat which might have made Aretephile know his opinion of him; wherefore not affording the King leisure to reply;

Sir, said he, though I believe Princesse Aretephile be able to do great things, and to charm great pains, yet I think I may say without offending her, that those evils which I lie under, depend not on her will; and that none but the gods themselves can withdraw me from the grave. Philoxypes pronounced these words in so sad a manner, as endeavouring to overcome whatsoever opposed his designe of saving Philoxypes: drawing yet a little nearer to the Princesse Aretephile, for fear lest they that were in the chamber might over hear him.

Madam, said he, (making a signe to Philoxypes, that he would not be interrupted) I shall tell you a thing which will much surprize you. I conjure you notwithstanding to give it a favourable interpretation; and to oblige me so far as to believe that upon better termes then the saying of Philoxypes life, I would not tell it you, no not though mine own life were concerned therein.

Oh, Sir, cried out this sick Prince, if your Majesty end what you have begun to say, you will hasten my death instead of retarding it.

Princesse Aretephile, amazed to hear what she heard, and not able to guesse what the matter should be, looked sometimes upon the King, sometimes upon Philoxypes; but at last the King completing his determination, 'tis you, Madam, said he to the Princesse Aretephile, who send Philoxypes to his grave; your charms have been more powerfull then his reason, though his noblesse hath been yet greater then his love. He loves you divine Aretephile, not daring to tell you so; he will not so much as acknowledge it, yet I know for certain, that unlesse you take compassion on him, he will infallibly die.

I therefore speak no more to you in my own behalf, said; he, in a strange melancholy manner, but deal lesse rigorously with him, then you have done with me, since he deserves it better: and if your Ambition be not to be satisfied without a Sovereign power, I promise you divine Princesse, that if I cannot place Philoxypes upon the Throne, he shall allwayes be so neer, as his place shall hardly be discernable from mine.

In fine, said he, if Philoxypes die, I shall die, and so I shall for ever lose you: but if you save Philoxypes, I may at least hope to languish on a while; and to share part of your esteem, not being able to pretend any longer to any part of your affection. Nor think not said he, that this which I do, is any mark of weaknesse in my affection, since on the contrary it denotes the violence thereof.

Page 177 For in fine, if I could resolve to abandon you, and to follow Philoxypes to the grave, I would not yeeld up to him the part I pretend to have in your affection, though he be more worthy thereof then I; but not being able to see him die for my sake, without expiring with grief; I must live, that he may live, and consequently must endeavour for a while to prolong the satisfaction I take in seeing you.

Aretephile was so astonisht to hear the King speak after this manner, and Philoxypes so afflicted, as astonishment and sorrow producing the same effect in these two personages, they stayed a good while without speaking.

Aretephile had opinion good enough of her beauty, to suffer her self easily to be perswaded that Philoxypes was in love with her, and she had likewise opinion good enough of his Generosity, to believe he durst not discover his passion.

But as nothing that was not King could touch her heart, she was strangely perplexed to hear what she heard, and sometimes she thought 'twas peradventure but a pretext sought by the King to break with her.

Philoxypes on his side thinking that at the last he must be fain to tell the King the truth, that he might disabuse him, was so strangely confused, as he could not open his mouth: so as the King seeing them both so surprized, and finding that peradventure his love might quickly make him unsay all that his friendship had made him affirm, rose up, and without expecting what Aretephile would answer; Madam, said he, the pitifull condition which you see Philoxypes is in, perswades you better then I can do, and he doubtlesly will pardon me, if I speak not so long to you for him as I have formerly done to you for my self: which said, he went his way, though Philoxypes desired him to tarry; assuring him that he would wholly disabuse him.

This mean while, though Aretephile had a great minde to be gone too, yet being imbitter'd in minde, and desirous to know a little more precisely, what the businesse of this so strange adventure would prove, she staid a little after the King, and looking upon Philoxypes, who appeared to her to be so struck mute, as if he had been in love with her: Is it you Philoxypes, said she, that have lost your reason, or is it the king? for I confesse unto you, I know not whether of the two it is, and that I cannot comprehend either of you.

I confesse Madam, said Philoxypes, that I am not master of my reason; but Madam 'tis a malady which you are no wayes cause of, and whereof I accuse you not: had you any designe then said she, to make me lose the Kings good opinion? or is it that the King seeks some bad pretext to bereave me of it? But if it be so Philoxypes, there needs not so far a fetch about the bush. You need but give me reason of the least suspition, and I assure you I shall not long lament the losse of so divided a heart as his is. For till now, the King did alwayes love his Crown better then Princesse Aretephile, and by his this dayes discourse, he will make me believe that he loves you better then me.

Madam, said Philoxypes, I beg it as a favour from you, not to blame the King upon so small reason; and not to blame in him the compassion he is pleased to have of an evil, which he believes you to be the cause of.

I engage my self Madam, to free him from the error of his opinion; for though your charms be without compare, the respect which I have alwayes born to you, and that which I shall alwayes bear to the King, have assuredly warranted me from almost an inevitable danger, for those who have not had so powerfull reasons to withstand your beauty; therefore Madam, do not disquiet your self, and do me the honour as to promise me to pardon the Kings injustice, in desiring that I should share with you in a heart where you ought <...> ly to reigne.

But Madam, the King had given me the place which I now enjoy, before he loved you; you ought not therefore be troubled thereat.

No, no, replied ambitious Aretephile, you will not easily be able to justifie the King: he is Generous, I confesse, but he is but a bad lover, and whosoever can yeeld up his interest in the party beloved, his love is certainly very indifferent.

This being said, she bid him farewell, and left Philoxypes so much grieved, as his malady encreased. Fearing then lest he might die, and leave the king in the opinion he was in, he sent to desire him that he might speak with him; and this was just as I returned from Amethusa. I happened to be by the King when he received this message, who instantly went to Philoxypes, but with so much discontent, as I pitied him: he had repented himself more then once of what he had said to Aretephile, and not knowing whether she might not have said some what obliging to Philoxypes after he had left them together, he returned unto him much disquieted.

Page 178 When we came thither, he enquired whether the Princesse Aretephile had tarried there long after him or not, and being told not, he entered into Philoxypes chamber, who was glad to see me with the King.

Sir, said he, I see it is time that I confesse my weaknesse to you, and that I disabuse you.

The King, who could not reconcile these two things, answered him only with a sigh, and being set down by his bed side, Philoxypes ask'd him pardon for the trouble he had put his Majesty to, and desired me to acquaint the King with what I knew of his adventure; desiring him not to be offended that I had not told his Majesty the truth, since unlesse I should have drawn down the anger of Heaven upon me for perjury, I could not have revealed his secret, after the Oaths that he had made me to take to the contrary. I then began to acquaint the King with all that I knew touching Philoxypes love: but all I could say to him, appear'd to be so incredible, as it was a long time before he could believe it. At last he told Philoxypes, that unlesse he should let him see Policrite, he would not believe what he had heard.

Philoxypes perceiving the Kings obstinacy, told him, that though he was very ill, he would be carried to Claria, in case he were any thing better the next morning, imagining he should sooner recover his health being near Policrite, then if he should stay at Paphos.

All this while the King did not believe what I had told him; sometime a man might see some sign of rejoycing in him: Ha! my dear Philoxypes, would he say, is it possible that you were not my Rival, and that I was deceived: if it be so, I think I shall adore that Policrite you speak of, instead of blaming the love you bear her; since thereby I shall not be inforced to yield up what I hold dearer then my life, and that my confident will not prove my Rival.

But observe Sir, the extraordinary effects of love. Philoxypes was very sick when he sent to desire the King to come unto him: but when once he had any thought of returning to Claria, he grew better: he slept all the next night quietly enough, and the next day was carried in a Litter to Claria, whither the King went to lie that night.

The next day Philoxypes left his bed, and the following day, notwithstanding all his weaknesse, he got on horseback together with the King, waited on but by very few: and came to the foot of the mountains where they were to light. Being there, the King followed by none but Philoxypes and my self, went towards Cleanthes's Cottage, which as soon as we discovered, Philoxypes, who had need enough howsoever to rest, staid a while, and shewing it to the King, Sir, said he, strangely confused, see the place which made me forgo Paphos: see the inch of all the earth, that likes me best, and where you go to see one, who peradventure will rather make you Philoxypes his Rival, then Philoxypes shall prove yours.

He spoke this with a smile, by which it visibly appear'd, that the hope of reseeing Policrite had brought joy into his heart: yet did he fear displeasing her, and to anger Cleanthes, by bringing the King thither: but there being no remedy, he resolved to do it, neither did this fear justle out his joy.

When the King had sufficiently considered the greatness of Philoxypes his affection, in respect of the meanness of Policrites Cottage; and that he had notwithstanding acknowledged that there was somewhat of wilde in that desert, which was not displeasing: we went on, and came at last to that little Palisadoe of Lawrels, wherewith Cleanthes his Court was inclosed. We entred thereinto, and Philoxypes stepping before the King, went to the house, where he found the dore shut: he knock'd, but no body answered, which made him at first believe, that Cleanthes his whole family was gone to the Temple, where he once saw Policrite.

Yet since there might be some body there who might not hear, he knock'd again, and knock'd so hard, that a young slave who served Cleanthes, came and opened the door, who very well knowing Philoxypes, told him, after that Philoxypes had ask'd him where his Master was, that he could not tell him what he desired to know; and that all that he knew was, that Cleanthes, Megisto, Policrite, and Dorida, were gone from thence, and were not to return thither any more: that they had carried along with them the women, which they had brought from their own Country; and that his Master had commanded him to wait his further directions there, not knowing wherefore he was gone, nor why he left him there.

Page 179Philoxypes, surpriz'd and afflicted at this Discourse, was a good while without speaking; The King thought at first that there was some trick in it, and that Philoxypes had made me say what I had said, only to abuse him; but at last this young Slave being stept into the House, and returning presently; Sir, said he to Philoxypes, when Policrite was ready to depart from hence, she drew me aside, unseen by any one, and gave me this which I give to you, ordaining me so to do if you should come hither. Philoxypes taking immediately what the Slave presented him with, opened the Letter, whilst the King did me the honour to speak with me, and read these ensuing words.

POLICRITE TO PHILOXYPES.

I Know not Sir, whither it is that Policrite is convey'd, but I very well know that Philoxypes is the cause of her exile: not being per|adventure, likely ever to have the Honour to see him. I thought I might without blame, let him know my minde by this Letter, which I refused to acquaint him withall, the last time which I spoke with him. He may then be pleased to know, that at first not esteeming my self wor|thy of his affection, by reason of my birth, I with-held mine from him as much as I was able; but that having learnt since, that I am not of the condition I appeared to be, and that there have been Kings of my Race: I confess I was gladd that I could not reproach Philoxypes for having an inclination too disproportionable for his degree: and that I thought it became me to let him know what I am, to the end he may not think he doth any thing unworthy of himself, if he sometimes think upon Policrite, who will alwayes with much contentment think upon his worth, whether his fortune be to lead his life in a Cottage or in a Palace.

POLICRITE.

PHILOXYPES, as soon as he had read this Letter, came to the King, and pre|sented it unto him; Sir, said he, your Majesty may read in this Letter my innocency, and my misfortune. The King began then to read aloud what Policrite had written; but good God in what pain was the unfortunate Philoxypes that he could not interrupt him; but as soon as he had read it out, looking upon him with a fixt and grieved eye; how say you now? Sir, said he, am I yet in love with Princesse Aretephile, or am I not the most unfor|tunate man in the world? the King, imbracing him, a|ked him pardon for his suspitions, and of the trouble he had given him; but my dear Philoxypes, said he, I shall be sufficiently punished for it, as well in respect of your sorrow, which shall alwayes be raine; as for Aretephile, who will not easily forgive me, yet said he, you have wherein to rejoyce, since you learn two things at once of great importance, and of great consolation. For now you know that Policrite loves you, and that she is of Princely descent: Could you have asked more of the gods, if you had been to have had your wishes granted you?

Page 180 Ah! Sir, said Philoxypes, that which you alledge to comfort me, is the greatest part of my misfortune: For 'tis true, I find that Policrite does not hate me, and that she is of birth equal with my self, but at the same time this lovely and cruel personage tels me, she shall never see me more, and that she knows not whither she is carried.

Oh! Sir, I should be more to blame were I in love with Princesse Aretephile, but I should be lesse miserable: I should have reasons to gainsay my passion; but here I see nothing which doth not fortifie and augment it.

In fine, after Philoxypes had sufficiently bemoaned himself, he left the King, and went to ask a hundred things of the young slave, without being able to learn any thing, either of Policrites birth, nor whither Cleanthes and Megisto were gone; all he could learn was only that 'twas above a fortnight since they were gone: nothing else could be gotten out of this young Slave, neither by prayers, promises, nor threats, whose fidelity Philoxylpes, for all his rage, could not chuse but approve of: but not being able to learn any more, he waited back upon the King to Claria.

For my part I was never more at my wits end; for the King was so sad, as well for his own occasion, as for those of Philoxypes, as he could not resolve to say any thing, neither by way of bemoaning himself, nor yet of comforting Philoxypes, whom he so dearly loved.

Philoxypes on his part was more perplex'd: he was sorry to forgo that Cottage though his beloved was no longer there; he sometimes looked back upon it, sometimes he looked upon Policrites Letter, which the King had given him back.

He would sometimes lift up his eyes to heaven, then again fix them on the earth, and walking sometimes without speaking, sometimes fetching deep sighs, he seemed not to know whether the King were there or no, or whether he were alone, so deep was his me|lancholly. At last we came to Claria, but good gods, how sad was the conversation the rest of that day!

At last said the King to Philoxypes, you have this advantage, to know that Policrite is much obliged to you, that she hath nothing to reproach you withal, that you have not offended her, and that wheresoever she is, if she think of you, 'tis only to bewail your absence: where on the contrary, I have incensed Aretephile, whose aspiring soul does doubtlesly accuse me of want of affection, and who will take it very ill, that I prefer'd your life before my love to her.

But Sir, said the afflicted Philoxypes, you know where the Princesse Aretephile is, you may make your reasons known to her, you may ask her pardon for that fault, which an ex|cesse of Generosity made you commit: you may sit and sigh by her, and may appease her anger. But for my part Sir, should I complain, should I sigh, should I pour forth tor|rents of tears amidst these Rocks, would all this restore to me my Policrite? should I there|by learn where she lives? It may be Cleanthes is put to Sea, and it may be I shall never know, neither who Policrite is, nor where she is.

Ah! Sir, said this disconsolate Prince, if you knew the cruelty of my adventure, you would easily know that I am the most unfortunate man in the world: for if I loved one that did hate me, despight might cure me: if I loved one that were inconstant, the scorn I should have of her weaknesse, might console me: if I were jealous, a part of my me|lancholy would passe away in seeking how I might prejudice my Rivals: were Policrites absence bounded, the hope of her return, how long so e're it were, would allay my discon|tents. Nay, were any person whom I should love, dead, I think my sufferings would not be so great as they are. For in fine, my malady is such, as doth stupifie reason, and makes the soul almost insensible.

In this manner did the King and Philoxypes entertain themselves. I endeavoured to comfort them both, but to tell you truth, my reasons were not listned unto; as for Philoxypes, he knew not what remedie to seek for; for having learned by the Slave who gave him Policrite's Letter, that 'twas a good while since she went away, he could not dream of following her, nor knew he where to seek after her.

All he could do, was to give order to his people to watch night and day about the Cot|tage, with directions to slay any who should come thither, that they might learn by them what this too faithful Slave would not discover; and to follow him wheresoever he should go, believing probably that Cleanthes had not left him alone in that house, without some secret reason, and without having a design to return; or at least to send some body thither on his behalf, or that the Slave himself should return to him.

Page 181 As for the King it fared not thus with him: he knew that it was at Aretephiles feet that he was to seek for pardon: he would not, notwithstanding make his dear Philoxypes returne so soon to Paphos, but staid the next day at Claria.

But though there was no hope of finding Policrite, Philoxypes desired the King that he would be pleased to send to all the ports of the Island, to know whether Cleanthes had tane shipping in any of them or no, it being easie to be known, by reason of the many women that were in his company, which would make him remarkable. The King pro|mised him to do what he desired, but conjured him also not to refuse to go with him to Paphos, to assist him in getting Aretephiles pardon. Philoxypes appeared visibly displeased to be forced to returne to the Court, but being so much obliged to the King, and the King being upon ill tearms with his Mistress, onely out of his Love to him, he thought it be|came him to go, as he did. When we were come to Paphos, the King went that very night to Princesse Aretephiles lodgings, and found her onely accompanied with her wo|men. She received him with all the civility that was due to his condition, but also with as much coolness as could be expected from an incensed party.

Seeing Philoxypes with the King, Sir, said she, with a malicious smile, did not I tell you Philoxypes would recover without my meddling with him. Madam, said he, Philoxylpes is much worse then I believed him to be; but thanks to Heaven, I will not lay his death to your charge, since you are not the cause of his disquiet. May it please the Gods that you put not Philoxypes in a condition of reproaching you with my death!

No, no, Sir, said she, your life is in no danger, as long as Philoxypes lives, your Ma|jesty needs fear nothing. Alas Madam, cry'd the King, deal not so hardly with me! Alas, Sir, said she, go not about I beseech you to perswade me to things so directly oppo|site one to another, in so short a time; it is not above four or five days since you did me the honour to tell me at Philoxypes his lodging, that you would no more sue to me for your self, that my affection was a thing wherein you did no longer desire a part; and if I re|member well, you did also intreat me not to deal so rigorously with Philoxypes, as I had done with you. And it may be, said she, (expressing an extremity of Malice) that yeel|ding much to your intreaties upon that occasion, I should have granted what you have demanded for Philoxypes, had my friendship been necessary to save his life; but since God be thanked, he needs it not, he may be pleased to content himself with my esteem; and your Majesty may likewise be satisfied with my respect, which is all I can or ought to give you. For in fine to make me believe that you love me, after being able to permit that another should love me, and you your self wish me to love him, is a thing not easie to be understood, nor yet easily digested: believe me, Sir, said she, to love ones Rivall, better then ones Mistresse, is a thing whereof there are not many examples, and which may allow me to let those know, who shall be acquainted with the business, that tis an excellent way to make a faithful servant, and a very bad invention to make a Princess love him, who treats her after that manner. Shall the compassion I had of Philoxypes, Madam, replied the King, destroy me for ever in your good opinion? me, I say, who underwent an unexpressible torment, before I could resolve to pity him? me, who did not yield you up, save onely because I could not abandon you, and who found that Philoxype's death did hasten mine? If you could have loved Aretephile, answered the Princesse, more then Philoxypes, you would have lamented his misfortune and yours; you would have endeavoured to have cured him by absence, or by a thousand other waies; you would have bewailed his death when it should have happened, and would yet have been comforted, by the sole sight of Aretephile: but because you love Philoxypes better then you love Aretephile, you resolve without much difficulty to lose her. Yet Sir, you could yield up to Philoxypes no more then that part which you held in her, which was not per|adventure so great as you believe.

Ah! inhumane Princesse said the King, make me not despair, and know that when I made a surrender of you to Philoxypes, I was resolved to die. It may be Sir, said she, if I had so much weakness as to lend a favourable ear to what you now say, that upon the first occasion that should present it self; and upon the first suspicion you should have that any one should bear me never so little good will, you would again conjure me to be his cure. No, no, Sir, said she, with a yet more serious face, you never loved me, nor do you know what it is to love: Love is somewhat above reason, or generosity, which hath reasons of its own: a man may give his own life for his friend, but as for the Mistress whom he loveth, it would be more just, and more usual, to quit all his friends for her Page 182 interest, then to yield her up to any one friend. In fine said she, you may perchance have thought you could have lived without me; for had you dream't you must have dyed, me thinks you might as well have dyed without yielding up Aretephile to Philoxypes, as after having surrendered her to him. But Sir, since you have rather chosen to specify an extraordinary mark of Generosity, then to give the commonest proof of love, I have no more to say; neither have I more to do, but to preserve my heart as free as it hath allwaies been. The King seeing he could not appease this haughty spirit, call'd Philoxypes in into his aid; come, said he, come make amends for the fault which you have innocently committed; and if you will preserve my life, as I would have done yours, be a mean of replacing me in the condition wherein I was before I had compassion of you. Madam, said Philoxypes, addressing his speech to the Princesse, if you judge of the Kings love to you, by his Friendship to me, what may you not expect from thence; since to save my life, he could for some few moments onely renounce the possession of so inestimable a jewel. And will you not then believe, That upon the least occasion which should present itself, he would for your service sacrifice, not onely Philoxypes, but even all his subjects, nay, even his own life? No Sir, said she, you are not so much bound to the King, as you imagine, and instead of your desiring me to judg of his love to me, by the friendship he beares to you, I shall advise you to judge of his friendship to you, onely by his love to me; and to believe, that since he was able to yield me up, he never had so resolute a passion for Aretephile, as to deserve that Philoxypes should be much beholden to him, for what he hath done for him, since he would have done the like for any other. But cruell princesse, said the King, what will you have me to do? me thinks said she, I should demand no unjust thing of you, if I should humbly intreat you to think no longer on Aretephile, and quietly to enjoy the life of Philoxypes, which hath cost you so little.

Ah, said he, if I should have purchased the life of Philoxypes, at the losse of your affection, I should have bought it more deare, then if I should have given my Crown for it. Confess the truth, said this malicious Princesse, if Philoxypes had been as sick of Ambition, as you did think him love sick, he would not for certain be yet cured, and you would not so soon have forgon your Scepter, as you did Aretephile. Philoxypes, who easily conceived the hidden sense of these words, whereunto the King replied not, so was he overborn with grief, said, Madam, if the King shall confess unto you that he hath done amiss, and shall ask your pardon for it, will you be more inexorable, then are the gods, and will you shew no mercy? when the King, said she, shall have done to cure me of any malady of minde, if any such shall befall me, so extraordinary a thing, as that which he hath done for you, I shall then see of what minde I shall be. In fine, Sir, All that the King and Philoxypes could do or say, did no waies avail with this imperious Princesse.

When they were come from her, and were returned to the Palace; Philoxypes who was well acquainted with Aretaiphiles humour, told the King, he knew a way how to work his reconciliation with her: Alas, said the King, there are few things I would not do to purchase that content: speak therefore, my dear Philoxypes: must I be long in paine? must I sigh abundantly, and pour forth abundance of tears? and must I be everlastingly prostrate at her feet? No Sir, said he, you shall onely put the Crown upon her head. but replied the King, I would gladly not have owned Aretephiles love to her Ambition; on the contrary, I would have had the Crown of Cyprus to have been a reward of her affection to me.

Five or six daies being thus past over, and Philoxypes, not being able to tarry any longer at the Court, he desired leave of the King to return to Claria. Those who the King had sent to the Port towns which were nearest to Paphos, returned at the same time, but brought no news of Policrite; so as the unfortunate Philoxypes returned to his solitariness in great despair.

He had yet engaged the King not to discover the cause of his melancholy; nor were there any that knew it, but he, the Princesse Aretephile, and my self; nor did the Princesse know any more, then that Philoxypes was fain in love with one that he knew not.

It would be very hard to relate unto you what life he led; when it was fair weather, he went to visit Policrite's Cottage, and all the places where he had seen her, or spoken with her; he went to ask more questions of the slave who was there, and whom they had ever had an eye unto, not finding any one that spoke with him, nor that he spoke Page 183 with any one. But all the addresses this Prince could make, could not prevail against the fidelity of this slave, who deserved a better condition.

When Philoxypes could not walk abroad, he walked in his Gallery, gazing on the picture of his dear Policrite. When he called to minde how contented a life he led before he fell in love, he almost wished he had never seen Policrite; but when he remembered her charming beauty, her bewitching minde, and the happy hours which he had enjoyed in her company, though she had alwayes concealed the esteem she had for him; he preferred all the sorrows he had suffered since he was in love, before all his former pleasures.

Oh! would he sometimes say to himself, when he should read Policrite's letter; how sweet, how pleasing, and how cruel things have I learnt in one day? Policrite is of illustrious birth, Policrite will alwayes remember me, and Policrite will never more see me. Alas, if it be so said he, why have I not recourse to death, and what shall I do with so unfortunate a life? Then suddenly remembering that Policrite was alive, and that she did not hate him, he conceived a beam of hope, that peradventure she might make enquiry after him, and knowing how miserable a life he led, she might at last resolve to let him know in what part she lived.

This thought afforded him onely so much hope as to keep him from dying; not so much as to comfort him in his misfortunes. Living then in this manner all the rest of the Winter, he went sometimes to see the King, when the King could not come to him; and despairing of all remedy, he onely expected death, or news of Policrite: the one or the other, whereof were the object of all his thoughts, and the bounds of all his desires. The Spring it self, which seems to inspire joy into whole Nature, wrought no alteration in him. He beheld the roses in his Gardens blush, with the same melancholy as he had seen his Knots white with Snow in Winter. Those who watched over Cleanthes his slave, brought him word one morning, that he was suddenly dead. This angersome news did redouble his grief, in as much as for that he seemed concerned in any thing which belonged to Policrite; and that this slave appeared to him worthy of such good fortune, as that in losing him, he lost almost all hopes of ever discovering where Policrite was. He forbore not notwithstanding, to have watch kept for a while, to see whether any body should come to that rural Cottage, or no: but at last, weary of wearying out his people, he dispensed with their further trouble therein; and abandoned his fortune absolutely to the guidance of the gods.

As he was one day in this sad mood, Solon came to Claria: he was at first much joyed to hear a name he so dearly loved; but considering what an alteration there was in him, since he had seen him, and how confounded he should be to acknowledge his weakness to him, though he knew that lawfull love was not a passion to which Solon had declared him self an enemy, this joy suffered a little alloy. He went notwithstanding with much eagerness to meet him; but sadness having so deeply seized upon his heart and eyes, the satisfaction which he received to see the famous Solon, was so inward, as there hardly appeared any signe thereof in his countenance. Solon no sooner saw him, but he observed his melancholy; and Philoxypes on his part, looking on Solon, instead of the peacefull physiognomy, and that chearfull and pleasing aspect which he had wont to have in his eyes, he seemed to see a great deal of sorrow.

The first complements being over, and Philoxypes having brought Solon to his Chamber; Sir, said he, the sight of you would surely much rejoice me, did I not see some signes of sorrow in you, of which I must needs request to know the cause. Noble Prince, replied Solon, I should have prevented you, and have desired to know the cause of your melancholy, before having afforded you leasure to informe your self of mine. But I confesse unto you, the Law-giver of Athens, is not at present in a condition of prescribing Laws unto himself; and that the sorrow I feel, is stronger then my reason. Philoxypes, embracing him then straitly, conjured him to tell him the reason thereof, and desired him to believe he would do all that lay in his power to comfort him.

But Sir, said he, I thought that Philosophy had been a salve to you against all the misfortunes of life; and that sorrow was a thing unknown to Solon, to whom whole Greece gives the name of Wise.

Philosophy said this famous Athenian, is a vain-glorious Art; which boasts of governing in places, wherein she hath no great power; she may doubtlesly said he, teach men to be vertuous, make them know whole Nature, reach them how to discourse, and give them Laws and Precepts for the government of Kingdome and Common-wealths; Nay, she may oft-times make us overcome our passions; but when an equitable feeling, which nature gives Page 184 us, is to be overcome, believe me Philoxypes, the same Philosophy which hath sometimes made us lose Crowns without change of countenance, or which hath made us not stick to refuse them, is weak in lesse eminent occasions. And in my particular; I may say, I have been thrice in my life time abandoned by her; though peradventure I have been assisted by her upon an hundred difficult occasions. But yet said Philoxypes, shall I not know what 'tis that afflicts you? It very well behoves that I tell it you, said Solon, since 'tis from you alone that I can expect any help. I will not repeat unto you, said he, the so many particulars of my fortune which formerly I have acquainted you withall, for I believe you have not forgot them; but that you may perfectly know the cause of my grief, I must howsoever take the rise of my discourse afar off; and tell you some circumstances of my life, which you have not yet known. You know I never believed that marriage was incompatible with Philosophy and true Wisdom, as Thales that famous, Milesian did imagine; you know likewise that I married a personage of great worth and understanding, by whom I had children, who died soon after they were born; one onely son excepted, whom I have bred up carefully, intending to make him worthy of that noble blood whence he is descended. He was about 14 or 15 years old, when I was at Milet, about some affairs of mine; where I visited wise Thales, who was one of my very good friends. He civilly reproacht me with my weakness, and said, I did sufficiently witness my indulgency to love, by a little image of Cupid, which I one day consecrated to that Deity, and placed in the Park belonging to the Academy, there where they who run with the sacred Torch, are wont to assemble themselves. Passing from one thing to another, we spake of the happiness, and of the misfortunes of marriage, and thus our discourse varying, as it oft falls out from our first subject, we spoke of news and other such like matters.

Presently after, Thales feigning to have some order to give to one of his folk about his own affairs, rose to speak to him in his ear, and came and took his place again. Not long after, I might see a stranger come, whom I knew not, who told him he was come from Athens, not above ten dayes ago. Prest by the naturall desire of curiosity, to know whether there was nothing of new befall in my Countrey, since my departure thence, I askt him whether he knew any thing considerable there or no? No, said he, save onely that the day I came away on, I saw the Funerall observed of a young youth of the best rank, whereat all the people of note in the Town, were present, and were very sensible of the sorrow this childes death would cause in his Father, who was not then at Athens. I confess, when I heard him speak thus, my colour changed, fearing my son might be concerned; which made me ask him whether he knew not the name of that unfortunate Father? I have forgot it, said he, but I know he is a man of great integrity, and who is much esteemed of in that place.

I confesse Sir, that since Philosophy teacheth sincerity, as well as modesty, I thought I might be the man spoken of; was willing to know the truth, without offence to good manners; his name doubtlesly, said I, was not Solon: pardon me, said he, his name came just to my memory as you pronounced it. To what end serves it to deny it? I could not hear so sad news without sorrow, and that so great as Thales pitied me, and jesting at my weakness, asked me whether it were advantageous for a wise man to marry, or no? Putting himself thereby in a condition to have studied Philosophie for others, not being able to make use thereof himself. After this, he told me there was not one word true of all that this man had said; that he had not so much as been at Athens of a long time; and that he had said all this by his directions, which he had caused to be given him, when he rose from me to speak in the ear with one of his servants.

At my returne to Athens, I found my son alive indeed, but I found the whole Town in confusion, by reason of some disorder that had happened between those that were descended from Megacles, and those that were come of them that had been of the Ciconian conspiracie. The Megarians surprized the port of Nisa, and re-took the Isle of Salamina, which had caused me so much trouble. And to adde to the misfortune, all the people were seized on with a superstitious snare, which perswaded them that spirits returned; that fantasies and apparitions appeared; and this imagination prevailed so much with most of them, as there was an universal humiliation.

Those who had the charge of the sacred things, said, that they found infallible signes by the Victims, that the Town needed purification, and that the gods were incensed by reason of some secret offence committed.

To this effect, by the advice of the wisest sort, they sent an Expresse to Creta, to Epime|nides Page 185 the Phaestien, who was and doubtlesly is stil, an incomparable man, a man whose life is altogether pure, innocent, and holy: who eats no more then what is sufficient to maintain life, and whose soul leans as little to the senses, as in this life it can: who is very learned in the knowledge of heavenly things; and who passes in his Countrey, not only for one who hath sometimes Divine Revelations, but is by the people of Crete believed to be the son of a Nymph, called, Balta, However if it be Sir, he is a man of extraordinary knowledge and vertue.

Epimenides, not refusing the entreaties that were made unto him, came to Athens, and of so many famous men as were in that noted City, did me the favour to chuse me for his most intimate friend, having through his wisdom, and through the peoples belief in him, dissipated all their false imaginations, and that by Prayers, Sacrifices, and Ceremonies, he had rid them of all their fears, he would yet stay awhile at Athens for my sake; where certainly he told prodigious predictions to a hundred several people. As we were speaking one day of humane weaknesses, and how little a man ought to rely upon his own strength, nor yet upon Philosophie; I acquainted him with what had befallen me with Thales the Milesian, and how much ashamed I was, not to be Master of my first opinions. Solon (said he to me) is easie to be overcome on that side, and as often as fortune will make use of the affections of nature against him, she will certainly overcome him: For he hath a soul as tender upon such encounters, as strong against ambition: But Solon, said he, you are to be bewailed if you do not resolve to believe me; and believe that what you underwent whilst you were with your friend Thales, is little in comparison of what you shall one day suffer in the person of a Daughter, of whom your wife is at this present with Child.

I have, said, he, observed your birth, and your life, and I find that this child, which will be soon born, will be a prodigie for beauty and vertue; and will also be one of the happiest women in the world, if you will believe my counsel: but also if you will not believe, and follow it, she will be the most unfortunate. In fine, said he, if you do not what I shall say unto you, you shall have the discontent to see that your Daughters beauty will make your Countrey desolate; and that after having refused the sovereign power (as you will one day refuse it) she will make one of your Citizens fall in Love with her, who will become the Tyrant of the Common-wealth, which will make her resolve to die, rather then to marry him.

I confesse I was much troubled to hear Epimenides speak after this manner; for I had heard him foretel divers things, which I had seen punctually fall out according to his predictions. I then desired him to tell me what he would have me to do, to preserve a man who did sacrifice his whole life to the glory of Athens, from having a daughter who should cause love in him that would be the Tyrant thereof. He told me then, That since it was not yet known in Athens that my wife was with Childe, I should conceal her great belly; send her into the Countrey, and when she should be brought to bed, that I should cause this daughter to be secretly brought up, not suffering her to know whose childe she was, nor yet any other body whosoever, except those who were to have the care of her education, that if it should so fall out, as I should be forced to forsake my Countrey, I must during my exile, leave her in some Island upon the Egean Sea; and that things being thus carried, she should be infallibly happy, and I should not need to fear that she should be beloved by the Tyrant of Athens. In fine, Sir, to shorten my discourse, I obeyed Epimenides his advise; I sent my wife into the Countrey, where when her time was come, she was brought to bed of a Daughter: wondering at the accomplishment of the beginning of this prediction, I continued to follow Epimenides his directions, who at his departure (after having refused all the presents that were made him, and taking for his reward, only a branch of the Sacred Olive) told me that my Daughter would one day cause as much joy in me by her vertue, and good fortune, as she would cause sorrow in me by reason of her losse. These obscure words continued fix'd in my memory, so as I put my Daughter into the hands of a Sister of mine whom I loved very well, who was married in Corinth, and was come to see me: trusting only her and her husband, with the secret which Epimenides had acquainted me withal.

I will not stay to tell you, that soon after I lost my wife, for which I was very much grieved; neither will I entertain you with the disorders of Athens, which are too well known to all men; nor yet with the relation how I was solicited to accept of the Sovereign power, being put in mind that there had been Kings of my Race, and that one that was descended from the illustrious Chodrus, need make no scruple to accept the Scepter: nor Page 186 with what stedfastnesse I rejected those who made so unjust a proposition to me, following Epimenides his predictions. Neither will I tell you what Laws • there established, you know them, and know how they were observed; nor yet the resolution which I took to quit my Countrey, for the space of ten years; to the end that I might make no further alterations, and leave the people leasure to accustom themselves to their new Laws.

But I will tell you, that being ready to take my voluntary banishment from Greece, and not forgetting what Epimenides had told me, I came to Corinth, unknown: and having told my sister that I was obliged to leave my Daughter in an Island during the time of my exile: This virtuous personage, who loved her no lesse then a Daughter, which she had of her own, had married a Gentleman of extraordinary worth, and who had long lived a retired life, so as she easily prevailed with him, not to abandon my Daughter, who really appeared to me, to be the sweetest childe I ever saw. I consulted the Gods touching my design, who confirmed me therein. Thus I took this little Family along with me in my ship; and being desirous that the place of exile for these whom I so dearly loved, might be a pleasant place, I chose this Isle to leave them in.

Whilst Solon discovered thus at large, Philoxypes, who longed to interrupt him, could no longer forbear: did you, Sir, said he, leave a Daughter in this Island? Yes, said Solon, with a sigh, and I saw her here about four years ago, when I would be seen by none but by you: and Sir, if I may be allowed to say so, I saw her such a one as Epimenides had deciphered her, to wit, handsom, full of wit and vertue.

When I first left those, to whose guidance I committed her, I willed them to say they were of the Island of Crete: At this word, Philoxypes changed colour, remembering that it was of thence that Cleanthes said himself to be. But Sir, said he, how was this daughter called, that the gods gave you? Policrite replied Solon. Policrite, said Philoxypes, is Pollicrite, Sir, then your daughter? Solon surprised at Philoxypes question, changed colour also, and feared lest this Prince might have known somewhat of Policrite, which might displease him more then the uncertainty he was in of her life or place of abode.

•ow Sir, said he, come you to know my daughter, whom to say truth, I left near enough to you, but whom I had also left in a place, where I thought not you should have met with her; and that when you should have met with her, you •ould not have known her to be what she is? It was the gods, replied Philoxypes, who brought me to the knowledge of her; and 'tis the gods likewise, said he, who have taken her from her Cottage, doubtlesly to punish me for not precisely knowing the daughter of that famous Solon. At last, he delired this Law-giver to go into his Gallery, which was painted since his last being at Clalria; and shewing him the several pictures of Policrite, under the figure of Venus Urania; behold, Sir, said he, the Goddess which made me know Policrite. Solon surprised with the sight, looked on Philoxypes, and not comprehending how he could come by those pictures without Policrites consent; Sir, said he, Epimenides assured me that Policrite should be vertuous; but these pictures make me believe, that being bred up amongst the Rocks, she may have become too indulgent. Ah, Sir, said Philoxypes! how far is Policrite from what you speak of? but shall I dare to acquaint you with my boldnesse? and shall I dare to enquire of you, before I acquaint you with my misfortune, and yours, wherefore you left her in that place? Solon, who knew Cleanthes and Megisto's integrity, who knew likewise how vertuous Policrite was, condemned his first suspitions, and hasted to tell him how when he first arrived in our Island, he made Cleanthes and his Family come on shore as passengers which he knew not, that afterwards he placed them near the Sea side, but that being afterwards at Claria, and whilst he assisted him in the building of that Town to which he would give his name, being walk'd abroad all alone, he had observed that little deser place where he placed Policrite, having given Cleanthes wherewithal to build that little Cottage, and wherewithall to subsist commodiously during the time of his exile. That pas|sing from Africa into Asia, to go to Croesus his Court, he would first come once again to Cyprus, that he might see his dear Policrite. That he had been a whole moneth in that Cottage, Policrite not having all that while either known his name, nor that he was her Father; and that afterwards he came to visit him at Claria; that he confest he had in that journey discovered stranges light in the young maids understanding, which obliged him to be very sensible of her losse: For, said he, I can find no body now in that Cottage, and cannot learn, neither why those that did inhabit there have left it, nor how long it is since they went from thence, nor what way they are gone.

Page 187 But you Sir, said he, be pleased I beseech you to let me hear all whatsoever you know of my daughter, and conceal nothing from me; for I confess I stand upon thorns. Philoxypes having observed that Solon was really very impatient to know how he came to know Policrite, and how he had got somany Pictures of hers, told him the whole truth; he made him call to mind his former inflexibility, and how he had told him long since that a man might once in his life be overcome by love without any •ame. Then he told him what glorious and gallant company he had had at his house; how miraculously this Venus was esteemed by them all: the contestation which he had with them thereupon; how afterwards he met with Policrite, at the head of the River Claria; how surprized he was to see that the Pourtrait of his Venus, should be the picture of this unknown maid; how much he was troubled that he could not finde her again; how happily he met Clejanthes as he was going with his Family to the Temple: how he saw her the third time when he found her in the Temple; how at last he discovered her Cottage, and his sun|dry thoughts thereupon: he acquainted him with the first visit he made to Policrite, when he found her making Garlands of Flowers; what speech he had with Cleanthes and Megisto; and in fine, how violently he was taken with her. He told him also, how he had endeavoured to suppress his passion, by reason of the supposed meanness of her birth: what an alteration this passion had wrought in his minde: how the Court was startled at his Melancholy; the Kings odd conceipt thereupon, his discourse with the King, and with the Princesse Ar•tephile: how angry this Princesse was, and how much he himself was perplext: how it came to pass that Mandrocles had drawn Pollicrite's Pictures; and in fine, he told him all that had befallen him: and when he had ended his recitall, not affording Solon leisure to speak, thus you see, Sir, said he, I am no longer that Inflexible Philoxypes which you formerly knew me to be, but I may safely protest unto you, that I loved Policrite in a Cottage, with the same respect as if she had been seated on a Throne: and I may also assure you, that my passion for her was as pure, as if I had known she had been your daughter.

Do not blame me then, I conjure you, since I have onely adored Solons virtue and worth in Policrite's person; for tis her virtuous minde which I am more enamor'd of, then of her personall beauty; yet do I deserve to be punish'd, for doubtlesly my frequent visits have caused Cleanthes to change his abode. He knew not Philoxypes, and Imagined he might have abused him in Policrite: But to prove, said he, that I lived respectfully with her, and that I never received a favourable word from her, see (said he, Sir, shewing him the letter which he had received) the innocent and cruell signe of acknowledgment, that this Divine Personage hath given me, since that at the same time when she saies she will remember me, she saies also she shall never see me more: yet Sir, said he, if my passion do displease you, you shall see how ready I will be to die, as soon as you shall have given me the least occasion so to do; since that is the only way whereby I can pluck her from out my heart: but on the contrary, if you do truly love me, you will ralther bewail me, then accuse me; you will promise me not to oppose me, if the Gods relstore Policrite to you: and you will suffer her to be Mistress of that stately town which was built by your directions.

I wish, Sir, I were able to offer her sundry Scepters; but I think not that he who relfuseth them, will stick much to bestow his daughter on a Prince, who thinks himself happie in being but near a Throne, and to assist his King to sustain the weight of his Scepter.

When Philoxypes had made an end of speaking, and Solon had read Policrite's letter; my Daughter said he, is yet wiser then I thought her to have been: and since she hath been able to resist the charms of Philoxype's greatness and worth, I finde Epimenides had reason to speak of her, as of a miracle.

Be you then assured, said he, Sir, That if the Gods restore my Daughter to me, I shall bring no other obstacle to your designes, then my humble desire that you will seriously consider, whether she be worthy or no of the honour you would do her: for if you continue in your resolution, and that I shall know that she doth indeed deserve a part of the favours which you vouchsafe her, I shall be ready to command her to look on you, as on him whom the gods have chosen to make her happy and glorious.

I do not tell you Philoxypes, that the famous Exces-sides, my Father, who left me poor onely out of his own Magnificency, was descended from the illustrious blood of King Chodrus; for these are not things which I think then ought much to boast of: But I will Page 188 assure you, that all those of my House, since they have left the Crown, have been as good Citizens, as their Forefathers were good Kings; and that for my particular, I had alwaies rather oppose my self to Tyranny, then be a Tyrant.

In fine, said he, as it is not to your greatness that I give Policrite, I pretend also, that Policrite's virtue, shall supply the place of a Crown.

But alas, said Philoxypes! how will you give me this Divine Policrite, if we know not where she is? She must be begg'd of the Gods, replied Solon, since tis from them alone that we are to expect all the good that can befall us.

In fine; sir, Philoxypes conceived an unexpressible joy, to finde Solon so favourably disposed towards him. But also his grief was no less extream, to think that Solons good intentions would prove of no use, if Policrite were not found. Yet was he somewhat comforted with the sight of so famous a man, and the conversation of one so perfectly wise, made his sorrow appear at least more moderate, though really it was alwaies very great. Nay, I remember he told me that notwithstanding all his sadness, he forgot not you, sir, but entertained Solon with the discourse of you, as of a very extraordinary Personage.

This mean while the King, having heard of Solons arrivall, and how that Policrite was his daughter, was exceeding glad, and would have him and Philoxypes to come to Court; so as this Prince his love was no longer so great a secret.

Imagining that Cleanthes was not gone out of the Island, command was sent again to all the Towns and Villages, to give an account of what strangers lived in them, but do what they could, they could learn no acceptable news.

This mean while the Court grew very melancholy; for Princesse Aretephile, not able to put on a resolution of pardoning the King, the King by an odd phansie of Love, resolved also to winn this Princesse her heart, before he would assure her to make her his Queen.

Philoxypes on his part was mad to think he could not finde out Policrite, and that he had been the cause why Solon had lost her: and Solon was also very sad that he could hear no newes of his daughter; especially at a time when he was of necessitie to return to Athens, where he had learned that there were great disorders, and that all things tended towards Sedition.

He knew that there were three severall Factions there: that one Licurgus was chief of those that inhabited the plains; that Megacles, son to Alcmeon, commanded over those of the sea coast, and that Pisistrates, whom certainly you knew when you went to Athens, was chief of the mountaineers. So as though all that numerous people had punctually observed his Lawes, since his departure, yet the face of affairs was likely soon to alter.

Solon being then necessitated to be gone within a few daies, told Philoxypes, That the interest of a mans country, was to be preferd before all things else: and that he who chose rather to conceal his daughter, then to expose her to the love of a Tyrant, would not abandon his Country, to expect in vain to hear of one whom certainly the Gods would preserve if she were worthy of their care; so as he had no more to do, then give him full leave to marry her if he should finde her; Philoxypes being at that same time both much afflicted, and much joyed; thankt Solon for the honour he did him; but the winde not serving for his departure, and his ship not being ready, he must have patience for a while, During this interval of time, Solon understood that there was a famous Temple about some forty miles from Paphos, dedicated as were almost all the rest in the Island, to Venus Urania, where 'twas said this Goddess delighted more to be honour'd, then in any other Temple: because the custome there was, that all the Ceremonies were performed by maids of good descent, who dedicated themselves to the service of that Goddess, and who were to serve her three years in her Temple before they were to marry.

Solon who believed he could not employ the time better, which much against his will, he was to stay in Cyprus, then in praying to the Gods, moved Philoxypes to go thither, who easily gave way thereunto: so as getting on horseback the next morning, and attended but by a few servants, they came to this Temple, which is very delightfully seated.

I know Sir, I should not stay to acquaint you with all the Ceremonies of the sacrifice, which upon this occasion was offered for Solon and Philoxypes, yet it being famous amongst us for what ensued thereupon, I will crave leave to do it; as also because peradventure, Page 189 you have not seen the like: For tis a sacrifice which doth not cost the victims lives, but on the contrary, makes them recover their liberty.

This Temple is fairly enough built: the Altar is stately, at the foot whereof, and just in the mid'st, is placed a great candlestick of Gold with twelve branches, whereon Chrystal lamps hung which were all lighted instantly after. Fifty maids, clothed in silver Tiffanny, mingled with blew, to denote the originall of that heavenly Venus whom they served, having each of them a Coronet of flowers on their head, and sprigs of Myrrh in their hands, ranck'd themselves on the two sides of the Temple, she onely excepted who was to perform the Ceremony, who staid in the middle.

At the foot of this golden candlestick, there was a great Chest or Coffe of the same mettall, wherein there was fire which they termed sacred, because it is only lighted by the agitation of certain stones consecrated to the Goddess: she who offered the sacrifice in the name of Solon, and Philoxypes, put Amber, Frankincense, Benjamin, and divers other perfumes, into this Pile of wood: This being done, and having made a little Pile of the dry boughs of Myrrh upon the Altar, she took a Torch made of perfumed wax, wherewith she set it on fire, and with the same Torch she lighted fifty others which were placed in sundry parts of the Temple: after this, one of these maids brought two Turtles tied together with threads of gold and blew silk; and before her who carried the Birds, went four other maids singing a Hymn after the Lydian manner: after these came four others, bringing with them two Swans tyed together with a string of blew and gold, and followed by four more who sung as did the former.

These maids who carryed the Victims, kneeled down before the Altar, which being done, she who did the Ceremony, (to the end that she might not irritate Venus Anadiomene, who had been formerly worshipped in that Temple, by the honour that was done to Venus Urania) took Roses and Cockles, which she strewd upon the Altar, and taking a great shel of the Mother of pearl full of sea water, taken up towards the east, she sprinkled the Victims therewith.

The holy knife, adorn'd with Orientall Aggat, was likewise prepared, as it were to sacrifice them; but the maids who sung continually forbad them in the behalf of Venus Urania, so as she who carried the Turtles, and the other who carried the Swans, drawing near her who performed the Ceremony, she untied them, and opening one of the windows of the Temple, at the same time when they threw new perfumes into the pile of wood, they were lost in that cloud of perfume which arose, and flying towards heaven, seemed as if they went to carry up the vows of Solon and Philoxypes, to the Goddess to whom they were offered up.

After this, all the maids which were in the Temple, began a Canticle of joy, and one of them taking a little Fagot of Myrrh, which was bound about with threads of Gold, swept together the ashes of the little pile, to see whether all were quite consumed or no; for this is one of the tokens that the Sacrifice hath been well received.

In pursuit after this, they went to visit the sacred garden, wherein the Turtles and Swans, destined to the service of the Goddess, are bred up, to see whether those that were offer'd up unto her, were returned thither or no: for when this falls not out, tis an infallible observation that the sacrifice hath not been well accepted of, and that the Goddess thinks not those birds pure enough to be presented unto her another time. But as for Solon his Sacrifice, it had all the marks of a happy Sacrifice; the Pile was totally consumed, the perfumes mounted streight upright toward the Temples Roof, the birds flew East-ward, and were found in the sacred Garden. In fine, these maids assured Philoxypes and Solon, that their vows were well accepted of by the Goddess; and that they had not of a long time offered any Sacrifice, which had been so well accepted of.

Having then returned acknowledgments to the Divine Urania, these two returned to Paphos: Solon did so pleasantly entertain Philoxypes, and said such fine things to him, as not taking heed, he mist the way by which they came. Those who followed them, thought that Philoxypes, who very well knew that way, intended to go some whither that they knew not of, so as they let him go on. Continuing to ride on thus by this by-way, they strayed not onely from the way they were to go, but came at last to a place where there was no beaten track at all: finding themselves at the Sea side, amongst wilde, and almost inaccessible Rocks, the sight hereof recall'd into Philoxypes memory the desert wherein he had found Policrites abode.

Page 190 But at the same time he found that he had lost his way; and that he knew not where he was: yet it appearing delightfull enough unto him, though sandy enough, he said to Solon, that continuing to go along the Sea-side, they should meet with some path which would lead them back into the right way; wherefore they did not return back, but continued on their way; and Philoxypes rode formost, that he might be a guide to those that he had led out of the way.

Being advanced a good way, he might see five or six fishers Cottages, built upon the Sea-side, and heard the voyce of certain women, who seemed to bewail some misfortune.

He then mended his pace, not knowing why the voice of those women had had such an operation in him; and being come near them, he knew Megisto, and Dorida, and found them sorely weeping, and accompanied with many other women, who wept as well as they, and who not minding him, looked all towards the Sea.

He then looked the same way they did, where, alas! he might see Policrite, all alone in a little boat floating, without either oars or rudder; who not knowing what to do, was upon her knees praying to Heaven; for though the Sea went not very high, yet was it somewhat moved; and moreover, the Rocks bearing back the Waves on that side, and a breath of air blowing from land, the Boat went still further off.

Philoxypes seeing Policrite in so great a danger, and not seeing any Boat that he might make use of, lighted suddenly off Horeback, and threw himself into the Water, swimming straight towards Policrite.

So as when Solon, who was a little behinde, was come to the Sea-shoar, you may easily imagine how much he was surprized to see Megisto covered with tears, Policrite all alone in a Boat, which the Waves bore towards the full Sea, and Philoxypes swimming towards Policrite; but he was so far from her, as it was to be believed that (the Boat floating still forward) his strength might fail him before he could get up to her; and that Solon might see his dear Daughter perish in his sight, as also a Prine whom he loved no lesse then her.

To tell you also how strangely astonish'd Megisto was, to see Philoxypes throw himself into the Sea, and presently after to see Solon come, is not a thing easily done. Nor yet to set forth Policrites thoughts, when she knew Philoxypes, and saw him in so great danger for her sake.

This gallant personage told us notwithstanding afterwards, that she no sooner knew him, but the object of her vows altered; and that ceasing to think on her own danger, all her prayers were poured forth for Philoxypes. This mean while Solon was upon the shore with Megisto, whose minde was not then at liberty enough to tell him how this misfortune hapned; telling him onely that Policrite was lost.

And to say truth, I think that upon this encounter, Solons wisdom was put to a greater triall then ever it had been: and that it was much more easie for him to refuse a Crown, then to see Policrite and Philoxypes in the danger they were in, without giving apparent tokens of despair.

Yet this famous man kept himself within the lawfull bounds of sorrow; and not doing any thing unworthy of himself, did notwithstanding, feel what ever pains a tender and generous soul could suffer under.

This mean while though Philoxypes was but lightly clad, for the spring was already verry hot in our Island, he could not swim with that facility as he might have done, had he been naked; so as Policrites Boat driving still away, he could not get up unto it.

One might see this young maid use some bootlesse endeavours to stay this little Boat, but 'twas impossible for her to do it: nay, she did things which she her self knew were of no avail, yet could not keep from doing them.

One might likewise observe Philoxypes to strive to his utmost, and then he seemed to be ready to perish through wearinesse. But at last being got near the Boat, sometimes one might see the Boat driven near unto him by one Wave, and sometimes born from him by another; for it went to and fro with the wind.

It was so near him as he might hear Policrites voice, not being able to answer her, so much was he out of breath with swimming.

Sir, said she, Let me perish; do you return to the shoar; and strive not bootlesly to save me.

Page 191 You may imagine whether so obliging a command did not oblige Philoxypes to redouble his forces. At last, Sir, after that Solon had seen the Waves rise up more then once, ready to over-turn the Boat, and swallow up Philoxypes, who was now able to do no more, a great Wave having driven the Boat towards him, he luckily laid hold of the rope whereby it was fastened formerly to the Sea-bank.

You may imagine, Sir, what Philoxypes joy was then, as likewise what that of Pollicrite, Solon, Megisto, Dorida, and the other women that were upon the shore; they all shouted for joy.

Yet, was it not yet time to rejoyce; For though it be not hard to guide a floating Boat, yet Philoxypes was so weary, as there was reason to despair of his ever accomplishing what he had so happily begun; he was seen to sink twice under water, yet never quit the rope which he had in his hand. Think Sir, how great Policrites grief was then, and with how many tears she repaid the pains he took to save her. One might observe this Amorous Prince do two contrary things; for he would look back upon the shore, that he might the sooner bring back his Dear Policrite thither; and sometimes believing he should perish without saving her, he would at least have the contentment of seeing her at his last gasp.

He looked thus, sometimes towards the shore, sometimes on Policrite: and things were in this condition, when Philoxypes and Solons servants, who carried a good way behinde by reason of some accident which had befallen one of their horses, were come up, amongst which was one of Philoxypes his gentlemen, who being skilfull in swimming, threw himself instantly into the water, and helped his dear Master to guide Poliorite back unto the shore, where this Prince was no sooner arrived, but that his force failing him he swounded.

'Tis needlesse to tell you what Solon, Megisto, and all the rest that were on the shore, did to aid him. As for Policrite, she was so surprized, and so afflicted, to see what condition Philoxypes was in, as she was not sensible of the joy of having escaped so great a danger: but at last, after having carried Philoxypes into one of those little Huts, and having by the means they used, brought him to life again, and dried his apparell, he asked where Policrite was? whom Solon brought to him out of a little chamber whither she had retired her self, though she had not yet perfectly shook off the fear she had been in of her self, and of Philoxypes.

But at last all being retired that were in that little Hut, save Megisto, Policrite, Dorida, Philoxypes, and Solon. Solon desired Megisto to tell him, why she had quitted the little abode which he had caused to be built for her? wherefore she was come to this place, and where Cleanthes was? wherefore they had left no order to acquaint him with their removal? and how this last misfortune had befallen Policrite? But, said he, Sister, speak freely without any wise disguising the truth. For Prince Philoxypes knowes I am your Brother, that Policrite is my Daughter: and I know also that he does her the honour to love her; therefore conceal nothing for his respect, for he hath now a deeper share in Policrite, then I have, since I have given her to him; and that he may now lay a new claim unto her, by having saved her life.

I leave you to imagine, Sir, how Policrite was surprized to know that she was Solons Daughter, whom she knew to be a great and excellent man, but whom she know not to be her Father; and to know at the same time that she was bestowed on Philoxypes; she blush'd, but with a great deal of modesty; and looking upon Megisto, as if she would ask her whether it were true or no, that she was Solons daughter? she confirmed her in that belief; and afforded her leisure so to confound the joy she had to see Philoxypes again, with that of her knowing her self to be daughter to so famous a man, as nothing appeared in her countenance but what so great an honour might cause in her.

Philoxypes beginning then to speak, said as obliging things to Solon in Policrites behalf, as in his own; and Megisto was some-while before she could satisfie her Brothers curiosity. But at last she told him; That knowing the love Prince Philoxypes bore to Policrite, she had thought it fitting to acquaint Policrite onely, that she was more then what she took her self to be, to the end she might know how to treat Philoxypes with more indifferency; and that she might think her self the lesse obliged to him for his affection: That Cleanthes and she, having observed that this had produced a contrary effect in Policrite, and Prince Philoxypes having shewed much passion in the last visit which he made them, she confest the ones worth, and the others youth, had caused some apprehension in her: that Page 192 in pursuit hereof, knowing that the King was at Claria, and fearing lest Philoxypes might speak to him of Policrites beauty, she had advised Cleanthes to quit his abode, which in effect they had done, and were come to this little Maritime Hamlet, where Cleanthes was acquainted with an old Fisherman, who had left them his Hut, being himself gone to live with a son of his: that they had left a young Slave at their former place of abode, with direction, that if Solon should come thither, he should wish him to come the first day of the next ensuing Moon, to a Temple which they named unto him, where Cleanthes would not fail to be on the same day to meet him when he should come thither.

That since that time, Cleanthes had learnt by the Priest of the little Temple which was near their former abode, that this Slave was dead; so as knowing that the time of Solons return drew near, Cleanthes resolved to go live himself alone at Paphos, knowing that when he should return to Cyprus, he would not fail to wait upon the King, and so he could not misse of him; to which purpose he was gone thither that very morning: that Policrite, who had no better pastime, especially since they had left their former abode, then to draw every day something or other upon her Table-books: seeing all the Fisher-men were gone from their little Hamlet, leaving no Boat behind them, save that wherein they had seen her, and wherein there was neither Rudder nor Oar, sat down in it, and not minding whether it were well fastened to the shore or no, was designing forth that little rurall float of Boats, which went still further from her: that she was so attentive to her work in hand, that as she her self had told them, she did not perceive the Boat wherein she was, was loosened from the Land, and went floating as the windes blew it: so as said Megisto, coming forth to look after Policrite, I saw her in the posture I have told you, and skreek'd out so loud, as I made her perceive the danger she was in, not being able to help her, there not being one man left in the whole Hamlet; and all the fisher-boats, having already doubled a Cape of Land, whereby we lost sight of them.

Megisto having ended her relation, Solon 'gan admire the providence of the gods in the guidance of worldly things; and considering that unlesse Philoxypes and he had lost their way, Policrite in all appearance had been lost, he could not sufficiently praise the goddesse, who had so well received his sacrifice; in effect, this Temple of Venus Urania, hath got much renown by this adventure. But Sir, to abuse your patience no longer, I will onely tell you, that in stead of going to Paphos, Philoxypes and Solon went the next day to Claria, whither they brought Megisto, Policrite, Dorida, and all the women that attended them, after that Philoxypes had largely rewarded all the Fisher-mens wives for their Hospitality and courtesie shewed to Policrite. To tell you how great Philoxypes and Policrites joy was, would be no easie matter, and to relate unto you in what termes this happy Lover exprest his satisfaction to Policrite, and with what an obliging modesty she received the testimony of his affection, and gave him some marks of hers, would be to undertake too difficult a task. For to learn in one and the same day, that she was Daughter to the so Illustrious Solon, and that she was to be wife to Philoxypes, were two things wherewith her soul was divided. Philoxypes failed not to shew Policrite her Pictures in his Gallery, which, though rarely handsome, came much short of her. The next day Solon sent to enquire out Cleanthes at Paphos, where he was found and brought to Claria. Necessary order being taken for it, Cleanthes, Megisto, Policrite, and Dorida, had clothes made answerable to their condition.

The next morning the Princesse of Salamis, and the Princesse Agharista, being advertised by their brother Philoxypes of the truth of his Adventure: these two fair Princesses, I say, who loved him dearly, who had learned Policrites Illustrious birth by this advertisement, and who did reverence Solon as a god, went to Claria, to conduct this beautifull creature to Paphos.

But good gods! how they were surprized with her extreme beauty, comparing which with her Pictures, they found her to exceed them far; but if she appeared fair unto them, she seemed yet more spirituall.

She had somewhat in her of admirable modesty, which having nothing in it of Rustick, rendred her yet more pleasing: she had a soul doubtlesly fraught with all that innocency which she had preserved amidst those Rocks: but withall a minde and humour, wherein were all the Charmes which the Court could afford.

For Megisto being rightly Solons Sister, knew as well as any one what was requisite in, and did necessarily become those of her Sex, and had perfectly instructed Pollicrite therein.

Page 193 Young Dorida appeared also to be very fair, and lovely at the Court; where the King received Solon, Cleanthes, Megisto, Philoxypes, and Policrite, with unexpressible joy and honour. And this so much the more, as that being at last, resolved to content Princess Aretephiles ambition, that so he might satisfie his own love, had made her be told the day before, that it should be her fault if she were not Queen.

But if Aretephile were Queen of Cyprus, Policrite was the Queen of Beauty; none but the Princesse of Salamis could any way dispute that glorious Empire with her. In fine, Sir, there was nothing heard of now, but feasts and rejoycing. Solon being of necessity to be gone, they hastened the consummation of those famous marriages: The king would have one Ceremony serve for them both; nor did Cyprus ever see any thing of more glorious, though it were done with precipitation. Solon called then to mind Epimenides his predictions, and confest that there was somewhat of Divine in that holy man. But his Countreys interest prevailing more with him, then whatsoever other interests, he departed for Athens, so as some tears of sorrow did for a while a little alloy Policrite's joy; but to comfort her, young Dorida was left with her, when Cleanthes and Megisto embarked themselves with Solon. This was the condition Sir, wherein this great man left the Court of Cyprus: to wit, the King highly content: Queen Aretephile as highly satisfied; and Philoxypes and Policrite so happy, as wishes could not adde thereunto.

Within a few days after, the Prince of Sicily sent to ask the Princesse Agharista, sister unto Philoxypes, in marriage; and it was consented unto. Also it was included in the conditions of the marriage that he should send some certain Troops unto you, as the King of Cyprus already had. And since it was I who had the honour to conduct the Princesse Agharista into Sicilie, I accepted of the employment which was offered me, to come hither: And returning unto Cyprus to accommodate my self with necessary equipage, the Prince Philoxypes charged me to relate his adventure unto you; and to entreat you from him, that you would not lessen his good fortune by depriving him of your friendship, which is infinitely dear and pretious unto him.

As soon as Leontidas had made an end, Artamenes assured him, that if the felicity of Philoxypes were never lessened but by the want of his affection, he might be certain to be happy for ever. Thimocrates and Philocles seemed to be exceeding joyed at the satisfaction of a Prince whom they infinitely loved; Artamenes also was doubtlesse as pleasant as any one in his present condition could be: But his state stood upon such terms as he could not hear of either any good or bad adventures without some sorrow; for when the felicity of any one was discoursed upon, and comparing it with his own misfortunes, he alwayes sighed: and also when he heard of any disastrous accident, he sighed still: So that it was very true, that experience in misfortunes makes a soul sensible of compassion. He rejoyced then at the good fortunes of Philoxypes, but it was with a sigh; and he testified unto Leontidas, how sorry he was not to be in a condition, wherein he might make the Prince Artibies and himself see, how infinitely dear the recommendations of Philoxypes was unto him. But Leontidas (said he unto him) you are come to serve a great and most just King, who will ne|ver suffer your vertues to be unrecompensed, as well as if I were at liberty. Sir (answered Leontidas) it would be a difficult matter to perswade all Asia, that the King of Medes is just in all things, as long as you are a prisoner. Kings (replied Artamenes with much wisdom) do sometimes commit injustice, innocently; because they are perswaded they have reason for what they do; and such as suffer such injustice as I speak of, are themselves unjust, if they do not endure them without murmur or complaint. Timocrates, Philocles, & Leontidas were ravished with the prudence of Artamenes: and to see he knew how to make use of bad fortune as well as good; and so they left him, making a thousand new protestations of inviolable fidelity. But all the while he endured his strict imprisonment with invincible patience; all his illustrious friends had no other thoughts but how to get him out. Ariobantes, whom Ciaxares had left Regent in the Kingdome came from Themiscira unto Sinope, as well to render an account of his office, as to advertise the King, how all the inhabitants of Themiscira, Amasia, and that part of Cappadocia, which was not revolted, belgan to speak high, that they would send deputies unto the King, to desire him that Artamenes might be set at liberty. Sir, (said Ariobantes unto Ciaxares) all Galatia sayes the same: and all your three Kingdoms cannot brook, that a man whom they reverence as a god, should be in prison: Also that which I tell you of Cappadocia and Galatia, I understand that all Medea intend the same: Ciaxares harkened unto Ariobantes, but returned no answer, because he staid for the result of the King of Armenias answer, before he would Page 194 resolve upon any thing: Mean while, Chrisantes and Feraulas were continually negotiating, both by their own endeavours, and the solicitations of all the Kings, Princes and friends which Artamenes had: Ciaxares was never without some about him who was speaking for this illustrious prisoner: The King of Phrygia was no sooner gone out, but the King of Hircania came in, and after him succeeded Persodes or Hidaspes: In short, either by Aglilatidas, or Timocrates, or Philocles, or Gobrias, or Gadates, or Thrasibulus, or Madates, or Artucas, the name of Artamenes was perpetually pronounced. If Ciaxares went to the Temple, the sacrificers spoke of him: If he went unto the streets of Sinope, the inhabitants kneeled and begged his liberty: If he went out to walk in the fields or Camp, all the souldiers petitioned for their General: and except that old friend to Aribeus, who alwayes held intelligence with Artaxes, there was not one but was ready to serve Artamenes: so that this man whose name was Metrobates, was doubtlesse the only man, that had a design to destroy him: Martesia for her part, who was informed by Feraulas of all that passed, was extreemly glad to see the merit of Artamenes so applauded; and to see that it was not with him, as with other favourites, who when fortune forsakes them, then all the world does the like; but that on the contrary, the love of every one augmented with his misfortunes: She also received every day by Feraulas, a complement from Artamenes: who told her that his prison had wrought no alteration in him, but that he still retained his passion, as well as his civillitie: As all things stood in this condition, Megabises returned, and came unto the King, when very many were with him, and more still pressed after him when he entered, to hear news: Ciaxares no sooner saw him, without making any secret of his answer, well, Megabises (said he unto him) let us know how they have received my Daughter into Armenia; will that King restore her unto me, as he is obliged to do? Sir, answered Megabises, my journey has not had happy successe; I cannot know who the King is which the Princesse spoke of in her paper: the King of Armenia will not acknowledge that she is in his dominions, although there is great appearance she is: nor did I find the Prince Tilgranes in his fathers Court. But yet (said Ciaxares unto him) how did that King receive you? Sir (answered Megabises) when I came at Artaxates, and had sent unto the King to demand audience, he made me wait three dayes; and during that time I was always carefully observed by several people: Afterwards, according to those commands which I had received from your Majesty, I told him, that since you understood the Princesse your Daughter was within his dominions, you had sent me unto him to demand her: I thought (said he unto me very fiercely) you were come to sollicite me about the payment of that Tribute, which I paid unto Astyages, but will not pay unto Ciaxares, since I never promised it: But as for the Princesse Mandana, she is not in my power, and though she were, questionlesse I would not restore her, but would keep her for a hostage, until by an authentique Treaty, your Master would acknowledge, that the Kings of Armenia, are not Tributary Kings. Sir, (said I unto him) consider well what you say, before you dismissee me: for the King my Master knows most certainly that the Princesse is in your dominions: I will cause her to be searched for, said he unto me, and she shall be treated according to her quality; but if she be here, I tell you once again, that I will not send her unto the King of Medes, until he has quitted his pretensions unto any Tribute out of Armenia: Let him be contented, (said he unto me) that fortune has given him such a man as has made him so full of conquests; and let that comfort him for the losse of a poor Tribute. Sir, (said I unto him) if you give me no other answer but that, I have orders to tell you, that the King my Master, will come himself with an Army of an hundred thousand men and fetch the Prin|cesse his daughter: Go then speedily (said he unto me) and bid him prepare himself; and tell him, there are no such valiantsouldiers in the world as those who fight for their liberties: and that since Artamenes is in prison (as I understand he is) the Prince Tigranes my son will not make any great difficulty of it to fight him; and perhaps victories will not come so cheap unto him as they have done. Megabises did know very well that there was no great prudence in speaking thus unto Ciaxares, before so many people; nor to tell so precisely what the King of Armenia said concerning Artamenes: But thinking that perhaps it would be advantageous unto him, he resolved to do so: Then he ended his relation, by telling, that after he went out from the King of Armenia, they brought him commands to be gone out of Artaxates the next morning, and that they guarded him unto the utmost frontiers of Armenia. Ciaxares hearing the answer of this Prince, was in a high and chollick passion; and presently resolved upon war: No, no, said he, I make no question but Mandana is in Armenia; she her self has writ it, and Martesia confirms it; also the answer Page 195 of this audacious Prince do tell it plainly: But yet (said the King of Phrygia unto Megabises) were you not enforced by any whether there were any forraign Princesse arrived at that Court? Yes Sir, said he, for I heard, that there came once some women, whose quality every one was ignorant of; and that they were sent unto a Castle, towards the Countrey of the Chaldeans, but stayed not at Artaxates. No, no, (said Ciaxares once again) there needs no more information; Mandana is in Armenia, and I must carry the war thither. And by consequence (said the King of Phrygia, with as much generosity as boldnesse) we must have Artamenes out of prison; for Sir, if your souldiers do not see him in the head of them, but that he should be left at Sinope, they will march but very slowly into Armenia, and perhaps not fight as they used to do, when they come there: also (added the King of Hircania) I cannot believe there is any better way to move the gods to become propitious, then to protect that man whom they have so much favoured. These two Princes were not the only persons who spoke thus, for every one in the chamber said the same. It seemed that the present necessity did work upon his former resolutions; and he did not so obstinately design to presse out what the intelligence was which Artamenes held with the King of Assyria; insomuch as there seemed to be great hopes of his speedy freedome. The King of Medes did suffer them to commend him in his presence without any anger, he did not reject their prayers in his behalf, and without any direct consenting, he made as if there were some resolutions in him of altering his opinion, but carried it as if himself would have the advantage of doing it, and not as forced unto it by any other. These resentments being perceived by all the illustrious company, they spoke no more unto him concerning Artamenes, fearing to prejudice him, whom all the world would advantage. Yet they went from the King in great hopes of his liberty, so that presently a general voice went about all the Town and Camp, that Artamenes was to be set at liberty: Artamenes himself was told as much for certain: His guards all wept for joy, Andramias could not hold from hoping to see him presently in the same condition he was formerly; Martesia was so transported, that she could not expresse her raptures of joy: Chrisantes and Feraulas were so glad of it, that Artamenes himself could be no more; for in consideration of the Princesse, and the state she was in, he prised his liberty as the greatest good which could befall him. Well, (said he in himself) I may once again hope to do Divine Mandana some service; Oh heavens! could I ever believe to be in such a state as either to deliver my Princesse or to die in her service? Can I flatter my self with such a pleasing thought, as both to see and be seen by her? Is it possible I should ever have the liberty to discourse with her of my most adoring passion? If this be so, why should I complain of those hardships I have endured? since I shall receive so ample a recompence: Thus did Artamenes entertain himself, whilst all the Town and Camp was rejoycing by reason of their hopes of his liberty; and to give him an addition of joy, Feraulas came into his chamber, and confirmed the news, telling him that it was not without ground; and falling into discourse concerning Mandana, he repeated almost all that Martesia told unto Chrisantes and himself: at the last, remembering himself how they had told him that when Martesia was on the banks of the River Halis, amongst the fishermen she made use of a box which had a picture in it, to bring her unto Sinope, and that the picture was Mandana's: Ha Feraulas, said he unto him, is there no means, by vertue of that credit which I know you have with Martesia, to move her unto so much favour as to send me that picture, with a promise to restore it unto her, if she please, the same day I come out prison? Sir, said he unto him, I do not think Martesia will deny it upon that condition: but as for giving it absolutely unto you, I think that her fears to displease the Princesse (who as you know is of such a nice vertue, as that she will scruple at the smallest things) will not permit it: also she her self is so much enamoured with it, that it would be a piece of great difficulty to obtain it from her for ever; but yet for a certain time doubtlesse she would not refuse it: Artamenes then engaged Feraulas to use his best endeavours; and Feraulas charged with this commission, left him, and left him with more joy then he had a long time found in his heart. Ciaxares for his part, was secretly pleased in himself to be overcome, and as it were constrained to free Artamenes; yet sometimes he would be very angry that he could not exactly know what that intelligence was which he could not discover: But after all, the high merits of Artamenes, the great acts he had done: the many obligations unto him; the present necessity of his valour; all these were to prevalent in his mind, that he resolved to set Artamenes at liberty, the same day he was to march with his Army towards Armenia. But whilst he was in so advantageous a resolution for himself, and so beneficial Page 196 for his daughter; so pleasing unto the famous prisoner, and so generall a joy unto all Asia, especially such as had interest themselves in his fortune, Metrobates only, that close enemy of Artamenes, and that old friend unto Aribeus, was in extream sorrows. This man had a soul so ambitious, that he valued not by what stairs he ascended unto greatness, so he could but get up. There hapened many passages in his transactions, which moved Artamenes whilst he was in the height of his fortune, not to esteem him; & by consequence not to doe such good offices as he did unto all others: For Artamenes, thought it a piece of great injustice unto unfortunate men of honour, to load with benefits those who deserved them not, whilst others more meritorious were in misery. Moreover, Metrobates being linked unto the fortunes of Aribeus, had ever followed his principles: and Artamenes destroying him just at that time when Metrobates was in highest hopes to receive recompence for all the services he had done him, this man therefore was so much incensed against Artamenes, that he would enterprise any thing which might conduce unto his ruine. Chrisantes and Feraulas were informed of his bad intentions, but since he did not openly transact against their master, and since they could not devise what ill office he was able to do him, they had not recourse unto any violent wayes to defeat him; as well because they were both wise and virtuous, as because it might be prejudiciall unto Artamenes: neither could they handsomly discover his designs; for the party who informed them of the ill will of Metrobates, dyed a little after with sorrow that he had been the cause of Artamenes his imprisonment: moreover, as the state of things then stood, they had no ground to believe any thing could obstruct his liberty, since it was demanded by a great Army, and by three whole kingdomes. But on the contrary, it was almost an infallible certainty, that a man who was equally beloved both of vanquished and Vanquishers would be set at liberty, and that none durst shew their hatred, no not Metrobates himself. As he was burning in his secret envie at the universall joy which all the world expressed for the freedome of Artamenes, He received intelligence from Artaxes who was commander in chief at Pteria, and who understood that Ortalques had been to tell the King of Assyria something, though he could not exactly tell what; but it was in all probability Artamenes who sent him, for he knew him to be his servant, and that he had brought orders from the King, when he was in Bythinia: he whom Artaxes sent unto Metrobates, was commanded not to go into Sinope, lest he should be stopped, but to send some unsuspected messenger to bid meet at the Temple of Mars: Metrobates, having received this notice, failed not to go thither: and he no sooner understood from the confident of Artaxes of Ortalques his voyage unto Pteria, but he began to conceive some hopes of disturbing the publique joy: But since he had many things to talk of with this man, and fearing to be seen in his company, at a place so much frequented as a Temple, they went to walk by the Sea-side, and just in the same place where Artamenes had heretofore been, when he found the signes of the Princesse her shipwreck: and being come close unto the Cabin where the Prince Mazares had been carried, and where they told Artamenes he died. When he was there, he desired to find out some pretence to rest himself, to the end he might write unto Artaxes: having Ink and Paper in his Pocket, for that purpose. But as chance sometimes works wonders, the fishers who dwelt in that Cabin, and who were very affectionate unto Artamenes, though he had been but a little while amongst them, seeing such a man as Metrobates amongst them, took the liberty to ask, whether Artamenes was going to be set at liberty, as the reports of the town went and as they wished it? Metrobates was surprised to heare Artamenes named in a place where he thought there was none who had any interest in his fortune; he asked them, whether they knew him whom they seemed to love so well? and they answered, that they had the honour to see him in this Cabin; and told him, how he found Mazares there when he was dying; and the better to circumstance their tale, they told him in their manner, how that Prince spoke unto him concerning the Princesse Mandana, and gave him a Scarf, also said thus unto him. Is it you, whom the affection of a great Princesse, has made you the most happy man, and whom I have made the most unfortunate, by depriving you of one who loved you so well? Though they did not directly relate the same words which Mazares used, yet they used others, which made the matter worse, thinking it more advantageous for Artamenes, by relating how the Princesse loved him well, since the Prince Mazares as he was dying, said it: But said they further, certainly Artamenes does love her also, for he put a hundred questions unto the dying Prince, and when he was told that in all likelihood she was dead, he went out of this Cabin so furiously and desperate, as Page 197 never was man; and taking a scarf with him which the other had given him, he went unto the Se-aside, as if he would have thrown himself into it: Metrobates who had his comment upon every word these poor honest men related, began to suspect that Artamenes was in love with Mandana, and that this secret which was between the King of Assyria and him, was a secret of Love and Jealousie together. So seeming to like of the peoples affection unto Artamenes, and telling these fishers, that he would ere long be at liberty, he went out of the Cabin, and taking his leave of Artaxes his friend, returned to Sinope, well satisfied with his voyage: As he passed by the house of Artucas, he accidentally saw Feraulas and Chrisantes come out, who had been to visit Martesia; and to afford him more matter, to prejudice Artamenes, one of Metrobates his domesticks was brother unto a boy which served Artucas: so that when he saw Feraulas and Chrisantes come out of this house, he desired to know whether they frequented it very often; and to that end he employed the ingenuity of his servant, to discover by the means of his brother, to find out whether it was to Artucas or to Martesia that they went. This boy was very young, and his brother used both cunning, and gifts, and threatnings unto him to make him discover the truth: and though his master had forbidden him to tell that Martesia was two or three dayes in Sinope before it was publicly known, yet he told unto his brother, and promised to tell him all he knew concerning the visits of Feraulas and Chrisantes: so that he understood by this boy his brother, that whilst Martesia was concealed in the house of Artucas, they did both of them visit her: and that ever since she came thither Feraulas did visit her every day, also Chrisantes, very often. There did need no more to satisfie such a mistrusting minde as that of Metrobates: and when he called to memory a hundred passages which he regarded not before, he did no longer doubt but that Artamenes was in love with the Princesse, and that the Princesse knew it, or at least suspected it: He being thus furnished with such strong arguments to ruine Artamenes, he went unto the Kings bed-side, who treated him very kindly; for this Prince knowing how Arieus loved him, thought that since Metrobates was not engaged on his side, it was an infallible signe of his fidelity, not imagining how this man remained here as a spie for Arieus. Metrobates then being in the night with the King, when none could disturbe the freedome of speaking, he thought to effect his designe. Yet notwithstanding, he would not begin to speak concerning Artamenes: but stayed a while in hopes the King, whose minde was taken up with nothing but the Armenian war, with the Princesse her captivity, and with the liberty of Artamenes, would speak something which might give him an occasion to execute his designe, without making any affectation appear in his discourse: at last Ciaxares gave him such an opportunity, as he desired; Metrobates, (said he unto him) are you of the opinion with the rest, that Artamenes will serve me with as much zeale and fidelity, as he hath heretofore? Is it not to be feared that his great soul will not suffer him to forget his prison? I believe Sir (replied, Metrobates) that Artamenes will forget all, and remember all to deliver the Princesse Mandana: but yet (said the King unto him) Is it not possible to ghesse what this secret is, which I must ask no more, since I am resolved to set him at liberty who will not reveale it unto me? Sir, (replied Metrobates) If I durst tell your Majesty my thoughts, perhaps I should absolutely undeceive you in your opinion, that Artamenes will not serve you for the future as well as heretofore: for since it was my self who was the cause of his imprisonment, because from my hand you received that letter which the King of Assyria writ; so I think my self in some sort obliged to tell you something which I know will conduce unto his advantage, as well as I told you that which conduced unto his prejudice: when the King heard him speak in that manner, he pressed him extreemly to explaine himself: and Metrobates making himself very ingenious and sincere, told how an accident drove him into the fishers Cabin, to write a letter in behalf of one of his friends which by chance he met withall, and related unto him how those fishers told him that Artamenes was passionately in love with the Princesse: he did so aggravate the despair which Artamenes was in when he heard the Princesse was dead, that he did fully possess the Kings minde with the knowledge of what he desired to know: It seems Metrobates (said he unto him) by your discourse that Artamenes is in love with my daughter: Sir (said he) I do confess it is in that, which I would do Artamenes service; and I dare assure your Majesty, that since he has such a noble passion in his soul, he will forget his prison, and be more valiant and faithfull then ever he was; for Sir, (said he in such a manner as if he had no ill intentions towards him) the love of Artamenes will do the virtue of Mandana no wrong: Beauty upon a Throne is like Page 198 the sun in heaven, every one has liberty to behold it; and as glorious light does not impair it rayes, although it shine not alwaies upon flowers: so the beauty of the Princesse, although it captivate others besides Kings, is not to be blamed. In the mean time, this subtle poyson which Metrobates had infused into the Kings minde, did afterwards operate in his heart; and caused him to remember some light suspitions which he had of Artamenes his love, when he first put him in prison; he would have Metrobates repeat over what the fishers had told him; but Metrobates feigning as if he had not well enough remembred; nor sufficiently harkened unto them, to assure himself that all he had said was positively true, therefore he offered to go againe the next morning and more exactly informe himself. The King whose minde was much troubled, commanded him not to faile, but endeavour to discover all that ever he could concerning such an important business as that. Metrobates seemed to be very sorry, for those vexations he had put into the Kings minde, and told him, he would use his best endeavours to learn out any thing, that might make his soul to enjoy its rest. In the mean while Ciaxares was extreemly troubled; for when he remembred himself, that Artamenes, never asked for his liberty since he was imprisoned, untill such time as he knew the Princesse was living, therefore he made that a ground of his suspicion, and thought he was in love with her. Moreover he remembred his extreame violent sorrowes when he returned unto Themiscira, and related how he had relieved the King of Assyria, and facilitated the carrying away of the Princesse Mandana: he called to minde that excessive sorrow he saw in his eyes, when he was returned unto Sinope, and acquainted him with the shipwrack of the Princesse: He passed over that night with such restless imaginations, and expected Metrobates most impatiently, who seeming as if he had been to enforce himself better in such things as the King desired to know, returned and went unto the Kings Closet, where the King as soon as he was drest, did use to be. As soon as the King saw him, he turned towards him and said: well Metrobates, what more can you informe me of? must Artamenes be set at liberty, or must I keep him closer? Metrobates then seemed very sad, and seemed as if he knew much more then he durst speak; Sir said he unto him: I beg your pardon, since it is my destiny to bring none but ill news alwaies unto your Majestie. Such crimes as these (replied Ciaxares) rather deserve recompence, then either pardon or punishment: for commonly, Kings never hear of such things as are unpleasant unto them but from those who are his most faithful servants. Metrobates grew more bold upon the Kings answer, and told him, how it appeared by that discourse which Mazares made of Artamenes, that he not only loved her, but also the Princesse loved him againe: Then he repeated word for word all that the fishers told him: How, (cried out Ciaxares) could my daughter know of the fond passion of Artamenes, and endure it? If she can Metrobates, my best course were to let her remain still in the hands of the King of Armenia: for if she be of so slavish a soul, she cannot be better then in the prison of my enemy. Sir, (said he unto him) I beseech your Majesty be not so much transported: the affection of the Princesse is not perhaps so much to be blamed, for Artamenes is furnished with such high qualities, that although his condition seemes to be but mean, since he will not tell us what it is, yet the Princesse is excusable, though she should be something indulgent towards him: No, no, Metrobates (said the King) you do not speak as you think; Such as my daughter ought to receive only testimonies of respects from such as Artamenes; and ought to reject the least suspicion of any love, and banish it from them for ever. That which does most puzzle me (said the King) is that I have imprisoned both Artamenes and Araspes; because finding a correspondencie between the King of Assyria and Artamenes I supposed that Araspes helped the King to escape: But if Artamenes be in love, is it credible he should set his Rival at liberty? and since it is so that he did not set him at liberty: what can this secret intelligence be which moved him to write, as he hath unto him: indeed Metrobates, I know not how to expound this Riddle: if I look upon the King of Assyria's letter, I finde that Artamenes is ambitious, and has treated with my enemy: if I harken unto the discourse of Mazares, I finde Artamenes is a rash man, and my daughter has lost her wits, what should I think of these things? and how shall I transact? Mandana is a captive in Armenia, and Artamenes is a prisoner in Sinope; I am talking of giving him that is here his liberty; and intending to send an Army to deliver the other in Armenia: Yet if it be so, that Artamenes is in love, and that Mandana knows it, and suffers it; I must then ruine Artamenes, and forsake Mandana. But in doing so, I must dishonour my Daughter in the eyes of all Asia, and also dishonour my self. Sir (replied then Page 199 the wicked Metrobates) I hope your Majesty will never come to that, for if it should appear, (as I think it will not) that Artamenes is so much in fault, as shall move you to ruine him, you will not want other specious pretences to cloak it, and never bring the Princesse upon the Stage. But Sir (added he) I think it not expedient, your Majesty should so soon release Artamenes; but endeavour first to make matters more clear then yet they are; for me thinks these Sicilian Troops which are come hither, and which Philoxypes sent unto Artamenes to be presented unto you, are to be a little suspected; there being already some of Cyprus Troops in your Army, which had never been in it but by his means: And truly, if you remember it, the Prince Artibies spoke unto your Majesty after an odde manner: And Megabises also at his returne from Armenia, told such things unto you, as makes me conjecture, that there is some close designe, which must not be ripe untill Artamenes be at liberty. Who can tell Sir, whether all that is reported in Armenia, concerning the Princesse be true? The friends of Artamenes do perhaps retain her by force in some place; and there is something in it which deserves to be made more cleer before Artamenes be set free: And if your Majesty will appoint me, I shall use my best endeavours to make a more exact discovery. The King, whose soul was highly incensed, did command to do it accordingly: and because he would not seem to be moved with the counsels of Metrobates, who feared lest his designe should be prevented, he would see no body that day, but caused it to be given out, he was not well: Mean while, Metrobates resolved to return at night, and tell the King all he knew concerning the journey of Ortalques unto Pteria; and how Martesia was three dayes concealed in the house of Artucas, before she would appear at Court: Also how Chrisantes and Feraulas did frequently visit her all the while. But Metrobates was more happy in his project then he thought to be: for the young Boy who was with Artucas, told his brother, who served Metrobates, that it was not above two hours since Feraulas was with Martesia, who was in private with him in her Closet: Their discourse together was long, and the name of Artamenes and Mandana was much used between them; that she opened a Box, and gave him something, which he beleaved to be a Letter: That Feraulas after this went out, and as he departed from her said, he would immediately carry that which she had given him, unto that party who expected him with much impatience. This Boy said further, that he went out after Feraulas, and followed him to the Castle, and afterwards unto the Chamber where Artamenes was kept prisoner. Metrobates having met with this intelligence, went unto the King with as much Melancholy in his face, as he had joy in his heart: As soon as he was entred into his Chamber, and saw none with him, Sir, said he unto him, I am forced to acquaint you, that without all question there is some considerable matter in it which must be discovered: for indeed (said he) I am certainly informed by a friend which I have in Pteria, that since Artamenes was a prisoner, Ortalques who brought the news of the Princesse being living, hath been from Artamenes with the King of Assyria, who since is gone from thence, and none knows where he is: Also I understand further, by one of Artucas his Domesticks, that Martesia was three dayes in his house before she saw your Majesty: she, I say, who had no more to tell you, but that the Princesse Mandana was not dead: I know she sent a Letter unto Artamenes, and that there passeth not a day, but Feraulas doth visit her: Moreover I observe, that Chrisantes and he are continually going from one place to another: sometimes to the King of Phrygia; sometimes unto the King of Hircania; sometimes to Hidaspes, Timocrates, Gadates, Gobrias, and others. Then Sir, all these Princes, are great admirers of Artamenes and his valour, and are apt to undertake any thing in his behalf. But (said Ciaxares then unto him) what course should I undertake to be more fully satisfied of these things, which I hardly need to make any doubt of? Sir, (said Metrobates unto him) I beleieve your Majesty would discover all, if Ortalques were arrested and brought to render an account of his voyage unto the King of Assyria: and if the Cabinet of Artamenes were searched, who since he is in hopes of liberty, will doubtlesse keep the Letter which Martesia sent unto him: It would not be amisse if Artucas, Martesia, Feraulas, and Chrisantes were secured: Moreover (added he) since certainly the quality and birth of Artamenes is very mean, I would have these men compelled to declare it: for the knowledge of it would produce three consequences: It would aggravate his crime against the Princesse: his ingratitude to you more odious: and would perhaps banish him out of the minde of Mandana, if it be true, as in all likelihood it is, that her heart is full of affection unto Artamenes. The minde of Ciaxares was so sharp upon this advice, as he never considered how dangerous the designe was: but on the contrary, Page 200 he beleev'd that if he should let all these Kings and Princes understand that Artamenes was a Traytor, a man of a mean and despicable birth, and had absolutely failed in those respects which he ought unto the Princesse his Daughter, they would all deny him any protection, and would with the first give counsell to destroy him: not but that he was much put to it, whom he should chuse for executioners of his Orders: But as Metrobates was as bold as wicked, he offer'd himself, so his majesty would give him power, to act what he had advis'd unto. Ciaxares was a long while before he could resolve with himself; but at last, he thought the first businesse would be to search the Cabinet of Artamenes, and to that effect, he sent Orders unto Andramias, by Metrobates, to be assistant. Metrobates went then to Andramias, whom he did not finde with Artamenes: But since great liberty was now allowed to visit this famous prisoner, Arbaces Lieutenant of the Guards under Andramias suffer'd him to enter with twelve of the Kings Guard which followed him, for the King commanded him to make use of force, if a bare command would not do it. As he enter'd into the Chamber, he saw Artamenes locking his Cabinet very hastily because of the noise he heard. Sir, said he, going unto him, The King has Commanded me to bring this Cabinet unto him, and I beseech you be pleas'd to permit me to yeeld obedience unto him. Metrobates (said Artamenes unto him, and standing between the Table and him) cannot easily perswade me that the King has given him any such Commission, and therefore since I think he acts without his Orders, I will endeavour to hinder him from satisfying his particular curiosity. Sir, (said Metrobates unto him, and calling in the Guards, who were in the outer Chamber) I am able to yeeld obedience unto the King, therefore do not force me to use any violence upon you. Artamenes was so desperate at this accident, that he knew not what was best for him to do. It was in vain to resist; and to let him carry away the Cabinet, in which was a businesse of that import, he could not resolve, therefore turning towards the Table to open it. Then, suffer me (said he) to take that out, which is none of my own, before I give it you. But Metrobates having seized upon the Cabinet, commanding the Guards to keep off Artamenes; they were in a minde not to obey him: Yet when Metrobates threaten'd them, that the King would punish them, they hindred Artamenes from taking the Cabinet out of his hands: and Metrobates carried it away, the Guards following him. He came then with all speed unto the Kings Chamber, commanding Arbaces to let none enter unto Artamenes untill new Orders: but as he went he was not without his conceits; for indeed he did not directly know what it was which Martesia had sent unto Artamenes, and he was fearfull it would not prove a businesse so criminal as he wish'd it: Yet since he could not imagine what innocent intelligence there could be between them, he went to Ciaxares with much boldnesse, and also much hopes; the resistance of Artamenes seeming unto him to be an infallible mark, that there was something in that Cabinet which would make against him: He did therefore very much aggravate the despair of this Illustrious Prisoner; and breaking open the Cabinet which was not full, because, Mandana's scarf remained upon the Table, when Artamenes did shut it, upon the entrance of Metrobates; then they began to look what was within it; and there was found some jewels and perfumes, one of Homers Iliads rich bound up; likewise the Lawes of Lycurgus and Solon; the Comedy of Thespis, some Verses of Sappho, and Enina's composing; certain Enigmaes of the Princesse Cleobuline; some small Geographical papers; the modell of Babylon; the description and encampment of Ciaxares his Army before that Town; some Songs of the famous Arion, and many other such things: All this while Metrobates despair'd of finding any thing against Artamenes, and Ciaxares was very glad of it: but at the last, finding a little golden enamel'd Box, Ciaxares saw that the Picture of Mandana was within it, about which this Devise was written in the Cappadocian Language. I am better in your Heart.

This picture was made for a Princesse of Cappadocia, whom Mandana loved very well and who loved her most tenderly again: So that this Princesse dying before she had this picture, Mandana gave it to Martesia, who desired it of her. But alas, how extreamly was Ciaxares surpris'd to find it there! and how joy'd Metrobates, to see himself happier then ever he hop'd for: The Kings mind was so much troubled, that he neither knew what he did, nor what he saw, He read this harmlesse Motto which he thought to be so criminal; and afterwards cried out, who could have thought that ever Mandana would have spoke such a word unto Artamenes? How could that severe vertue which she seem'd to Page 201 own, suffer her to imagine such a piece of gallantry as this, in favour of a simple Cavalier, who wanders about the world, and none knows what he is? Ha, since it is so, as it is but too true, Mandana has some further designs: Perhaps she is hid in the house of Artucas, where she staid only untill Artamenes be at liberty; and then when he has got himself in the head of all those forces which are of his intelligence, he will take my Crown from me, and subvert my Throne. No, no, (said he unto Metrobates, and throwing the picture into the Cabinet again) we must lose no time; the guards of Artamenes must be changed: Chrisantes, Feraulas, Artucas, Ortaques, Martesia, and Andramias also must be secur'd, for I suspect him also. Sir, (said Metrobates) I know very well that this design is something dangerous to execute, yet I humbly offer my self and will adventure it, so I may have your Majesties Guard to assist me: then I believe the respect which all people owe unto you, will keep them from opposing your will: So that except Andramias and Artucas who are men of rank, and Martesia who is a woman of quality, all the rest are considerable; as for Chrisantes and Feraulas they are strangers, and doubtlesse are no more to be fear'd then their Master: and I am sure there is no danger in securing Ortaques. The King then recalling into his mind the discourses of Mazares unto Artamenes; and the journey of Ortaques unto the King of Assyria: the secret carriage of Martesia with Artucas: the frequent visits of Feraulas and Chrisantes: the picture of Mandana in the hands of Artamenes; and such a passionate Motto, too gallant for a Lady which made profession of so much vertue, he thought questionlesse to discover some great crime; and question'd no further but Artamenes was in love, and that Mandana allow'd of it: In conclusion, being transported with anger, he caus'd Metrobates to take fifty of his Guard, to execute his pleasure before the passages in Artamenes Chamber was nois'd abroad. Andramias coming into the Castle as Metrobates was going out, he was easily arrest'd, as well as Ortaques who was with him: From thence going to take Artucas, he found Chrisantes and Martesia there, and took them three; conducting Martesia and a woman to wait upon her in a Coach unto the Castle, but carrying Chrisantes and Artucas on foot; afterwards, he went to look for Feraulas, but could not find him; for hearing by good fortune, that Metrobates had been in his Masters Chamber with a Guard, he was gone unto Hidaspes to acquaint him, where he found the King of Phrygia: Presently after he was come thither, they heard of Andramias his arrest; and also how Ortaques, Martesia, Chrisantes, and Artucas, were imprison'd in the Castle: and that Artamenes was kept more close then ever. So that hearing of all these passages at one time, and knowing that Metrobates had been to seek for Feraulas; the King of Phrygia would not have him stir out of the house of Hidaspes, because he might be much more serviceable unto his Master then if he were in prison. This Prince having sent in all haste to acquaint all the famous friends of Artamenes with it: they all went unto the King as fast as ever they could to know the cause of this sudden change. The King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, Persodes, Thra'sibulus, the Prince of Paphlagonia, the Prince of Licaonia, Ariobantes, Gadates, Artibies, Hidaspes, Adusius, Aglatidas, Gobrias, Madates, Artabases, Leontidas, Megabises, Thimo'crates, Philocles, and many others, came thither; but it was told them, they could not see the King: Yet notwithstanding since they feared lest he should fall upon some violent resolution, they press'd so much, that at the last he commanded the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircania only should enter, where they found him extreamly sad. Sir, (said the King of Phrygia unto him) we are come hither to know whether your Majesty has any need of us: Yes, (answered the King in great rage) I do not think you will any longer protect and defend such an ungrateful, rash, and ambitious man as Artamenes; Who came into my Court, with no intent but to dishonour me: and assumes so much boldnesse, as to fix his eyes upon my Daughter: All her Ravishers are lesse worthy of my hate then he, since in taking her away, they have done nothing which is unworthy of her: But this insolent fellow, in ravishing away her heart, has done her an irreparable wrong, and mortally offend'd me. The King of Assyria, although he was a stranger unto her, and an enemy to the Medes, is yet a great King: The King of Pontus, although he hath lost both his Kingdoms, yet he retains the Quality of a King: The Prince Mazares was Royally born, and lived in expectation of a Crown: But as for Artamenes, do doubtlesse he was born in a prison; his Parents were some slaves, else he would not hide his condition from us as he doth. Sir, replied the King of Phrygia, Artamenes has performed such Martiall Actions in War, as me thinks sufficiently denotes the contrary to what you say. Artamenes (replied Ciaxares) has committed such a Crime in stealing away my Daughters heart, that I will never pardon Page 202 him; for he saw I deny'd her unto the King of Pontus, who had then two Crowns: He saw, that I Arm'd above a hundred thousand men, to fetch her out of the power of one of the greatest Kings in all Asia; and yet he presumes to bear such an assestion unto her, as cannot be innocent; For if he do not design to marry her, then his aims are to defame her: and if his presumptuous thoughts do aim at marrying her, then his design is to set a slave upon the Throne of Medea, and doubtlesse to depose me hereafter, since it is not possible he can ever hope that I should consent unto his design: The truth is he has such unjust, so strange, and guilty thoughts, that death is too small a punishment for them, and him that owns them: yet Sir, (replied the King of Hircania) what new matter have you against him, since you were once in a mind to acquit him? A hundred things (answered Ciaxares) which makes me think of nothing but his ruine. Sir, (replied the King of Phrygia) such a resolution as that ought not to be tumultuously undertaken; and though Artamenes were culpable (as I believe him innocent) yet he hath so gain'd the hearts of the souldiers, that it is much to be fear'd, that if you should ruine him, it would make a great disorder in your Camp: Not at all (replied the King) for when I shall fully know the baseness of his birth, as doubtlesse I will know it, since know it, since I have Chrisantes in my power; and when I have published unto the world by a Declaration, that a common souldier of fortune, and perhaps something worse, is so audacious as to think upon the daughter of a King, and to take away his Crown; I believe there will be none so unjust as to oppose me in punishing such a one: For truly, it is most strange that such a man as Artamenes should be so insolent as to dare so much as to look upon my daughter: My daughter, I say, who hitherto has appear'd as wise and prudent, as any in the world: But Martesia shall tell me, by what charms she lost her reason, and by what enchantments Artamenes made her forget her duty both unto her self and me. But Sir, (replied the King of Phrygia) you did accuse Artamenes for holding intelligence with the King of Assyria as a lover of your daughter, and now you accuse him for loving her himself; how can you reconcile these two things which seem so directly contrary? I know not (replied Ciaxares) but the rigour of punishment, and fear of death, will doubtlesse make Chrisantes, Ortaques, and Artamenes himself, confesse that I yet know not: But Sir, (said the King of Hircania) what convincing reasons have you for it? I have a hundred, I tell you (replied Ciaxares) all which do plainly let me see that Artamenes does hold intelligence with my enemy and with my daughter, and that my daughter hates not him; there needs no more to move me to pronounce sentence of death against a man whom I so much loved, although he was of so hase an extract. But Sir, replied the King of Phrygia, what if he should prove the son of a great King? he would have told it long since, replied Ciaxares, if he had been such a one: but certainly he is only a forward ambitious man whom fortune favours, and whom the simplicity of my daughter has made both happy and culpable; and when I am fully inform'd in all the circumstances of his crime, out of his own mouth, and by the confession of Martesia, Chrisantes, and Andramias, whom I suspect to be too much his friend: when I shall know, I say, by Artucas, Ortaques, Araspes, and by Feraulas, if I can catch him, all that love and ambition did prompt this secret enemy unto, then I will call you all to be witnesses of his condemnation. Sir, (said the King of Phrygia unto him) I do most humbly beseech your Majesty, not to condemn him upon surmises, & appearances he is perhaps one whom you do not know how great he is; and that affection which he has unto the Princesse, also the intelligence he hath held with the King of Assyria, are not so criminal as you suppose them: afterwards, the King of Hircania added; I dare tell your Majesty thus much, that those services which Artamenes has done you, deserves a pardon for greater crimes then these: It is true, (replied Ciaxares) and truly I was resolv'd to pardon him for holding intelligence with my enemy: but that such a man as he should have any attempts upon my daughter, I shall never pardon that. These Princes seeing Ciaxares so incens'd, would not urge him any further at that time; they only intreated him to examin the businesse very well, and not to condemn him but upon convincing proofs; as, that he was absolutely of a guilty correspondency with the King of Assyria; that he had plotted some unjust design with the Princesse Mandana; and that he should prove no more then a vile slave (as he suppos'd him) or a common Cavalier: after this they left him, intending to advise altogether what was most expedient to be done: As they went out of the Kings Closet, all they who were in the chamber gathered about them, to know how squares went; seeming by their discourse and actions, that they were ready to undertake any thing in behalf of Artamenes; but those Kings, being unwilling to enform them of any thing in that Page 203 place, went unto Hidaspes, whither they were wait'd upon by all this multitude of brave men which this great alteration brought unto the King. They were no sooner there, but Feraulas who there expected them, desiring to speak a word in private unto the King of Phrygia, told him, that since he went out, he understood that Metrobates had taken the Cabinet of Artamenes from him, and carried it unto the King; he told him further, how certainly he would find Mandana's picture in it, which was never made for him; and that Mandana did not give it unto him, as it would be easily proved; and that Martesia did lend it unto him that same day: But though it was an easie matter to justifie the Princesse concerning this picture, yet there was no pretence to colour the love which Artamenes bore unto Mandana, which seemed to be the cause why he desired to have this picture in his prison. In conclusion, since all those who were with Hidaspes, were all of them friends unto Artamenes, this Prince said unto those who were not acquainted with his story, that he would engage his word unto them, Artamenes was the most faithful servant Cixares ever had; and that it would be a piece of good service unto the King of Medes, to hinder him for acting such a piece of great injustice: That moreover it was easie to be seen how Metrobates the old friend of Aribeus, was employed in this businesse; and that it was to be feared, this revengeful man, did much incense the King: That in the mean time it is expedient to keep the souldiers still in their good opinion of Artamenes and his innocency; and to that end it were requisite for every one to go immediately and give out all necessary orders in the Camp accordingly: and most of that illustrious company went in all haste to divulge the report of a new piece of injustice which had been due unto the famous and innocent prisoner; and none remained there but such as knew the story and life of Artamenes; To wit, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, Persodes, Thrasibulus, Hidaspes, Arusius, and Feraulas, and then they consulted what was most expedient to be done in such a disastrous businesse: They all imagined that Chrisantes would never speak a word, neither concerning his Masters love, nor his birth, what torments soever they put upon him: but they imagined also, that the more he denied to tell who Artamenes was, they more apt would the King be to believe, that his condition was base, and also thought him more criminal: They had some fears of Ortalques, lest he should confesse something which might prejudice; for Feraulas understood from Artamenes, what his businesse was at Pteria: They apprehended also that Martesia, out of her fears of death, would discover nothing but the innocent affection of Artamenes unto the Princesse: and being desirous to justifie Mandana, she would never tell who Artamenes really was: In conclusion of all, the apprehended nothing but apparent causes of fear; and so no greater hopes in any thing then force; and they conceived that it was no certain way to save his life neither, since Cixares kept him in the Castle, and might chop off his head before they could be in any condition to relieve him; they resolved then to see how things would go in the morning, and in the mean time to keep themselves in a readinesse to resist all manner of violence, if there should be any need. Feraulas spent that night in continual stirring; he went out of the Town unto the Camp, and there from Tent to Tent, to infuse fresh desires into all the Captains and Souldiers to save the life of Artamenes; and returning unto the Town at break of day, he passed through four or five several places, before he could come at the house of Hidaspes. Never was such a disorder seen; all the inhabitants of Sinope said that they never could nor would suffer such a man as he to perish: The Souldiers both of the Town and Camp, spoke high, and said they would not endure it: The Kings private Guards did but unwillingly obey and if Metrobates had not been very cautious, he would have found himself in a very sad condition: but he had no sooner arrested all these whom by the Kings orders he was to imprison, but he sent in all haste unto Artaxes, to send him a thousand men, ready at the Gates of Sinope, in the beginning of the night, and at the same time he told the King, that he brought them from a Town whereof he was Governour: And Metrobates carried it so, that he caused these rebel Troops to enter into the Town and Castle that night; so that the next morning the friends of Artamenes were amazed, to see all strange faces, and Souldiers they knew not. Mean while, Chrisantes, Ortalques, Artucas, Andramias, Araspes, and Martesia, were to answer Metrobates unto these three questions: The one, who Artamenes was? The other, what was the intelligence which he held with the King of Assyria? And the last, when he began to be in love with Mandana? Chrisantes fearing to prejudice his Master in saying he was Cyrus, and conceiving that he should as much prejudice him, if he left him in the conceipt of his mean original, took therefore the medium betwixt those two extremes, and said, that he was Page 204 descended from the most noble family, but that it was not permitted him to tell any further: & as for the matter of intelligence with the King of Assyria, he said that it was advantageous rather then any thing prejudiciall unto Cixares, but he would speak no further concerning that particular. As for his demeanure towards Mandana, her to him, he said that since she was so much obliged unto him, & was a debtor for the life of her father, & for so many victories which he had obtained for him, it was not at all strange if she did much esteem of him, but for any further, he knew not any thing. Ortalques for his part, he said that he knew nothing of any particulars between the King of Assyria and him, which could be any way obnoxious unto the Kings service; for he knew they were enemies one to another: Andramias could make no answer, but all in the negative, unto all the questions; for indeed, he knew nothing at all concerning them. As for Martesia, she told Metrobates with as much prudence as boldness, that though her mistress had trusted her with any secret, yet would she never discover it, and that since she was placed with the Princesse by the King himself, so she would render an account unto none but him. All this while, Artamenes was unconceivably perplexed. What, said he in himself, shall ever I be the cause that the King does accuse my Princesse? cannot her virtue, her severity, and rigor keep her from their suspicions? but that they will blame her, and perhaps unjustly condemn her? oh most imprudent man that I am, to trust in those hopes they gave me? ought I not rather to have feared the capritious humour of my fortune: which did not promote me but only to throw me down with more precipitation? Alas Mandana, will the King think that you gave me that picture which he saw? and from thence will conceive a hundred false imaginations and all as false as it. Sometimes Artamenes fearing the fury of Cixares towards the Princesse, did rather wish her in the power of a respective Rival as the King of Pontus was, then in the power of a violent and incensed father, as Cixares was: These apprehensions lasted not long, but he repented himself of his former wish; and when he considered that all hopes of his liberty was lost; and that he had caused the misfortunes of so many innocent persons; and how little appearance there was to avoyd them otherwise then by death, he fell into extream despair: his great soul notwithstanding did alwaies endeavour to resist his sorrows: And if it had been only in consideration of himself, he would not have stood in need of all his constancie. All his guards were changed, and those Souldiers which Artaxes had sent were placed about him: so that he received no consolation at all. Since the King was well acquainted with his resolutness, although he once intended to examine him himself, concerning his birth, concerning the correspondency with the King of Assyria, and concerning his love, yet he did alter his opinion, and resolved to use others in the business whom he had in his power: and to that end, he promised them recompenses, he terrified them with most cruell punishments, and began to use them coarsly: But do what Metrobates could, he could not make them alter their answers, neither Chrisantes, nor Martesia, nor Ortalques: for as for the three others, they had nothing at all to say, Artucas did confess his cosen was three dayes in his house, before she she went abroad, but he said, the reason was, because she was not in a condition to be seen, or at the least, she gave him no other reason for it, and though indeed Martesia did desire to see Chrisantes and Feraulas, he could not tell what the business was. Metrobates did not relate their answers unto the King rightly, but on the contrary, did assure him they trembled when they spoke, and often contradicted themselves, and that ere long they would tell all: Mean while, the King would needs see Martesia, although Metrobates opposed it as much as he could: so that this couragious woman was guarded unto him: after she had done all due reverence unto the King, and behaving her self boldly like one that was innocent in the businesse. Martesia, (said he unto her) you are the confident both of Mandana and Artamenes: and I must have the truth from your mouth though I have met with it other wayes. Sir (said she unto him) since I know not any thing which can prejudice those two illustrious persons you name, I shall easily answer you: How Martesia (replied the King very angry) do you not think it prejudiciall unto Mandana, to love Artamenes, as most certainly she does? I think Sir (replied she) that the Princess were one of the most unreasonable women in the world if she did not highly esteem him, and one of the most ungratfull also, if believing him so innocent as he is, she did not acknowledge those services which he has done your Majesty: But Sir, all the thoughts of the Princesse are confined unto these two; she esteems him, and thought her self obliged unto it. But Martesia, replied the King, vertuous Princesses, who only esteem a bare Cavalier such as Artamenes, do not use to bestow their pictures upon him; Oh Sir, cryed Page 241 out Martesia, the Princesse never gave that picture unto Artamenes; if it be found in his hands, it must needs be Feraulas who is a good friend of mine, and unto whom <...> ent it, that shewed it unto him, as a fine peece, for that picture Sir, was never made for me, much less for Artamenes: and if we were at Themiscira, I could easily prove it was made for the Princesse of Pteria who died before she received it. Indeed Martesia, replied the King, this picture is found in the Cabinet of Artamenes, and doubtless, Mandana did send it by you to comfort him in her absence: No Sir, said Martesia, I cannot endure that the Calumnies of wicked men should make you beleve so; I do invoke all those gods whom I adore to witness, that the Princesse does not know that Artamenes hath it, and you would be the most unjust Prince upon earth, if you should accuse the most innocent and the most vertuous Princesse in the world of any such thing. But what were you doing, (replied he) those three dayes which you were with Artucas, before you saw me? Martesia being not well able to answer this last question, changed colour: yet presently assuming her confidence, Sir, (said she unto him) since I was not then in so handsome a condition to appear at Court, I had no disposition that another should acquaint you with what I had to say, therefore I thought that those three days might well be spared, since I knew you were not ignorant how the Princesse was living: But all that while (replied the King) you saw Chrisantes and Feraulas: It is very true (said she) I did so, and <◇> endeavoured to comfort them in their sorrows, and to give them some hopes, that ere long your Majesty would know how innocent their Master was: you might have contented your self (said this violent Prince) with concealing the weakness of your mistress, without justifying such a bold and unthankfull person, as never remembering the baseness of his birth, durst cast his eyes upon my daughter. Sir, replied Martesia, when the King of Assyria was in your Court under the name of Philidaspes, you then thought his condition no greater then that of Artamenes: It is very true, replied the King, but that is no argument to perswade me Artamenes is any other then what I think him to be: yes Sir, replied Martesia, I should rather think Artamenes to be the son of a great King, then the son of a slave, what King, (said Cixares very angrily) can he be son unto? the King of Phrygia hath none? was the King of Hircania ever married? hath the King of Armenia more then two whom all the world knows? Had the King of Arabia ever any? is not the son of the King of Sacas drown'd? or can he be son unto the King of Persia, who as they say was never heard of and whose father yermourns for? Sir, said Martesia (whom the name of Cyrus caused <...> sh) I <...> whose son Artamenes is; but let me tell you; that I am <◇> perswaded th <...> does not know what he is; the King then being transported with Choler <...> se but take part with <...> amous <...> oner, and to <...> Princesse, of <...> and her self <...> I know <...> to <◇> a difference <...> between <...> I can make <...> Martesia and <...> Martesia) you <...> day repent of <...> say <...> being able to scree no <...> Martesia, <◇> her back, and with <...> ly troubled. He might know by her answers, although <◇> denied all, that there was a secret in the business which she would not reveale: The <...> s of Mazares, and Mazares dying were considerable, Mandana's picture was a confirming argument: the concealment of Martesia with Artucas; the frequent visits of <...> aulas, and Chrisantes: Ortalques his voyage unto Pteria, and a hundred circumstances which came into his memory, did most strongly perswade him, that Artamenes was most culpable; and the impossibility to find out his true condition, did the more confirm him in his belief that he was of a base descent, not but that when he considered sometimes whether he would or no how this extraordinary man had saved his life, had got him so many battles, had submitted so many Kings, he could not chuse but wonder at the obscurity of his birth: yet since he could not understand what it was, he concluded, that it was such as he was ashamed to confess: so that passing from this thought unto another: Is Mandana (said he) descended from so many illustrious Kings, and who her self must one day reign over so many people, and such great kingdoms, so weak, as to endure the unjust passion of an unknown man: Ah No, no, I must punish Artamenes for his boldness, and Mandana for her weakness; furthermore, when he saw that Feraulas would not suffer himself to be apprehended, he did imagin that to be an infallible signe of his knowledge of many things: for he knew that Feraulas was of such a couragious spirit, Page 206 as the fear of his life would never make him flee away. In conclusion, the king did suck so much venom out of every imagination, that his minde became so much incensed against Artamenes, as he would not suffer the king of Phrygia to speak any more in the behalf of him. The king of Hircania, was no lesse rudely rejected then he: And seeing so many Princes and men of high Quality about him: How is it possible (said he unto them all) that you should thus importunately presse me, in the behalf of such a man, as you know not who he is? If he would himself say, he were a Subject unto any one of you, I should then with more patience hear you interest your selves in his fortunes. But questionlesse, he is of some such inconsiderable Country, that he is ashamed to own his very Nation; and yet all of you speak for him as if he were the Son of some great king, or as if I should incense all the Kings upon earth by punishing him: But (said he unto them in a mighty fury) either speak no more in his behalf, or let me know your reasons why you should so eagerly interest your selves: For let me tell you this, once for all, and it shall be my ultimate Resolution, that if within two dayes space, Artamenes do not confesse his faults, his life shall pay for it, and satisfie revenge; and afterwards at more leisure all his complices shall follow him. After Ciaxares had thus expressed himself, he went into his Closet, and left all the Kings and Princes extreamly dejected. They all went then unto the house of Hidaspes, because he was most interested in him, and because they were more free and at liberty there then any where else: When they were all there, the King of Phrygia having consulted with the King of Hircania, with Hidaspes, Aducius, Artabases, Thrasibulus, Madates, and Feraulas, they concluded, that since Ciaxares did object against Artamenes, the baseness of his Quality, and thought that his greatest crime, therefore it was requisite to tell him who he was, and try if that way would prevent him from his violent resolutions. They conceived, that since Astyages was dead, Ciaxares perhaps would not so much startle at the Stars, and predictions, of the Magi, as the King his father did: but that when he should know Artamenes was the sonne of a King, his Cosin, and had thirty thousand Persians in his Army, he would perhaps look better about him, before he destroyed him; and that if it should once come to open force, the Souldiers would fight with more fury for the son of a King, then they would have done for an unknown stranger. This resolution was not fixed upon without great Contests, but after the grounds of it were well examined, it was so determined, and they resolved, that after they had given all requisite Orders unto their Regiments, they woul <...> *act the next morning ac<ordingly, and that in the mean time <...> as they could to <◇> al<bout Ciaxares that morning, to <...> esse might <◇> spread, and be <...> onferenc <...> King o <...> were on <...> fore Ci <...> safety <...> and in <...> be said, <...> day. T <...> <...> a, the King of H <...> L <...> nia, <◇> Prince of Paphlagonia, Gobria, <...> Th <...> Philocles, Leontidas, Megabises* Ariobantes, Hidaspes, Adusius, Madates, Art <...> Aglatidas, and a hundred others were there. But their hast was notwithstanding so <...> full, for do what they could it ws impossible for them to see the King t <...> morning <...> would by all means dine that day in private, because he would avoid the soncitations <...> many as were opposite unto his designe. But at last, know that they were all of them ex<treably importunate to speak with him, and were come into his Chamber, he came out of his Closet in a high fury, absolutely resolved upon the death of Artamenes. Presently after according unto the last dayes resolutions, Feraulas came also into the Chamber, and thrusting thorow the pr <...> , to get neer the King, he presented himself before him with as much boldnesse as reverence: Ciaxares being infinitely surprized to see him. What Feraulas (said he unto him) do you fear death so little, that you dare put your self into the power of a Prince, who has caused you to be sought for as a Delinquent? It is not death Sir (an<swered he) that I stand in fear of; but my greatest fear is, lest your Majesty should precipi<tately act a piece of high injustice upon the person of my Master: Therefore I come to tell you that Artamenes is so far from being of any obscure extract, as he is the Son of a great and good King: of what unknown Countrey I pray you, is the Father of Artamenes King? (replied Ciaxares) Ah my friend, this excuse is too grosse, and I cannot believe it, unlesse Page 207 all these Princes confirm what you say; If that be Sir, replied Feraulas, you may very well believe, that Artamenes is the Son of a great King, since there are thirty thousand of his Fathers Subjects in your Army; and all these Kings and Princes who hear me, are able to attest the truth of it: Truth is Sir, Artamenes is Cyrus, sonne to the King of Persia; and Hidaspes, Adusius, and so many famous Persians as you see about you, are all to be one day his Subjects Is Artamenes Cyrus (replied the King of Mades) away, away, it is impossible? Sir, (said Hidaspes) the thing is so true, that nothing upon earth can be more. Yes Sir (pursued Adusius) and we are able to make it most apparent unto you; the report of his shipwrack was most false: and Cyrus was never in any danger of death, but in your Majesties service. You know (said the King of Phrygia) that this is not likely to be an invented businesse; for if it were not true, Hidaspes would not say it. I know (replied Ci<axares, infinitely unquiet, and troubled in his minde) that the thing which you discover unto me, is the way, to hast his ruine; for Artamenes, as he is onely a rash, ingratefull, and a deluding man, and a particular enemy unto Ciaxares, who according to his Clemencie, or Justice, may pardon or punish him: But if it be true, that he is Cyrus, then it is as true that he is the generall enemy of all Asia, and ought to be destroyed: You are all of you as well as I, concerned in this publike interest (said he unto all about him, except Persians) It is your Tyrant who is in prison: one, whom all the Magi say, will subvert all Asia, and become our Master: And if any thing can perswade me, that Artamenes is Cyrus, it is his most prodigious exploits. But Sir, said the king of Hircania, all his prodigious exploits conduce unto your Majesties advantage: All his Combats, Victories, and Conquests, are yours; and he findeth no other share in them but his Fetters. No, (replied Ciaxares) because by the favour of the gods I have prevented him: But, (said he in looking upon Feraulas) does Mandana know he is Cyrus? Sir, replied he, I know nothing concerning the Princesse, further then that I am certain, there is no criminous intelligence between her and my Master, and that his affection towards her, did never cause him to neglect his respects neither to her nor you. The affection which your Master has (replied Ciaxares ve<ry sharply) is onely an unlimited Ambition, and a thought of horrible revenge; he in<tends to punish Ciaxares, for that which Astyages in the behalf of all Asia, did intend to do in his Cradle; but I shall without any scruple at all, do that which he attempted not without much fear; fo <...> have more convincing Arguments inducing me unto it; and also mor< convincing Rea <...> <...> ied the king of Phry<ia) to avert you from it. Cy<rus replied Ciaxa <...> but <...> le to hurt: But Cyr< is <...> l<able fort <...> thing, and to execute what he <...> It <...> l<so a man who attempts <...> execute all <...> Cyrus <...> very true <...> you ser< <...> Ra <...> King in <...> He comes <...> Court, and <...> in a disguise, <...> was to <educ< the minde of my Daughter; Double<se <...> discovered himself unto her; he has infused Ambition into her soul: She looks up< <...> as the Conqueror of all Asia: And without considering, that he cannot make him< <...> Master o <...> unlesse he throw her Father out of his Throne; she hearkens unto him, <...> offers him, she loves him. But thanks be unto the Heavens, I am able to punish them <...> h at once, since if she love Artamenes, as I make no question but she does, then she <...> ill suffer a death in the person of this rash man, untill I can get her unto such a place, as <...> shall make her suffer in her own. Oh Sir, (cried out all the men which were in the Cham<ber) we beseech you, either grant us the life of Cyrus, or else we beseech you give us our deaths. How (replied Ciaxares extreamly astonished) my Subjects, my Vassals, and my Allies, all ask life for their Tyrant? or at least will be so one day? We beg the life (said they all with one voice) of a man, whom the gods did send to be the Legitimate Master of all men, and have adorned him with Vertues accordingly; and one who, although he was able to have got out of prison (added Hidaspes) yet would not attempt it. A man (pursued Gobrias) who would not live but to do you service. You may say (added Gadates) a man, who would never have vanquished but for your Glory: A Prince (pursued Thrasibulus) who has made all the Wise men of Greece adore him: And one (added the king of Hircania) who has converted all them whom he has vanquished, to be his friends. Say Page 208 rather (pursued Feraulas) one who has made his most mortall enemies admire <...> Adde unto these (said Aglatidas) that the destiny of Artamenes is so extraordinary and glorious, that his most mortall enemies do owe their lives unto him. You may further say (added Artibies) that those who hardly know him, are so much charmed by his Vertues, that they are ready to die for him. For my part added Thimocr<es) I should think my life could never be better employed, then in saving such an Illustrious Prince as he: Indeed (replied Philocles) your lot would deserve envy if you could obtain that favour: for what applause did not that man deserve who should have the honour to reprieve so vertuous a Prince? A Prince, replied Megabises, who is valiant in the highest degree. Who is as lib<erall as valiant (pursued Artabases) who is as prudent as courageous (added the Prince of Licaonia). Who is as milde and sweet after a Victory, as he is furious in fighting (replied Madates) Whose reputation is fam'd thoroughout the World (said Leontidas) Who is owner of all the Vertues (added the Prince of Paphlagonia) And to summe up all in few words (pursued Ariobantes) he is a man who never did any ill, but alwayes good. <...> ow, (said Ciaxares in a great fury) did Cyrus never do any ill? has he not rendred him<self so prevalent and powerfull in the mindes of my Friends, my Enemies, my Allies, my Neighbours, and my Subjects, that it seems as if I durst not punish him? Is not this crime great enough to ruine him: to the end that I may teach others to be more respective unto me? But as it possible (added he) that there should not be one amongst you all who loves his liberty, and is a hater of that man, whom so many Predictions might move you to look upon as a Traytor: In the meane while, since you neither respect my Interest, not your own, nor the Interest of all Asia, I will look onely to my self, and will punish this pretended Cyrus, as a man who is come into my Court to betray me; as one that has conspired with my daughter against my life; as one that has voluntarily let the king of Assyria escape; as one that holds a criminous correspondency with him, and as a man who indeed would ruine me. Take heed Sir, (said Hidaspes) what you do; for after all this, Cyrus is not your Subject, and the King my Master knowes well enough how to be revenged upon you for such a piece of high injustice. In the name of the gods Sir, (said the king of Phrygia) do not resolve upon any thing in the heat of your choler. In the name of the gods (replied Ciaxares) speak not a word more unto me either concerning Artamenes or Cyrus: But be ye all assured, that I take him for my secret Enemy, for a <...> uce <...> f my Daughter, and for the Tyrant of all Asia, and nothing shall save him: and therefore <...> since his destruction is inevitable; prepare your selves to hear presently of <...> th: In saying so, he caused Feraulas to be guarded a <...> d left them. The End of the Second Part.

The Third Part.

BOOK. I.

EX<ream Fears turning the Souls of all the Kings, Princes, and Heroique Persons into Fury, they once determined to cast off all the respects which they owed unto Ciaxares. But afterwards, considering, that the Guards of the Castle did depend absolutely upon Metrobates, they altered their determinations, and took a more rational course. They went with all hast unto the House of Hidaspes, there to advise upon the best remedy against a disaster of so great importance: great indeed, since it so nearly concerned the Life of the most Illustrious Prince upon Earth. Their fears of not getting out of the Castle proved groundless: for Metrobates contented himselfe with the execution of the Kings Orders unto the Gates of the Town, which was, That none should be permitted to go out of Sinope to the Camp, nor none from the Camp to enter the Town: These Heroes were no sooner with Hidaspes, but he, that famous Persian, spoke hastily thus unto them: Sirs, Whether you look upon Cyrus as Artamenes, or upon Artamelnes as Cyrus, you are all of you obliged to save him, if it be possible; There is not one amongst you all, whom he hath not obliged, and by consequence not one amongst you, who ows not your best assistance unto him. As for us Persians (said he, speaking to Adusius, Artabases, Madates, and concerning himself) we were the basest Varlets upon earth, if we would not die to save his life, or revenge his death. And you Sirs, (if it be permitted me to say so in the heat of my zeal) would be very unjust, if not ungrateful, in not doing the same with us. As for you (said he unto Ariobantes, Megabises, and Aglatidas,) who are natural Subjects unto Ciaxares, although the Interest of Cyrus does not concern you, yet the Ho<nour of the King, your Master, ought to move you, and make you to undertake any exped<ients which may prevent the spilling of that blood, which as pure as it is, will stain his life with an infamous brand, never to be washed out: whether therefore ye be Phrigians, Her<canians, Grecians, Assyrians, Medes, Cadusians, Paphlagonians, or Persians. Let us all speedily resolve upon some expedient; or to express my selfe better, Let us speed<ily put it into act, and lose not a minute of time, lest Metrobates prevent us.

Page 2 No sooner had Hidaspes ended his Speech, but all the Kings, Princes, and Heroes, test<ified their resolutions to imploy the most desperate remedies, against so desperate a disease; and to hazard their lives a thousand times to preserve the life of Cyrus. They contrived all imaginable wayes to effect their Designe, and the heat of their zeal did so transport them, that they propounded an hundred different Propositions; and some of them such, as the ex<ecution of them was impossible: for the accident did so disturb their Reason, and animate their Courage, that all of them did strive how to signal themselves, by the dangers they would undertake in the enterprise. Some would have them go by open force unto the Castle, and demand Artamenes; others advised to joyn the subtlety of the Fox to the fury of the Lion: and others would have them go kill Metrobates immediately: Some advised to go and raise the people; some others would have them cause the Army to advance; and all of them con<cluded to transact, and bestir themselves, to save the life of Cyrus. Since they looked upon Ciaxares, as a prejudicated Prince, yet since they were all of them really generous, they had not one thought of attempting any thing upon his Person; but only so far as might get that Hero out of his hands, unto whom he owed the Glory of his Reign, and the Conquest of many Kingdoms.

In conclusion, it was resolved upon, to let some one down the walls of the Town by cords, that he might go unto the Camp, and make it known unto the Persians, that the only Son of their Sovereign was in danger of death, if they did not speedily relieve him; hoping that afterwards, all the whole Army would come unto the Gates of Sinope, and move Cixares not to execute his Design with so much precipitation: In the mean time it was resolved that Ariobantes, and Megabises, should return into the Castle, and advertise them concerning all passages, and also to try if they could any ways qualifie the King: For their parts, they assembled all their friends which they had within the Town, to wait until the Army came up, and to be in readiness for any attempt, if there were a necessity of it, and to stir up the people, if there were no other remedy; but there was no need of taking any thought for that, because they perceived the people to come out of the Castle in tumults, and as they walked the streets, nothing could he heard but the name of Artamenes, pronouncing it with troubled spirits: Immediately after, the people of Sinope seeing all their hopes turned into fears, and their joys into sorrows, grew into so great a commotion, that there was not any who followed his accustomed course; shops were shut, the women spoke loud in the streets, Merchants consulted together upon what was best to be done, the Gentry flocked about the King and Princes, to hear what was done in the Castle; and the confusion was so tumultuously apparent, that it was easie to perceive, they wanted but little of a declared Revolt. That which did most of all augment the Tumult, was the Orders which Metrobates had given to suffer none to enter, or go out of the Town: for they who were come out of the Camp into the Town, being desirous to return thither again; and they who were gone out of the Town into the Camp, being also desirous to come back, and both restrained; The one endeavouring to come in, the other to go out, made such an hideous Garboil at the Gates, that the noise of them sounded throughout all the Town, and one benefit accrued by it; for since all the Souldiers which Metrobates had brought from Pteria, were all busied either at the Gates of the Town, or at the Castle; it was less difficult for Madates during the obscurity of the night to get over the wall and ditch. He went then in all hast unto the Camp, and acquainted all the Persians that Artamenes was Cyrus, and that their Prince would presently be put to death, if they did not interpose their lives to save his; when he came there he found the Camp already in disorder, by the return of several Captains, and Souldiers, who were denyed entrance into the Town, who reported that certainly they would put Artamenes to death, and perhaps all their Commanders, and Princes also. Madates then found the Army in a fit posture for his designe; if he met any Captains, It must be you (would he say unto them) which must save the invincible Artamenes, you who have been sharers with him in the honour, and you who he has so favourably looked upon: If he spoke unto the Common souldiers, It must be you (would he say to them) who must preserve your valiant General, who would ever be in the deepest dangers, but would never have any share in the Magnificent Plunder wherewith you are enriched. If he saw any Phrygians, he told them that it was their Kings Command to come unto Sinope, and demand Artamenes: If he saw any Hircanians, he would tell them the same from their King, and so the like unto all the several Nations which were in the Army: so that the Discourse of Madates, meeting with that violent passion which had taken root in the hearts of all the Captains and Souldiers towards Cyrus, (for we will not hereafter call him Artamenes,) it is not at all strange if Madates did so suddenly Page 3 kindle so great a fire, out of matter which was so combustible. The Name of Cyrus was quickly divulged throughout all the Army: for the thirty thousand Persians, who had it from their Commander in chief, unto whom Madates had imparted it, did presently disperse it abroad. And as this great Body was moved by one Soul, every one ranged himself under his Colours, and desired to be conducted unto Sinope.

The Name of Artamenes, and of Cyrus, echoed from Company to Company, from Regiment to Regiment, and above an hundred thousand men did in an instant talk, and bestir themselves, to relieve him whom they regarded as a God, both in times of Peace, and War. Mean while, the King of Phrygia, and the King of Hircanias Troops, grew great in the Town, composed of all the Men of Quality in Sinope, and of those who were not permitted to return unto the Camp. The people also, who at the first did only grumble, do now take Arms, and rendezvous into Companies in divers Quarters of the Town. Ariobantes, and Megabises, were within the Castle, where the disorder was greater then either in the Camp, or Town. Metrobates moved Cixares with all his Arguments to pronounce the last Sentence of death against Cyrus: and Cixares himself was at the ultimate resolution; both of them did foresee the dangerous consequences of so dismal a designe; but choller did so prepossess the Spirit of Cixares, that he disguised his thoughts: And the wicked Metrobates, that he might expel out of the Soul of Cixares all just fears of an universal subversion of his Empire by the death of Cyrus, did blow the coals of his fury, and quenched all such apprehensions in him. Sir, (said he unto him) the reason why all these Kings, and Princes, are so hot and zealous in the behalf of Cyrus, is only, because they hope that if they can get him out of prison, they shall receive a recompence for it: but if he were once in his Grave, you should see them in another mind: The fidelity of Courtiers never follows Favourites further then their Funerals; If therefore you would allay the tumult of the people, dissipate the factions of Grantees, and hush the force of the Army, you must speedily put both Cyrus and Artamenes to death; and cause that neither of those Names be any longer pronounced: It is but a requisite Victim to appease that storm which he hath raised; since certainly Cyrus shall no sooner be in a condition, to move no further hopes nor fears, but the disorder will cease, and you shall be King again of many Kingdoms, and enjoy your Crowns in quietness. This so violent and unjust discourse wanted not a favourable ear from Cixares; not but that whether he would or no, he did remember all those great Services which Cyrus had done him under the Name of Artamenes, and that tender affection which once he bore that Prince; but he was opposite unto all that either Justice or Piety could inspire into him, and hearkened not unto any thing but fury and revenge. All the rest of the prisoners which were in several places of the Castle were astonished, when they saw their Guards changed, and themselves treated worse then ordinary: They also heard a very great noise, which begot both fears and hopes in them: Martesia never heard the door of her Chamber open, but she had thoughts both of death and liberty. Chrisantes whose soul stood immovable, looked upon every thing with an indifferent eye. Fearaules never thought upon any thing but his dear Master: Andramias being accustomed to command others, did impatiently endure to be commanded: Araspes took his fetters patiently: Artuclas without ever repining of the Services he had done unto Cyrus, endured his prison without murmur: Ortagues that most faithful servant, found this consolation in his misery, that it was for his Illustrious Master which he suffered: Mean while Cyrus seeing all his hopes of liberty like to be seconded by a violent death, bestowed all his thoughts upon his Princess: and without accusing Cixares, or murmuring at his injustice, his only wish was, That Mandana might be happy when he was dead: This wish was no sooner made, but he did almost recall it; for said he in himself, those Services which I have done her, and all the Princes which I have taken, and my most respected passion towards her, does merit some light remembrance, and some sighs from my Princess for me: Yes, Divine Mandana, I may without offence pretend unto so much honour as to be lamented by you, since heretofore your goodness afforded me some tears at the news of my death: But I should be infinitely unjust, if I should desire that my ruine should disturb the tranquility of your life; Live then, Divine Princess, though I die; but do not quite blot out the memory of too happy Artamenes, and most unhappy Cyrus; live in all abundant happiness, and let no sadness sit upon your Soul.

This passionate apprehension dwelt not long in his heart, without the interruption of another: sometimes the Image of Mandana all in tears, did present it self unto his fancie, and made him find a sad consolation, and some sweetness in the horrors of his Tomb: Whilest Page 4 this Illustrious Prisoner bestowed all his thought upon Mandanae, all things were in a fearful confusion: Metrobates received news after news all the night long, That all the Town was up in Arms; that the Army was upon its march towards Sinope; that the Kings of Phrigia and Hircania had mustered a considerable body of Men together; and that there was small Likelihood the King should find any obedience, either from People, or Souldiers, or Officers. In this desperate extremity he made his Last endeavour to move Cixares, to put Cyrus to death; and indeed, the King did fully intend it. Metrobates had sent orders unto Artaxes to send him two Thousand men more, the next night following, and to come a back way by the Sea side, where the Troops of the Armie could not stop them; and this was the Reason, why the matter was not more hastily executed: Notwithstanding, when he heard the great hurly burly more and more increase, and receiving continual intelligence, of fresh disorders; and seeing at the break of day the state of things, he wrought so upon Cixares, that he was upon the Point to bid them put Cyrius to death, when the Grave Thiamis, one of the sacrificers belonging to the Temple of Mars, who was accidentally shut up in the Town, came with all the Magi of Sinope, and desired to speak with Cixares. Metrobates would needs avert the King from hearing him: but a secret apprehension moved Cixares not to follow the counsel of this wicked Man, but would needs hearken unto Thiamis. Permission then being given for him to enter, this Venerable old man, followed by abundance of the Magi, all dressed in such mourning vestments as they were wont to weare at Publique Mourning, appeared before the King both with much reverence and boldness, and looking upon him with eyes full of melancholy, but yet full of such severe Majestie as begot both fear and Reverence, he spoke thus unto him.

The Discourse of THIAMIS unto CIXARES.

SIR, as it is our duties to be most faithful Subjects unto Kings as our Masters, so it is our duty also, to be bold in declaring those important truths unto them, which concerns the good of their state and Persons, when occasions present themselves. Therefore being inspired by the Gods, and without any fears of displeasing you, I come to beseech your Majesty to hear me, but to hear me without prejudication: It concerns, Sir, not only your own glory, but the glory of your Empire, the safety of many Kingdoms, and indeed of all Asia, and particularly your own self; therefore I conjure you, once more to hear me favorably without interruption. I know Sir, by the publique voice, that Artamenes is Cyrus; that he is the same Prince who was usher'd into the world by so many Prodigies; for whom both Heaven and Earth have interrupted the order of all the universe: The strongest and most stately Temples have tottered: The lights of many Candles did of themselves extinguish, and miraculously incorporate themselves into one flame: The Sun it self was eclipsed, and its splendor and heat was afterwards reduced. All the Victims have pronounced his Grandure, and all the Stars have written it in Characters of Gold: Indeed Sir, we have observed so much of him, that we are most certain, the person of Cyrus is extraordinary; and one whose Life is not to be under the Jurisdiction of any Kings upon Earth: I know very well, you will think it strange that those men, who according to your orders have offered sacrifices of thanks unto the Gods for his death, should now intercede for his life. But Sir give me leave to tell you, that all humane Prudence is erroneous, and oftentimes in lieu of directing do delude us: nor ought man to be so Presumptuous as to penetrate the secrets of Heaven: It is true Sir, that the Magi of Ecbatan, perceiving that the Gods intended a great alteration in all Asia, did think that some great evil was menaced; so that when intelligence was brought of the supposed death of him, who should be the cause of it, they rendered thanks unto the Gods, for the death of that Prince, who they thought would make use of unjust courses, to subvert the Throne, and would become the grand Tyrant of the world. But now at this day, since we know that Artamenes is Cyrus, we doe clearly perceive that we have been deceived; and that all the signes and Prodigies, did rather speak infinit good, then menace any bad misfortunes. Give me leave to ask you Sir, what has the most Illustrious Artamenes done, ever since the first day of his arrival at Sinope, when I had the happiness to see him in our Temple? For my part, I am certain, that this valour has brought us more causes of sacrifices of thanks unto the Gods for the Victories which he hath brought you, then any four ages ever produced either in Cappadocia, Galatia, or Medea. The Gods, Sir, did not permit him to preserve your Life, that should become Master of his; nor is he born your subject, but you ought to treat him as your equal. If the famous Artamenes were not the Son of a King, but born in your own Dominions, then might Page 5 you absolutely dispose of his Life and fortune, without rendering an account unto any but the Gods for it: But he is born a Subject unto another Prince, unto whom he is Son, as well as Subject, and you ought not to usurp that Authority which does not belong unto you. Moreover sir, those such eminent Persons, as he, whom the Gods have sent to advance your glory, ought to be sacred in your esteem. When we rejoiced at the false newes of the death of Cyrus, we did then suppose he would prove a wicked man, and imagined that he suffered shipwrack by the permission of the Gods: But now, since we doe know him to be the most virtuous of men, and the greatest Prince upon earth, we ought rather to worship him then put him to death. Indeed Sir, when I consider what he has done for you; how he hath preserved all Cappadocia by preserving your Life; how many Battels he hath won for you; how many Kings he hath subjected; what Towns he hath taken; and that the proud City of Babylon which aspired unto universal Monarchie, hath been subdued by his valour; I doe confess, I can not understand by what Principles you transact; You, I say Sir, whose Prudence and goodness we have all admired. Why was the Sun Eclipsed, and afterwards appeared in far greater Splendor then before, but only to manifest, that when he should have extinguished all other powers, his own should be infinitely more great, then ever the others were? Doe not tell me, that all these signes did mark him out for a terrible Prince, whose death was to be desired: No Sir, deceive not your selfe: The Gods do use to give us hopes as well as fears, and Promises as well as menaces: And if it be their intentions that Cyrus should reign, they intend that it shall be by just wayes. They have foretold him to be one of the greatest Conquerors in the world, whose victorious hand has planted Lawrels upon all the Rivers of Asia: A Prince he is, who is the love of all Nations, who surmounts all, either by force or favour; yet in the midst of all his victories and Conquests he is absolute Master of his Ambition, and prostrates all his Triumphs, and all his Glory at your feet: So that Sir, to accomplish the will of the Gods, Cyrus must Reign by your means: Nor know I any other interpretations of all those prodigies, but this, That you your self cause Cyrus to Reign hereafter by giving unto him the Prin|cess Mandana, who is your sole Heir. I do see that this my discourse does incense you, in lieu of appeasing you; yet for all that, I am obliged to tell you from those Gods whom I serve, and with whom I have consulted by extraordinary Sacrifices, since the imprisonment of this Prince, That if you put him to death you will destroy your Empire; you will make all your Subjects, slaves unto your enemies, and perhaps also—

As Thiamis was going on with his discourse, and as Ciaxares was incensed with the bold|ness of his language, they heard a great noise from the Court before the Castle. Ariobantes, and Megabises, were in a Balcone over against it, and saw, that it was a great multitude of people, and Souldiers together; who without any Discipline or Commanders, did demand Artamenes. This bold attempt did move Thiamis to proceed in his discourse to the King, but he in his great choller rejected him, and seemed to be more incensed. Ariobantes sent Megabises to advertise the King of Phrigia that nothing could molifie Ciaxares. Though Thia|mis had been denied, yet would he not go out of the Castle, but staid in another chamber, hoping to meet with some more favorable opportunity to be better harkened unto: during this while Metrobates was advertised that the whole Army was at the gates of the Town, and would have entrance: fain would he conceal this bad news from the King; but yet it must be known, and therefore he told him; who was troubled at it beyond all imagination. He was in a Castle with a very few people with him; and in a revolted Town, whose gates, although they were guarded by men which were for him, yet the Town was assaulted by an Army of a hundred Thousand men without, and by a great part of the Inhabitants within: All this while he accused Cyrus, as the cause of all these disasters, not considering that he was only the inno|cent cause. But never was the like seen, both without, and within the Town: The Army made the Air Eccho, with the glorious name of Artamenes, and Cyrus: the Souldiers of Metrobates had work enough: A hundred ladders in a place might be seen reared against the walls, and Sol|diers covered with their Bucklers running up them: others using that warlike Engine which the Ancients called Battering Rams, all striving to mount the top of the wall; some fell down; others more strong and happy got up and beat off their enemies, maintaining fight upon the walls whilst the rest of their Companions entred the Town in that place: As the valour of them who scaled the walls was great, so the valour of them who ordered the Battering Rams was no less; These huge Engins which were moved by Arms that were infinitely zealous for the safety of Cylrus, did thump such great blows against the gates and walls, that they made them stagger: The sound of these Rams, whose heads were of fine Copper, which is called the Gold of Corinth, was so terrible that, Thunder was never louder.

Page 6 There were an hundred other Engines, which by antiquity were termed Balistae, and Cal|tapultae, and Onegri, which shot whole clouds of arrows and stones against the walls, and into the Town: They were no calmer within the Town, then without; for all the people were so animated, that nothing could be more terrible. The Kings of Phrygia, and Hircan|a, did wish that things would have looked with another face; and they were extreemly vexed to be constrained to make use of such a dangerous remedy, since there is nothing in the world more to be avoided, then the Rebellion of the people: But that which cannot be helped must be endured; and they endeavoured to qualifie this Popularity as much as they could; thinking that this striking some apprehensions of fear into Ciaxares, would be enough to save Cyrus: Mean while the Gates of the Town were broken open, and those who defended the walls forsook them, who not knowing whether to retreat were all killed, both by them without, and within the Town. This great Army being entered in several places of the Town, did not stay to plunder, but presently inviron|d the Castle. Metrobates would fain have fled if he knew how; but Guards were set on all sides both by Sea and Land; That Ciaxares himself had no other thoughts but to die in defending himself, after he had first put Cyrus to death; whatsoever Thiamis and Ariobantes could say was vain, for the King was all fury and despair: Mean while, Metrobates the vilest wretch upon earth, not knowing what to do, went to the Chamber of Cyrus; and counterfeiting both pity and generosity, told him, that if he would promise him two things, he would set him at liberty; this Prince ha|ving no mind to promise him any thing, he was forc'd to express himself, that if he would bestow the Government of Pteria upon him for his security, he would then kill Ciaxares, and shewed him ways how he could bring it to pass. For Sir, (said this villanous man) this is the only way to prevent your death, and to make you Lord of all Asia. This vicious Propo|sition was so horrid in the apprehension of Cyrus, that he thrust Metrobates out of his Chamber, and as good luck was, a Souldier which guarded this gallant Prisoner, heard all their discourse. This Traitor then, seeing no way but ruine, thought how to make all in the Castle perish with him; yet since he imagined that some accident might fall out, wherein the Person of Cyrus might stand him in some stead, therefore he was not so hasty to kill him: Mean while, the noise and tumult increased; and all that the Kings and Princes could do, to restrain the Souldiers was in vain: for since the greatest part of them were not Subjects unto Ciaxares, they were extreemly animated by the thirty thousand Persians, who would deliver their Prince: They cast off that Reverend respect unto Kings, which ought to be imprinted in the souls of Subjects, insomuch as they were ready to act any violence. They had already brought the Ladders unto the Castle; and I am verily perswaded, they would have set it on fire, if they had not feared the burning of Cyrus among the rest. The Battering Rams were brought unto the Gates, and two thousand men ready to make an Assault when the breach was made; and also an hundred thousand men more to second them, when presently a great noise upon the left hand was heard, which ought to be understood, notwithstanding the tu|multuous confusion of voices, to be a noise of joy. Presently after, the Kings of Phrygia, and Hircania, accompanied with Persodes, Artibies, Adu|sias, Artabases, the Prince of Pophlagonia, Thimocrates, Philodes, and many others, did so see Hidaspes, Thrasibulus, Aglatidas, and the faithful Orsan|es, conducting Cyrus, whom they had happily delivered out of a window, by breaking the bars, as soon as ever Metrobates had left him: This sight did produce a prodigious effect: and every one that had a tongue, pronounced the Name of Cylrus, or Artamenes, for as yet they gave him both names indifferently. In the mean while this generous Prince, as soon as he perceived the Ladders, and Rams, and all ready to assault the Castle, speaking not a word of his intentions unto his illustrious friends, did upon a sudden with his sword in his hand (for he had one given as soon as he was delivered) se|perate him|self from them who were about him, and went straight unto the Gate of the Castle: so that Ciaxares who was then in a Balcone to see what the Cry of Joy should be, did see Cyrus separated from his deliverers, and at the Gate of the Castle in a posture to defend it against them who for his liberty did assault it: This Act being seen unto an hundred thousand several persons, did cause as many admirations in their souls: and moved them to suspend their Acti|on. Ciaxares, who a minute before thought Cyrus to be a prisoner, did not well know, whether what he saw, was true: In the mean while this generous Prince, being before the Gate, holding his sword in one hand, and making signes unto the people with the other, that he desired to speak, he did in an instant cause as husht a silence, as before there was tumu|ltuous noise.

Do not think, my Deliverers, (said he unto Thrasibulus, Hidaspes, Aglatidas, and Orsan|es, Page 7 that I will accept of any liberty which shall be employed against the King: No, no, I do not value Glory at so poor a rate, as to prefer my life before it: If I did come out of prison, it was only my-Companions (said he, looking upon the Souldiers) to come and teach you that reverend respect which you ow unto your Master: Force me not to turn this sword against you which heretofore has rendered you victorious: Obey, obey the Kings Commands, with|out the least contradiction: and if he demand my head of you, you ought to give it him with|out resistance: Did I ever teach you (said he, and doubled the fervency of his speech) to re|bel against your King? Did you ever perceive by any of my actions, that I would allow of what you have done? No, no, deceive not your selves, I can never be woon unto an act so criminal, which makes me culpable as well as you. For after all this which you have done, I am not a whit more innocent then I was before, but I rather find, that the King without any injustice, and may •hop off that mans head, who hath raised all his Subjects against him: Lay down your Arms then; and if you desire to serve me, cause all the souldiers to return unto the Camp, and all the inhabitants to their houses, whilst I, after I have begged your par|don from the King, will return unto my fetters. Cyrus having ended his speech, a great hum|ling noise was heard all over; those who understood not what he said, asked of others; and those who did understand him, did with admiration, Cry out, and every one did absolutely say, that they would die a thousand deaths rather then he should perish: When he perceived that they would not obey him, he then turned towards the Castle, looking up to the Balcone, where Ciaxares stood, and speaking as loud as ever he could: Command Sir, (said he unto him) that they suffer me to come unto you, to the end I may die in defending you against your re|bellious Subjects. Thrasibulus, Hidaspes, and Aglatidas, who indeed feared that they would not let him enter, did range themselves on his side; but he looking upon them with great turbulency of spirit, said unto them; No, my too generous friends, come no nearer, un|less, since I cannot turn the point of my sword against you, you will provoke me to turn it a|gainst my self.

Whilst these passages happened in that place, the King was in extream agitation of soul; for at the same instant in which he saw Cyrus in that generous posture, a Souldier pre|sented himself at his feet; Sir, (said he unto the King) that Illustrious Prisoner, whom my companions, and my self did guard, is escaped; But if it be permitted me to say it, your Majesty need not to be troubled at it: for he is too generous to do any harm, but it is the wicked Metrobates who you had more need to be troubled at: The King was so-much surprized and troubled both at what he saw, and what he heard, that his spirits were not at so much li|berty as to inform himself further, by what the Souldier desired to speak; if Thiamis, and Ariobantes, had not moved him unto a further curiosity: But at last the Souldier being com|manded to speak on, he told the King in few words, how he overheard the Proposition which Metrobates had made unto Cyrus, how he offered to kill Ciaxares upon condition Cyrus would give him the Government of Pteria: Thiamis, and Ariobantes, took hold upon this favourable opportunity, and aggravate the hainousness of this wicked act: The King did yet make some doubt of the truth, but the Souldier continuing his tale; Sir, (said he) to ju|stifie the truth of what I tell you, give me leave to acquaint you further, that Metrobates no sooner knew of the escape of Cyrus, but in lieu of advertising you, he provided for his own safety, and as the Ladders by which Cyrus was delivered, did remain still at the window, he made use of them, that way to go out of the Castle, having carried along with him a party of my fellow-souldiers; for my part, I should have come to advertise you of this horrid mo|tion, as soon as I heard it, if I had then the power to have done it; But being ingaged upon my duty, in the outer Chamber of Cyrus, when Metrobates came thither, I could not get out, until after his escape. The King was extreemly troubled at this relation, yet not alto|gether believing it, he sent into all places of the Castle to seek for Metrobates, and to see whether they who delivered Cyrus had not killed him: But he knew that Cyrus had been delivered without any resistance; he knew also that Metrobates went the second time to the Chamber of Cyrus, and perhaps with an intention to kill him, though he had no orders for it, and when he found him escaped, it seems he escaped himself, in the same way as the souldier rela|ted. Now Sir, (replied Thiamis) I hope you will no longer resist both Heaven and Earth: Do you not now sufficiently see the innocency of Cyrus, through the crime of Metrobates? I know very well (answered Ciaxares) that Cyrus is generous, but I cannot yet so clearly discover his innocency: As soon as he had said so, Martesia, Chrisantes, Feralus, Araspes, Artucas, and Ortalgues, did all of them enter: for such a fear had seized upon the souldiers, since Metrobates who placed them there was escaped, that they looked after their pri|soners Page 8 no longer. Ciaxares being much surprized at the sight, and not knowing whe|ther his Person was safe amongst so many people whom he had hardly used, did yet ma|nifest his confidence, and asked all about him very angrily, Whether or no he was King, since they were so bold as to fail in their due respects unto him? Sir, (replied Chri|santes) when we saw that our Guards did leave us, we supposed your Majesty had no further use of us: and I thought (added Martesia) that it would conduce much unto your glory, and preservation, to tell you once again Sir, that Cyrus is innocent. See Sir, (said Thiamis, forcing him to take notice of this last Act of Cyrus, in hindering his friends from coming nearer him) whether you have any reason to reprehend the Servants of such a Master, whose generous Soul does oppose against his own deliverance, and becomes an enemy unto his Rescuers: Oh Heavens, Cried out Ciaxares, what shall I do? what can I, or what ought I to do? Command me (answered Thiamis) to go and fetch Cyrus unto you, and treat him kindly, as he deserves. But he holds intelligence with my Enemy, (replied the King.) You may see, Sir, (replied Ariobantes) by the manner of his acting, that he holds no culpa|ble correspondence with him: but he is culpable at the least in relation to my Daughter, and therefore cannot be innocent. You may see that Sir, (replied Martesia) by a Letter which I will present unto you, and which by good fortune I found in that Chamber where I was prisoner, which formerly was mine: This Letter was never seen by any but Cyrus, nor did he ever impart the Contents of it unto Chrisantes, or Feraulas; and the Princess although she was most innocent, yet would she not suffer it to remain in his hands, and therefore it remained in mine: I did think, I had lost it, but by good fortune I found it in a little Trunk which was sent from Themissira unto Sinope, and I have brought it unto your Majesty, to let you see how criminal Mandana is. Ciaxares then taking the Letter, which he knew perfectly to be his Daughters hand, he read it with much circumspection, and trouble.

The Princess MANDANA, unto CYRUS.

Since it is your desire I should write my ultimate resolution unto you: I shall repeat that which I have already spoken unto you; which in Sum is this, That all the obligations whereby I am bound unto you, and all the Services which you have rendered unto the King my Father, shall never move me to recede from the exact and rigorous rules of virtue: I do know very well, that you did never desire any thing from me to the contrary: Therefore you ought not to be surprized, if I again tell you, That if you do not find out some expedients, and ways to make the King my Father acquainted, who you are, and procure his consent within the time prefixed: you must return into Persia, and never see me more: This is the total Sum of all I can, or ought to do.

MANDANA.

The King having read the Letter, and seeing Cyrus oppose his own friends, and command the Souldiers to lay down their Arms: Let him live (said he) let the happy Cyrus live, whose own virtues has more induced my Soul to save him, than an hundred thousand men could do. It is your Office, Grave Thiamis, (said he) to pronounce the same unto the Souldiers: and it is yours Ariobantes, to give out all necessary orders for the safety of the Castle. Oh Sir (cried out Chrisantes, Feraulas, and all the rest who were in the Chamber,) as long as Cyrus lives, your Majesty need not to fear any thing: Mean while, Thiamis desiring to execute the Kings Order with all speed, and not to give him any time to repent of so gracious a Sentence, went down unto the Gate of the Castle, followed by all the Magi which waited upon him. As soon as the Gates were opened, Cyrus came up, and endeavoured to enter, and forbid entrance unto any else; All his Deliverers and Partakers did advance, all the Captains and Souldiers cried out, that he should not enter, and made a terrible noise: But when the Gates of the Castle were wide open, and none but the Magi and Sacrificers appeared, the tumult ceased; every one kept his station, and silence to hear what Thiamis would say unto them: Cyrus then saluted the Magi with much reverence, holding down his sword, and looking upon him with as little dismayedness as if his life were not at all in danger; Is it from you, Grave Thiamis, (said he unto him) that I ought to re-assume my fetters? No Sir (answered he) the Ministers of the Gods do not use to abase themselves so low, as to execute the injustice of men. But generous Prince, I come to proclaim that liberty which the King hath granted unto you: The flight of Metrobates hath cleared his soul from all doubts, and the Gods, unto whom you are most precious, have by your own victories freed you from that Page 9 danger which seemed to be inevitable. Come then, Sir, and triumph, come and receive that tenderness of foul which the King keeps for you: Cyrus then making most low reverence unto Thiamis, Doubtless it is your pious prayers (said he unto him) rather than any virtue in me, which hath wrought this happy change in the King. But grave Thiamis, Does the King esteem me as a justified man, or as a criminal, whom he pardons? you shall know that from his own mouth, replied Thiamis. This grave Magi, had no sooner said so, but Cyrus turning himself towards his illustrious friends, did intreat them to let him enter alone; but he could not hear their Answer; for this good news having in a moment passed from mouth to mouth, nothing could be heard but thoughts of joy; yet certain mistrusts did remain in many minds, and they could not be satisfied with any thing: Some would have Hostages before he entered, others asked whether Thiamis, whose wisdom and integrity was known unto all the world, would answer for him: Insomuch, as hearing himself named by so many voices, and different men; No, no, (said this sage Sacrificer unto them, as loud as he could speak) fear nothing, but trust me with the Person of Cyrus: It is my office to conduct Victims unto the feet of Altars, not into the hands of Executioners. I use to appease the Gods by sacrifices, not but I do not use to execute vengeance upon men: Let your obedience (said he unto them) testify that your zeal is grounded upon good principles; and in lieu of serving, do not prejudice your most Illustrious General. Mean while, the King of Phrygia, the King of Hircania, Persodes, Thrasibulus, Artibies, the Prince of Paphlagonia, Hidaspes, Artabases, Timocrates, Philocles, Leontidas, Megabises, Aglatidas, Orsanes, and many others came near, and desired that they might follow Cyrus into the Castle; but Thiamis told them, it would better accommodate the business, if some part of them only, did enter in with him, and the other part remain without, to keep the souldiers and people within the limits of their duties: lest some Banique fears, should freshly incense them, and lest they should imagine Cyrus is ill used, and moreover it would be much more requisite they should endeavour to take Metrobates, who was yet out of the Castle. After this contest, Cyrus entered; the King of Phrygia, Hidaspes, Artabases, Adusius, Thrasibulus, and Aglatidas, only following him, the King of Hircania, and all the rest remain without, to take all requisite courses to prevent any new commotion. In the mean while, Thiamis was no sooner gone towards the King, but this Prince was entered into his Closet, whither he sent for Chrisantes, and Martesia only.

These two Persons had both of them so much spirit and discretion, and had told Ciaxares so much, that they made his soul desirous to hear the justification of Cyrus with delight: for since neither his truth nor his passion was not any longer to be concealed as a secret, it was much more easie for them then before, to make his innocence appear: Chrisantes did then with all ingenuity confess, of what nature that intelligence was which Cyrus held with the King of Assyria: and caused him so well to understand, that it was no criminous correspondence, as that the King would sigh for sorrow, considering into what a bad condition this supposed crime had brought him: Martesia, for her part, did justify his Mistress so handsomly, and did so sincerely and briefly relate all the passages, that he himself found no cause of complaint: There was nothing but that Picture which was found in the Cabinet of Cyrus, which moved him to conceive it to be too much for a Princess of so great a virtue, as Mandana professed: for although Martesia had told him it was made for the Princess of Pteria, yet there was no proof of it; but as good fortune was, Martesia did bethink her self of a passage which would clear the business. Sir, (said she unto him) Ariobantes, who as you know was Brother unto the Princess of Pteria, for whom that Picture was made, is able to witness that I tell you no lye; he may perhaps know it, if your Majesty shew it unto him; for I do remember he was with the Princess the same day it was finished, and that the Princess his Sister falling sick the next day after, sent Ariobantes unto the Princess for it: But the Picture-drawer being desirous to take it with him, that he might do something unto the Dress, she could not receive that satisfaction she desired: So that the same Princess died, and as I told your Majesty, never received it: As soon as Martesia had told this, Ariobantes entered, who gave the King an account of those Orders he had given for the Guard of the Castle. Ciaxares then fetching out the Cabinet of Cyrus, which he always kept in his Closet, ever since the wicked Metrobantes brought it unto him, he took out the Picture of Mandana, and shewing it unto Ariobantes, asked him, whether ever he had seen it before? Yes, Sir, (answered he, after he had a while looked upon it) doubtless I have seen it, and that more then once, for I saw it when the Princess out of her goodness was pleased to let it be taken for my Sister, and I saw it afterwards, when it was carried unto Martesia, a few days before the Princess was carried away by the Page 10 King of Assyria: I remember also, how I perswaded her to keep that which was intended for my Sister: O Sir, (cried out Martesia) this is sufficient to justify the Princess, since your Majesty knows she never saw Cyrus since that time; and therefore could not give him this Picture. Thus was the state of things when Thiamis came and told the King, he had brought Cyrus unto him; who to appear with more submission before Ciaxares, had left his Sword with Feraulas in the outer Chamber, where he did embrace him, and Andrameas, Artucas, and Araspes, desiring their pardons for those inconveniences which they had suffered for the love of him: Ciaxares then, at that time calling to mind how much he was indebted unto Cyrus, under the notion of Artamenes, and what Artamenes had done in his presence under the Name of Cyrus, he calmed his mind, and commanded him to enter: Martesia would have gone out of the Kings Closet, but Ciaxares staying her: No Martesia, said he unto her, you must have your share in the Pacification, as you have had in the War. Presently after, the King of Phrygia entered, who would have spoke something by way of excuse unto the King. But Ciaxares taking him by the hand, Speak not of any excuses, said he unto him, since it is my part rather to make excuses for not believing you, then yours for not obeying me.

The Grave Thiamis followed the King of Phrygia, and presented Cyrus unto Ciaxares. This Prince did so much reverence the Father of Mandana, that he would have thrown himself at his feet, as if he had been criminal, yet the King would not suffer him, but lifted him up, and embraced him most tenderly; asking him, whether Cyrus could forget all the injuries which had been done unto Artamenes? Artamenes, replied he, shall never your forget benefits, nor ever he will suffer Cyrus to be ungratefull. But Sir, I most humbly beseech your Majesty, give me leave to answer directly with disguising the least part of truth unto every question that shall be asked me: and that you will be pleased to honour me so far as to tell me. Whether there do yet remain any grounds of suspicion, or fears of my fidelity in you? and if it appear that I ever failed in that duty which I owe you, if I cannot give satisfaction by my reasons, I shall be more ready to submit unto such punishments as you shall ordain. For Sir, what thoughts soever they have infused into you concerning Cyrus, I can most certainly assure you, that he shall ever be most submissive unto your will, insomuch as there is not the meanest of your Subjects whom you may of right command, but my own natural inclination, gives you the same Supremacy over me: Now Sir, you see what are all the most real thoughts of him whom they say is the Ruiner of all Asia: of that grand Usurper, who must subvert Kingdoms, usurp Crowns, and reign by unjust courses. You may very well imagine Sir, that the same Prince who conceals himself from thirty thousand of his Fathers Subjects which were in your Army, had no very ambitious designs; especially, since for fear to offend you, he resolved to lose his life, before ever he would disclose his quality. Enough, enough, (answered Ciaxares, with tears in his eyes, and embracing him again) justify your self no further, for the more you endeavour it, the more you prejudice me, and the greater culpable shall I appear: It were more for my glory if you appeared less innocent. I am in fault enough, replied Cyrus most modestly, since I was so unfortunate as to displease you, and to be the innocent cause of rebellion in your Subjects; I beseech you, Sir, (added Cyrus in a most respectful manner) to charge me only with their crime, and punish my Person for it. No, no, replied the King very sweetly, the very sight of Cyrus has renewed so much tender affection in my soul, that I cannot think of any punishing, but rather I will recompence them all in your Person, for preventing me from committing such an horrid piece of injustice, whereby I should have deprived all Asia of her greatest Glory, and principal Ornament: Therefore to reduce the souldiers and people unto the duty, reassume your Charge, Command them to return unto the Camp, and prepare them and your self also to go very shortly into Armenia, to deliver Mandana from her Captivity. Oh Sir, replied Cyrus, I desire not so much it is enough that you give me leave to obey, and not command: Permit me only so much liberty as to fight in the first rank in the first Battel, and I ask no more. I do not know any (answered the King of Phrygia) that dare presume to be your General, and there is none who thinks it not an honour, that you should be his. The Gods (said Thiamis, interrupting them) being sole Authours of all the happiness which befalls us, it is requisite to render thanks unto them to morrow by a solemn Sacrifice: Most true, Grave Father, said the King unto him, therefore it is expedient that Cyrus do cause the Troops to go out of Sinope, to the end we may offer the Sacrifice with more tranquility.

Cyrus then obeying Ciaxares after he had made an hundred Protestations of inviolable fidelity, went out to give all requisite Orders concerning the business: The King of Phrygia, Page 11 and Ariobantes stayed still with Ciaxares to keep his mind in the same resentments. Martesia asked leave from the King to go back unto the house of Artucas, as soon as the Troops were retired, which he consented unto, thinking that place fitter for her, then the Court where now there was no women: Mean while Thiamis waited upon Cyrus to the Castle gate, where after many embracings he left him, and went to take order for the Sacrificers. The souldiers no sooner saw Cyrus, but they began their acclamations and shouts of joy, not doubting now but that his peace was perfectly made; yet notwithstanding, he behaved himself with so much moderation, as was admirable; telling all those who came about him, that the King was so gracious as to pardon them; therefore said he unto them, it is your duties to extol his goodness: and resolve with your selves to become worthy of it, by your gallant Deportments in the Armenian War, whither very shortly he will send you. Mean while, the King of Hircania, and all the Princes which stayed without the Town, saluted him, and great joy was expressed on all sides afterwards, having assembled all the chief Commanders, he gave command to carry the Army out of the Town immediately, and to leave none in the Town but only so many as usually were in it. Presently after, the King sent orders to change the Guards of the Castle: as for those at the Port of Sinope, they all perished when the Town was entered; so that restoring Andramias unto his charge, they drew off the souldiers which Metrobates had placed in the Castle, the number whereof was not great, because many had escaped with him. Cyrus commanded him to be searched for very narrowly, but all in vain. This Prince went in Person to the principal Port of the Town, to see the Army pass; so that seeing all the Regiments one after another, he might more conveniently command them unto their duties: And because he was beloved, and feared, and revered by all the souldiers, they obeyed him without the least murmur, and returned as joyful as if they had won a battel, and as well content as if they had been loaded with plunder: within three hours, the Town was quiet, and the whole Army without the walls, excepting those Companies necessary for the Guard of the Ports and Castles, whither he returned to render an account unto Ciaxares of what was done: The King of Hircania, and all they who had not seen the King since all these adventures, were presented unto him by Ariobantes; and the night causing every one to take leave; Cyrus, by orders from Ciaxares was lodged in his old Chamber, where he was no sooner entred, but every one came to testify their joy for his liberty: But after all complements had passed, and none but Chrisantes, and Feraulas with him, he embraced them with extream affection. Well, my dear friends, said he unto them, Do you think we have now made our peace with Fate? or is this serene calm which we now begin to enjoy, only a breathing to give us more leisure in preparing your selves for new misfortunes? The Gods (replied Chrisantes) have made trial of your virtue by so many several ways, that it is a piece of great difficulty to foresee what ought to ensue hereafter.

But now Sir, (said Feraulas) you are at liberty, you are also known to be Cyrus; Ciaxares knows it; nor is he ignorant of your love to the Princess, and the Princess her self esteems you. It is true, (replied Cyrus sighing) but yet the Princess is in Armenia, and in the power of the Rival. Yes Sir, replied Feraulas, but it is such a Rival, whose ambition Fortune has so crost, that it cannot possibly be thought she will favour him with any part of her affection: With such discourse as this, Chrisantes, and Feraulas, entertained their dear Master, until he was in bed: yet he was no sooner laid, but all the prodigious revolutions of his Fate came into his memory. The Image of Mandana appeared in his fancy, and entertained him until after midnight; Sleep was no sooner closing up his eyes, but his imaginations being filled with his Princess awaked him. The next day, in the morning, Ciaxares sent him his Cabinet, within which, he had put the Magnificent Scarf of Mandana very carefully, but he found not the Picture of the Princess in it; because the King had sent it back unto Martesia, who was returned to Artucas, as before I told you: his murmur at it was only in secret; and he went unto the King, who prepared himself for the Temple of Mars, where the grave Thiamis attended him: But that he might make it evident unto the people, that he was really reconciled unto Cyrus, he walked through the Town talking unto him: The whole Town did ring joyful acclamations, to see the most illustrious of men at liberty: All the Kings and Princes which were at that Court, did wait upon this Ceremony; and the press was so great between the Town, and the Temple of Mars, that there remained none in Sinope, but only those who guarded the Ports. As the King lighted from horse, (for they did ride thither) within ten or twelve paces of the Temple Gate, Cyrus who was next him, observed four or five men, whose faces seemed odd, and were unknown unto him, who endeavored to come nearer. Although he had not any reason at all to suspect, or fear any thing; yet notwithstanding, as if he were Page 12 inspired by Heaven unto it, he fixed his looks upon one of these men, who had a very bad promising Physiognomy, presently after he perceived two of these men, pull out daggers; the one designing to stab Ciaxares, and the other advanced towards him, with the same intentions. The most generous Cyrus did immediately interpose between the King and the assassinate and received that blow upon his left hand which was aimed at Ciaxares: whilst with his right hand, he forced the dagger out of that hand which strook with it, and laid him dead at his feet: there were eight or ten others who abetted these two who undertook to kill the King and Cyrus, and who seeing the design faile, did make escape, during the amazement which every one was in, at the adventure: but Cyrus drawing his sword did so pursue these conspirators through the midst of this great croud of men, and assaulted them so furiously, that most of them perished by his own hand: for after he had in a minute put the King into the Temple, and committed him into the custody of the King of Phrigia, and many others; he pursued the assassins close unto the Sea side, whether they fled, and where a fishers boat did wait upon them, that thereby they might escape away. Although there was a world of people about Ciaxares, yet the thing was so sudden, and so few saw the first passage, that it was a long while before it was known what the matter was: and certainly had not Cyrus interposed, Ciaxares had bin killed and perhaps the assassins escaped.

But Cyrus, being aided Principally by Feraulas and Araspes, pursued them and killed them, and took one of them after they had well wounded him, who, rather than he would be taken would have thrown himself into the Sea, when Cyrus caught him by the hair; No, no, Traytor, said he unto him, I must first know who you are, and upon what score you have made this attempt: he had no sooner said so but for all the disguise of his habit, and face, and though he was all over smeared with blood yet he knew him to be Metrobates, who endeavoured all he possibly could, either to escape, or kill himself, or else throw himself into the Sea: But several of the Kings guard being come in, Cyrus did put him into their custody, and commanding them to follow with him, he went unto Ciaxares, who was at the house of Thiamis which joyns unto the Temple: as soon as Cyrus appeared, the King did closely embrace him, and this being the second time that he did owe his Life unto him, he did acknowledg it a hundred times over, and expressed as many testimonies of repentance for what he had done against him. Sir, (said he unto him, and causing that Traytor whom he had taken to be brought neerer) I give the Gods most hearty thanks, that they have shewed you the difference betwixt Metrobates, and my self: As soon as the King heard that Name, and looked upon him, but he knew him: Oh thou Vilain (said he unto him,) is it thou that makes such attempts upon my life, as well as upon the life of Cyrus? for the King did perceive the intentions of those two men who would have killed them: Yes, it was I (answered the Traytor most furiously) who not enduring to commit unprofitable crimes, intended to commit two, which would something advantage me: From whom, wicked wretch, (replied the King) didst thou expect a recompence for such an act? From so many Kings and Princes (replied he) as Artamenes by his good fortune has subjected unto you, who by this my Act would have been no longer Tributaries: The King of Phrigia, and the King of Hircania did then begin to speak, and say that he ought to speak more particularly concerning this wicked action: but he, without further pressing, and conceiving no hopes of life although he should escape of his wounds, told them that they need look for no other Author of the conspiracy than himself; and as for his complices, they were all of them dead. He confessed further, that seeing himself ruined, when Cyrus went out of Prison, he himself went out also; That since his Principles was only Ambition, he conceived all his fortunes utterly undone since Cyrus was at liberty: and that he thought he should receive a large recompence from the King of Assyria, if he had at once took away the life of him who possessed his Dominions, and the life of him who had conquered him, and contended with him for the Princess Mandana. Metrobates confessed this, with so much insolent ingenuity that the truth of it was not at all suspected. As for those who assisted him, they were all of them known to be the same Souldiers which went out of the Castle with him, and which he had brought from Pteria. The King, being not able to endure the sight of such a villain any longer, who had attempted both against his own life as well as against the life of Cyrus, commanded him to Prison, until some severe punishment for such crimes were better resolved upon; but that needed not, for he dyed in the hands of the Chyrurgions, and saved himself thereby, from a more tormenting death. Mean while the sacrifice became a sacrifice of real thanks unto the Gods; and Ciaxares renewed the tenderness of his affection towards Cyrus and to augment it, if it were possible, so that his mind enjoyed abundance of tranquility. The Grave Thiamis, who from the first day that he saw Cyrus under the notion, of Artamines, and had ever Page 13 most dearly loved him, did make an excellent oration, full of strong arguments to confirm Ciaxares in his good opinion of him: I should absolutely have lost my reason (said the King unto him) if I should be ungrateful unto that man who hath hazarded his own life to save mine, after my intentions of putting him to death: for grave Thiamis, (said he unto him) this most generous Prince, was contented to receive that blow upon his left hand which was intended at my heart, and to interpose his own body, between the Assassinate, and mine. No no, added he, never fear, but that I shall as long as I live, look upon Cyrus, as my Protector and Preserver, and as a Prince whom indeed the Gods has sent unto me, for my Glory and Felicity: These were the apprehensions of Ciaxares, when he retired himself ever desiring to have Cyrus near him: This action, being divulged not only unto all the people of Sinope, but the Camp also; Applauds and acclamations of joy were redoubled, and Artamenes was never so precious to the soul of Ciaxares as now Cyrus is, so that which in the compass of three days, the the Kings Soul, and all the hearts both in Court, Camp, and Town were full of joy. Ciaxares would needs send unto Persia to the King his Brother and Queen his Sister, to let them know that Cyrus was alive: he then remembered, how at the birth of Mandana, the Queen did send to rejoyce with him for it, and he out of a peece of Galantry sent back this complement, That he wished his Daughter might hereafter become Worthy to be the Mistris of Cyrus: and he gave Madates, whom he sent thither to present the same complement this second time, unto his Sister: Cyrus also desired the King to give him leave to send on of his own servants, and he pitched upon Arabaces for it, whom Chrisantes did send a letter by, or rather a History of the wonderful life of his dear Master; also excusing his long silence: and telling that there was an irresistible fatality in it, which prevented him from doing any otherwise. After this, there was nothing that disturbed the mind of Ciaxares, but the absence of the Princess; yet since he replied so much upon the valour of Cyrus, his care of her was moderated by his hopes, and his soul did rest in great security: In the mean time, since it would be a long time before the Army could march into Armenia, and since Cyrus had so great a desire to know precisely where the Princess was, he moved Ciaxares, to send Araspes disguised into Armenia to discover where those women, of whom Megabises spoke when he returned out of that Country, were placed: for since Araspes was very well versed in the Armenian language, he was the fittest for that employment: Ciaxares then approving of the motion, dispatched Araspes thither with orders to find out the King, who doubtless would ere long be upon the Frontiers: Cyrus, the better to move him and all his ingenuity to discover where Mandana was, did not only give him all necessary Instructions but a hundred good Admonitions besides; insomuch as though Araspes had been of the dullest capacity, as indeed he was nimble, yet Cyrus did prescribe such exact order unto him, that he doubted not of a happy expedition: and as Araspes used to be very familiar with Cyrus, so he could not chuse but tell him, that if Megabises had been as well instructed by Ciaxares, as he was by him, doubtless he would have rendered a better account of his Embassie, and brought back more certainty of the place where the Princess was, then he did: I do understood you very well (replied Cyrus both embracing him, and sighing) I do confess Araspes I have spoken too much, when I consider your ingenuity; but me thinks I have spoke too little unto you, when I apprehend how much this voyage concerns me. If you ever were in love (pursued he) you will doubtless excuse me for being so importunate with you to use your best endeavors; but I see you are an incensable man, who may perhaps be one day Captivated by some beauty or other, who will punish you for the raillery you are pleased to use to your friends. After this, Cyrus embraced him again and could not forbear repetitions of what he had already told him. And as soon as this faithful spy was gone, Cyrus knowing that the King was busie with the King of Phrigia, went unto Martesia, with whom he desired to discourse privately, concerning his dearest Princess: As soon as she saw him come into her chamber, she would have thanked him for the honour he did her, but he would not permit her, No no (said he unto her,) my sweet Martesia you have now, no reason to complement with me, the visit concerns my own interest, and therefore regains no thanks; and I do take so much delight in your company, that you are not at all obliged unto me for it. Sir, (said she unto him in a low voyce, although there was none but the daughter of Artucas in the chamber who addressed her self to Feraulas as soon as Cyllrus entred) I do very well understand your most obliging discourse, and to testify that I do rightly understand it, I will no longer deprive you of that delight which you take in talking of the Princess; and I will ask you, whether you beleeve she would grieve for your Imprisonment, and rejoyce at your liberty if she were here? I dare not beleeve it Martesia (replied this Prince with an amorous sigh and blushing) indeed I dare not, least I should deceive my Page 14 self; and unless your goodness can dissipate my fears, and testify the weakness of my hopes, I do not know, either what to think, or believe.

Martesia then presenting a chair unto him, and taking another for her self; and the daughter of Artucas called Erenice, being gone unto the window, discoursing with Feraulas. Sir, said she unto him, I cannot think, but knowing as you do, the greatness of the Princess Spirit, and also your own merit, and many obligations whereby you have obliged her unto you, that you can possibly doubt, but she will be very sorry for your imprisonment, and very glad for your enlargement: Why may I not doubt it, (replied Cyrus) since you are pleased to be so inhumane, as that you will not so much as lend me the Picture of Mandana? Have I not reason to think, cruel woman as you are, that you do but deal with me according to the resentments of our most incomparable Mistress? for if you had not known that she conceives only a poor common bare esteem of me, could you have endured to see me a Prisoner, a most unfortunate man; absent from her I most adored, and deprived of all consolations, and denied me that Picture which would have been a Cordial in all my sorrows, and an Antidote against any miseries? Confess the truth, Martesia, was not your cruelty in that business, only an effect of those secret thoughts, which you knew to be in the heart of our Divine Princess? You are so very ingenious to persecute your self, replied Martesia, that I do not well know whether I ought or can undeceive you. Yet notwithstanding Sir, since I must needs be sincere with you, I shall ingeniously tell you, that all the cruelty wherewith you charge me, proceeds from my self, and the Princess has no part in it: Not but that (and questionless you would conceive it so) she would not take it well, that I should give you that Picture which she gave unto me: yet for all that her thoughts are not disadvantageous unto you, although she be a little severe; she was a lover of virtue and glory before she was acquainted with you; and you must not think it strange if she continue so still. Yet Martesia, (replied Cyrus) would she have been less virtuous if you had given me that picture? No Sir, replied she, but I had been less reasonable: Well Martesia, (said he) be more inhumane unto me, then Fortune is unto a King from whom she hath taken away his Crowns? for she notwithstanding, does allow him the sight of that Princess whom he loves, and has her in his power: Cruel woman, must the King of Pont every minute look upon the real substance of Divine Mandana, and do you deny Cyrus the sight of her picture? You have again Martesia, discovered those secret resentments which are in the heart of our Princess, and are disadvantageous unto me. Sir, (answered she smiling) you had some reason to tell me, that I ought you no thanks for this honour you have done me in coming to see me, since I see you came with a designe to quarrel with me: You may make Conditions of peace when you please, said he unto her, and indeed, it is but doing what formerly you have done: Lend me that picture of Mandana unto that day I shall deliver her, for I know the King hath restored it unto you. Sir (said she unto him) you are very urgent, but do you not consider what misfortune this picture was like to have caused? Do you not consider (said he unto her) how much joy it will be unto my soul? I know it very well (said she unto him) by that joy which this picture does usually afford my self: Ah Martesia, said he, you comprehend it but imperfectly, if you judge of my thoughts by yours: Why Sir, replied she, Do you think I do not love the Princess, as much as my capacity of loving is able? Yes Martesia, replied he, I do believe you love her with all imaginable affection; and I do think Feraulas loves me with the like affection; but certainly he knows how to love one who you know, more perfectly, then he ought to love Cyrus: You are very good (said she unto him blushing) in permitting Feraulas to love any one more then your self. But indeed I am not so indulgent; and what respect soever I bear unto you, I cannot yield that you should love the Princess better then I do: But for all that, I do conceive it fit to make my peace with you; and therefore to compose all differences, I will lend you her picture unto the day you depart for Armenia, and putting her hand into her pocket, she produced it, and gave it unto him. Cyrus was ravished with joy, and received it with as much reverence, as if Mandana were present; he kissed it, and pleased Martesia so well, that she repented not of her complacency in lending it.

After this, Cyrus having had no conference with her ever since his departure from Themiscira, asked her an hundred several questions; he desired her to relate every thing concerning the taking away of the Princess by Philidaspes; after what manner she was carried unto the City of Opis: how she was entertained at Babylon, in what sort she lived there; how the King of Assyria treated her, how she behaved her self towards Mazares; how they came out of Babylon to come unto Sinope: which way Mazares got her away, under colour of setting her at liberty; and lastly, how she fell into the hands of the King of Pont after he had lost Page 15 his Kingdoms: Martesia did fully satisfy his curiosity, but yet she would not mention that favourable Oracle which the King of Assyria received at Babylon, lest such an averse story should too much vex him: so that he thought himself sometimes most perfectly happy: For when Martesia did mention with what constant resolution Mandana had repulsed the passions of three great Princes, and all of them most compleat men, he was wrapt in unexpressible joy; and endeavouring to make her speak of more passages which were in his advantage. But yet, (said he unto Martesia, and looking as earnestly upon her as if he would penetrate into the bottom of her heart, and know every truth in it,) this noble fury with which the Divine Mandana resisted all my Rivals, was doubtless only an effect of her virtue; and the miserable Artamenes, and unfortunate Cyrus, was not any cause of it at all. Would you have me be so complacent (replied Martesia angrily) as not to contradict you? I desire to know, (said he) the pure and perfect truth, upon condition it drive me not into despair. No Sir, replied she, I shall not drive you into despair, when I shall tell you (though I had it not from the mouth of the Princess) that I see no reason she had so obstinately to reject the King of Assyria's affection, unless the Illustrious Artamenes had his entrance into her heart. But said he unto her, being full of joy, Certainly the Princess did not speak as much; these are but your own conjectures, upon which you ground these thoughts; and intend to flatter me? But however Martesia, I do <...> murmur against Mandana, I have received more honours from her, then I can deserve: <...> though she should treat me coarsely, and punish me for my rash boldness, doubtless I should not complain. After this manner did Cyrus and Martesia discourse, as oft as he could; having now only three things to do. The one was to go into the Camp, and give out all requisite Orders for the Armenia War. The other to present all imaginable humility unto Cixaxares. And the last, to go and visit Martesia: supposing it to be a kind of seeing his Princess, to see her whom she loved, and esteemed so much: Indeed, Martesia was a Lady who was excellent in all things; she was owner of all good qualities; her beauty was none of those which do planet strike, at the first sight; but it was such as the more one considered it, the more fresh charms they found in it; for she had an excellent spirit, and a solid mind; exceedingly complacent and discreet, and the more one knew her, the better one liked her: Feraulas was not the only man who courted her; for during the time she was constrained to remain at Sinope, all the Court did visit her; all the Ladies of the Town were observant of her; and all the Princes, observing with what civility Cyrus did treat her, came daily unto her, and were much delighted in her company, for indeed, it was ever very pleasant: her ingenuity was not only natural, but much adorn'd with Art, understanding most of the languages in all Europe, and Asia. Amongst the rest of her Visitants, Thrasibulus, and all those illustrious Grecians of the Army, to wit, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Leontidas, were often with her: The Prince Artibies was he who was most frequent with her, insomuch as the Company was full of sweet diversions, being composed of persons exceedingly pleasant. One day among the rest, as Martesia and Erenice her Cosen were alone together, the Prince Artibies, accompanied with Thimocrates, Philocles, and Leontidas, coming to see her, the Company questionless was very delightful, since certainly the Grecians of that time were of a much more delicate and refined Spirit, then other Nations. Artibies, though he was a Cilician, yet he was a most compleat Prince, and although he seemed to be very melancholick, yet was very sociable. Thimocrates had Nature for his friend, who adorned him with all the advantages of body, that she could contrive in one of his Sex; he had also a quick and nimble wit, which rendred him most pleasant unto company. Philocles was not less exact and compleat in all things, and the complacency of his humour was extremely charming. Leontidas was exceeding tall and handsome: The composure of his face was noble, his Physiognomy had I know not what kind of furious, sweet and melancholy composition, such as did not at all displease: and although there was some kind of discord in his humours, and a phantasticalness in his mind, yet was he exceedingly pleasant.

These four being altogether with Martesia, and the love of Cyrus being now no secret, that was the subject of their discourse; and after they had discarded upon the most considerable passages thereof, or at least, which were in their knowledge, every one began to complain of his misfortunes, according unto his own apprehensions: For my part, said Thimocrates, that which I think to be most lamented in him, is, that he has been almost always absent from her he loves; for as long as she was in Capadocia, the Bithinian War did absent him; and after his return unto Themiscira, he never saw the Princess whom he loved. This questionless is a great misfortune (replied Philocles) but yet since he lives in some hopes to be beloved, his absence is not without some consolation; and he has yet had no experience of that which in Page 16 love is more rigorous. Although he has had no experience of it, neither by absence, nor the hate of the Princess whom he loves, yet doubtless he was apprehensive of it, when he believed her to be dead, as once he did: when I do imagine in what horrid frights he was, when he feared to find his Princess reduced into ashes by the Conflagration of Sinope: and when I fancy him, hearing from the mouth of Mazares in the fishers Cabin, how his Divine Princess perished;

I do confess my compassion of him is extream; and I do conceive, that all the delights which he can hereafter enjoy, cannot equal those torments which he then endured. It is most certain (said Leontidas who had not yet spoken) that absence is a very grand affliction: not to be beloved is an angry fate; and the death of the party beloved is doubtless, a very sad piece of mourning: But yet for all this, if the Illustrious Cyrus was never jealous, (as I could never hear he was) then does he owe sacrifices of thanks unto the Gods of love, for preventing him from that torment, which exceeds all others a thousand degrees. But Leontidas, replied Martesia, do you conceive jealousy to be a greater ill, then the death of the party loved? Ah Leontidas, said she, think well what you say. I have sufficiently thought upon it, replied he, and I do feelingly speak concerning a passion which I have been too well acquainted with. For my part (said Erenice) I do conceive jealousy to be a very great evil; and do not think it strange that Leontidas should rank it among the greatest punishments of <◇>: but that Thimocrates should speak absence to be the most rigid thing in the world, <...> ceive that his soul is a little too nice and delicate. That man must be most insensible (replied he) which does not find absence to comprehend in it self all other horrors: That only is his share, who was never loved, replied Philocles, for if I may so phrase it, he heaps up all the evils of love in to one; and he who has had no experience of this, is ignorant of the supreme misfortune, That is a misfortune, added Thimocrates, wherewith a generous man will not be long tormented, since there is nothing in the world more just, natural, and reasonable, then to cease them that love not us. He who laments for the death of his Mistress (replied Philocles) if he be wise, has most reason to comfort up himself, since there is no possibility to find a remedy for his misfortune: he who is absent may find out some comfort from his hopes of return; and he who is jealous may cure himself, either by his knowledge of the virtue of her he loves, or else by his own merit, or else by despising her. You are not well acquainted with jealousy, answered Leontidas very fiercely, since you imagine it can be cured by sapient reasons: for it perverts all the reasons under the Sun; and puts the whole order of nature out of tune: Other misfortunes whereof we discourse have this advantage, that they seem no greater then they are, but jealousy is of such a Capricious, Phantastical, Malignant a nature, that it magnifies all objects, like unto those false magnifying glasses invented by some Mathematicians. It does not only make one sensible of real evils, but only of those which are merely imaginary; it causes one to suffer in that for which there is no ground at all. I do confess, said Martesia then, that Leontidas has described jealousy unto us, in such an ingenious manner, that I doubt not but if ever he was in love, this passion has not much tormented him. To speak the truth unto you, replied he, I tell my tale out of my own sad experience; and therefore I may the better be believed, when I do maintain the jealousy is the most horrid torment that can be endured: If that authority (replied Thimocrates) be sufficient to justify, that absence comprehends all the evils which love can afflict, I ought to be believed as well as you; since the better part of my life has been droopingly consumed in absence from her I love. Upon the same reason (replied Artibies) I must not yield unto either, since I do but too sadly know, that the death of her one loves is the end of all joys, and an Epitome of all sorrows. Although it be but a piece of folly (said Philocles) to publish unto the world that one could never be loved; yet I am constrained to acknowledge that out of my own experience I have found this Thesis true; As it is the greatest felicity in love, to be beloved, so by the rules of contraries, it is the greatest misery, not to be beloved by her one loves. For my part, (said Martesia) I wonder at nothing more, then that each of you should so opinionatively maintain his thought; for indeed it is a difficult thing not to think worse of ones own misfortune, then of anothers: and every one is apt to be partial in his own cause, and therefore I do not think any of you to be competent Judges upon so nice a question; although I know you all to be men of much wisdom and ingenuity. Then must you be Judge, replied Thimocrates.; for I am certain you are accomplished with all necessary qualities for the offices, since you are of a clear apprehension, and not interested at all in any of these things. It is true, replied she, but yet I never had any experience: yet notwithstanding, I do confess, (said she, and looked upon them all) that you have raised so great a curiosity in me, to know Page 17 all your adventures, that if I durst I would accept of that offer, which Thimocrates hath made unto me: and therefore I beseech you all to relate them unto me: For my part, said Artibies, I have nothing to do but to lament, & be lamented, & therefore I shall be ready to give you satisfaction in few words, and afterwards my reasons to strengthen my cause: An absent Lover (replied Thimocrates sighing) who uses to engrave his misfortunes upon the barks of trees, and to speak unto the rocks, rather then not speak at all, refuseth not to tell you his discontents. For my part, said Philocles, I was never so happy as to procure a favourable ear from any that I loved, but I shall hope to find some sweetness from another whom I do infinitely esteem. There is none then but the jealous Leontidas (said Martesia turning towards him) who will not satisfy my curiosity. No Madam, said he, I will not be any obstacle unto your satisfaction; for I am not so sparing of my words and secrets, as I am jealous of my Mistress. But sweet Martesia, after you have heard the recital of our adventures, and our reasons upon them, you must pronounce a sovereign sentence, which is the most unfortunate: he who is almost always absent from her he loves; or he who is not loved at all; or he whose Mistress is dead, or he who is plunged deeply in jealousy: To the end, that he who is the most miserable, may have so much consolation as to be lamented more then therest, and that your pity and compassion be his prize for the pains he hath taken in relating his misfortunes, and reasons. At the hazard at doing injustice through ignorance (answered Martesia) I do accept of the honour to be your Judge, upon condition that Erenice, my dear Cosen, will assist me in giving sentence: No, answered that pleasant Lady, I will not share with you in your Title, but will reserve unto my self the liberty to lament him the most, who perhaps you will pity the least. As they were thus in discourse, Cyrus, accompanied only with Aglatidas entred: and since he heard them in the outer Chamber speak with much heat; If there be any contest amongst you (said he, addressing himself unto Martesia) you know that your side shall ever be mine. You honour me too much (answered she) but Sir you must know that I am so far from quarrelling with these gallant men, that they have constituted me their Judge: and since I shall out dishonour my Office, I beseech you to undertake it, and to decide a famous difference, which is risen between the Prince Artabes, Thimocrates, Philocles, and Leontidas. Heavens, preserve me, replied Cyrus, from entertaining any thoughts so unjust, as to dispossess you from an impolymment so honourable: and I should rather take you for my own Judge, if I had any difference, then take the Office from you. After this complement, as he was the most civil Prince upon earth, and stood in need of the valour of all these Commanders, to deliver Mandana, so at this time, to gain their hearts the more, he doubled his complacency to wards them: conceiving that the more he commended them, the more courageously they would fight for his Princes. He demanded them in most sweet and pleasant terms, what might be the cause of their contest, and having in few words told it unto him: Be Judge Sir, said she, whether I was in the right in thinking you a better Judge in such a case then my self: I should be over partial, (replied he, and sighed,) and questionless, your uninterested reason would judge with more equity, then I should with all my experience: Afterwards, since this business did indeed sympathize with his own inclination, he was pleased to bestow an afternoon in such a diversion as was very suitable unto his own fortune, having no other business of consequence to do that day: for he had been at the Camp in the morning; and he had already been with the King, and dispatched all business to Echatan. After then he had placed Martesia conveniently to hear every one that spoke, and sitting himself by her, also all the rest seating themselves in order: It was his pleasure, that Thimocrates should begin, and address his Speech unto Martesia, as his Judge, although she did oppose it, after a while of silence, during which time Cyrus asked Martesia in a low voice, whether she did not pity that man, who suffered all the miseries which these four Lovers did complain against. Thimocrates began his story thus.

The Histories of unfortunate Lovers.

Before I begin to relate my particular misfortunes, I do conceive it requisite to conjure you, that you become not partially biassed, by the elegant discourses of those who deny the condition which I assume, in being the most unfortunate lover in the world: for I very well perceive, that they being less unfortunate then my self, have more freedom of Spirit then I have, and therefore can better relate their stories. He who is not loved, will doubtless dress himself in the most amiable language, and will not omit any thing which may perswade you to compassion: he who laments for the death of his Mistress, desiring to move pity, useth all his eloquence to perswade unto it: The jealous Leontidas will be sure to magnifie all his imaginary Page 18 sufferings with his Reetorick, since he is possessed with a passion that is accustomed to make the least things that can be imagined, seem great ones.

Martesia seeing Thimocrates expect her answer, did assure him, that she would not be so much convinced by words, as she would be by realities, and reasons; therefore, said she unto him, Do not you rely too much upon your own eloquence, in seeming to fear it in others? and so she commanding him to begin his Story, he obeyed, and began thus.

The absent Lover. The First History.

That Absence whereof I complain, and which I do maintain, does comprehend all the miseries which love can cause, is so great a punishment unto one who exactly knows the newness of the passion, as I am not afraid to say, that he who can be absent from her he loves without extreame sorrow, did never receive any great joy in the person he loved, and does not deserve to wear the noble Title of a Lover, I say again, the noble Title of a Lover, since it is most certain, that he is not capable of that Heroick imbecility, which hath moved many illustrious persons, who are sometimes surprized with it, to act such great attempts, as it hath done: Amongst all those who did ever resent this kind of misery whereof I now speak, certainly, I am the man, who hath had most rigid experience of it, since love did only shew me that amiable person whom I adore, to make me more sensibly apprehend her absence, with all the cruel consequences that are imaginable: Therefore I do not doubt; but at the end of my story, I shall obtain the prize of compassion, and my impartial Judge will sentence me to be the most unhappy of all these who contend for this mournful Title.

Since I came into Asia, commanding the Regiments of the King of Cyprus, and sent hither by the Prince Philoxipes; perhaps you are yet ignorant, how I was not born within that Kingdom. Give me leave therefore to acquaint you that Delphos, so famous throughout the world for the magnificent Temple of Apollo, and for the sanctity of the Oracles, is the place of my birth: and I must needs tell you, that I am descended from an illustrious Race, since I am branched from him whom the Gods thought worthy, so many ages since, to conduct unto the foot of Mount Parnassus, near the Castalian Fountain, there to receive the first Oracle which was dispensed; whose daughter afterwards was chosen to be the Prime Pithian, who pronounced so many important verities unto so many private persons, Towns, Provinces, Republicques, and Kings. Since that time, those of my family have ever held the prime Rank in their Countrey; and most commonly the famous Council of Greece, which we termed the Assembly of Amphictions, was never held, but some of my Race were elected in it: I being therefore of a considerable extraction, and the Son of one whose vertue was above his quality; I was educated with all indulgent care. And though it may be said <...> that the Town of Delphos is an Epitome of the World, by reason of that huge multitude of all Nations, which resort thither, and therefore it was not necessary for the Inhabitants to travel, for their further instruction in forraign Customes, yet my indulgent father would needs send me as a Student unto Athens, and afterwards to remain at Corinth until I was twenty years of age; And I did practise in both those famous places, all the Arts which one of my quality could require, as well in all the exercises of the body, as in the ornaments of the mind, and knowledge of the liberal Arts; so that when I received orders to return unto Delphos, it might be said, that I was a stranger in my own Countrey, since certainly I knew no body, yet did I know the names of all the prime houses of quality in the Town, and I remembred also some old men and women: but as for the young men of my own rank, or any of the springing beauties, I had no acquaintance at all amongst them. Thus came I then unto Delphos, esteeming Athens, and Corinth, as my Countrey, where notwithstanding I lived without any private engagement, although I had seen many rare beauties in both places. As I came into Delphos, I understood, that my father having some important business, was gone unto Antiores, and at his departure had left order that I should follow him as soon as I arrived. The first night, I was visited by very many, but amongst others, one of my Cosens named Melesandres, suted best with my disposition: and truly he was a youth full of spirit, and goodness, whose agreeable humour, was great delight unto me in my melancholy; as he did infinitely please me, so I had the good fortune not to displease him; and we did presently contract such an amity, as death only could dissolve. After our first civilities, I acquainted him with the orders which I received not to stay any longer at Delphos, but to go unto Antiores: but he told me that I must needs defer my departure for one day longer, for there was a very stately Ceremony to be performed the next day, and I must needs see it, I enquired what it was; he told me that there were Embassadors in Delphos from Craesus, King of Lidia, who came to consult with the Oracle, Page 19 and who had brought with them such magnificent offerings, as were the richest in all Asia Since these offerings must remain in the Temple, (said I unto him) I shall see them army return. It is true, replied he, but you cannot see in one day all the beauties in the Town assembled, as they will be to morrow at the Temple, nor can you ever see a Ceremony so great as this; For they do not use to receive private offerings in such state as they will do the offerings of Kings: As for the Ceremonies, said I unto him smiling, I can easily dispense with them. But since you assure me, I shall see all the beauty of Delphos at once, I will take your counsel, and not depart until the next day. Melesander and I, parted upon these terms, the next morning he came betimes, and since I was a stranger, undertook to shew me all the Ceremony, and get such a place where we might see all. How indifferent soever I seemed to be concerning these feasts, yet I observed them with much delight: I went as others did, to see the treasures of the Temple, which were shewed unto the Ambassadors of Craesus, before they brought their offerings: I admired, as well as they, at a most magnificent Chain of pearl, which once they say, the famous Helen was owner of: and at another also which called Eriphile Mistress: I saw there that lately Throne of gold, which the Grandfather of the King of Phrygia did bestow, and the fix great dishes which Giges sent thither, which weighed thirty Talents; also several Statues given by several Princes: The sheaves of gold which they of Smirna and Apollonia offered; two Tuns of Massie gold which were of curious workmanship, and would contain an hundred Gallons of water, being made use of it at a Feast, which we call Theophanies: I saw afterwards (amongst such amighty Mass of wealth, which I cannot exactly describe, and which were given by all the Republicques of Greece.) Obelisque of a miraculous Manufacture, given by Rhodopes that famous Lady, with whom, the Brother of prudent Sapho was in love; who to make it appear, she was in Egypt, where she lived a great part of her life, she gave those wonderfull Pyramids, which are talked of throughout the world: after I had well observed all these Rarities, and a thousand others, which I shall forbear to speak of; every one went to take his place, and the Ceremony of the sacrifice did begin: Those who were to consult with the Oracle, did come unto the foot of Parnassus, which is just over against the Temple, where they did purifie themselves at that famous Castalian Fountain; from thence they went into the Temple of the Muses, which is built upon that river, which runneth into that of Apollo, and where the Pithian, being under a glorious Canopie, and upon a stately Throne; she receives the demands of them who came to consult with the Gods: after which, she retires behind the sacred Curtain, where being inspired by the Gods, she delivers the Oracles unto them who enquire of her: Give me leave, also to tell you, besides the rich offerings of Craesus, I saw the Statue of a woman of a great stature, all of most pure gold, and most admirable workmanship: a Lamp also of engraved gold, as rich as is imaginable. But notwithstanding all these wonders, after the Companies began to settle themselves, I left off regarding them, but turned my head towards the Gate of the Temple, to observe all the Ladies which entred, and ask Melesander their names: yet because the croud was very great, I could not discern them all, and many passed by which I could not discover; but I saw many beauties enter, which I looked upon with a very indifferent eye, and serene mind, without any penetration of heart: yet when the Ceremony was ended, the better to view all the Ladies, Melesander and I went close to the Gate, to speak with two or three of his friends; and I saw one come from behind the Pillars of Marble, which sustains the Arch of the Temple, whom doubtless those Pillars had obscured from my sight as long as the Ceremony lasted; she was a beauty so admirable fair, that I was dazzled at the sparkle of her eyes, and malkick of her complexion: I no sooner spied her, but without further harkning unto what they talked, I pulled Melesander by the arm, and without taking my eyes off that wonderful object which had enchanted them, Melesander, said I unto him, shewing her, Tell me the name of yonder miracle: Her name is Telesile, replied he, whose name is as famous for the charms of her wit, and pleasantness of her humour, as it is for the excellency of her beauty. At the Name of Telesile, those who were with us interrupted our discourse, and looking upon her as she passed by us, we conged unto her, and followed her, that we might the longer see her: since she was well acquainted with Melesander, and much esteemed him, she gave him a Salute with such a pleasing smile, and so obliging an Air, that as her beauty did seem greater in my fancies, so also did my admiration; and I perceived such an unquiet joy in my heart, and such an interior tumult in my soul, that I knew not what I did; and to excuse my imbecility at that time, I was forced to tell them, that very few hearts were ever assaulted with such beautiful and powerful Arms as these which wounded mine: Telesile was about seventeen years of age; her stature was tale and stately; her garb was delightful; her Page 20 action was free, and natural: her hair was the purest black that ever eye beheld: her complexion was so lively fair, that it was not to be looked upon with imagination of Snow and Vermilion, Lillies and Roses mixed together: for Nature had adorned her face with her purest collors, adding unto these her sprightly and sparkling eyes, mixt with ingenious sweetness, an admirable mouth, fair teeth, and white neck, such as did infinitely Captivate my heart.

But alas, I had no sooner vewed the fairest Telesile, but I could not view her any more; for she went presently out of the Temple; and the next day, I went out of Delphos; so that I was no sooner in love but I was absent. As we went out of the Temple and had lost the sight of her, because her house was very near it, Melesander and I going to dine together, and his friends having left us alone: Melesander, (said I unto him) if you be not in love with Telesile, I must needs conclude you are either in love with some other, or else you are not capable of loving any thing, for I think it impossible, that any heart which is not either prepossessed or incensable, can resist such an admirable beauty as hers. If Thimocrates, answered he and smiled, did not fall in love at Athens or Corinth, I believe he presently will at Delphos, and I do heartily thank the Gods, that I shall not be his Rival, if he chance to fix upon Telesile, as I do find some likelihood that he will: I do not yet know, said I unto him, whether or no I shall love her: but I am sure I do already infinitely admire her: That is a good degree unto love, replied he unto me, But yet Thimocrates (added this officious friend, assuming a more serious countenance) do not render your self a Captive without some resistance, since there are many difficulties in the Conquest of Telesile. I will resist, said I unto him, by flying away: for you know I intend to be gon to morrow; but yet I beseech you what may those diff|culties be in the Conquest of her? Is it possible that a Lady whose eyes sparkle so much sweet|ness, should be more secure then other Ladies? Telesile (said he unto me) has hitherto been very indifferent unto all the Courtships which any have rendered her, but that is not the reason why I speake of such difficulties in her conquest, for the merit of Thimocrates might win more upon that score then any other could; but there is something more capritious on her fortune then so: be pleased to know then, (said he, seeing me to expect his farther relation) that Tellesile is of a very good house, since she is daughter unto Diophantes, which name you know, and who perhaps is very poor, and perhaps also very rich. Unless you interpret this Riddle, said I unto him, I cannot understand it. You will easily understand it, replied he, when I shall tell you that Diophantes the father of Telesile is very poor, because he ruined himself in the Boetian Wars, and therefore Thimocrates, Telesile will be also very poor, although she be the only daughter of her Father, it being most certain that although that house do yet subject, yet it is absolutely ruined: I perceive, said I unto him, that Telesile is very poor, but I do not see how she can be rich: You will understand both, replied he, when I shall inform you, how she hath an uncle called Crantor, who is very old and never married: he is the richest man, not only in Delphos, but throughout all Phosides, unto whom she shall be Heir if he do not dote and marry again, or dispose of his estate unto some other, as by the Law he may: so that since Crantor is an old humorous and covetous man, and will settle his estate upon his Niece or any else, but doth profess much affection unto her by his discourse, Telesile remains between both hopes and fears to be either the richest or the poorest Lady of her quality. This uncertainty is the reason why her Father does not think upon her marriage, not yet knowing what the destiny of his daughter will be. That which best pleaseth those who are in love (said I unto him) is, that Crantor cannot dis|inherit her of her beauty. Tis true, (said he unto me) for she has many Lovers who do look upon the treasure of the Uncle, as well as the starlike eys of the Niece, so that never any had a larger Catalogue of servants then she: for she is courted, not only by such as her beauty has Capit|vated, but also by all the rich and covetous, and all the ambitious poor ones that are in Delphos: some of them not over engaging themselves, but staying to see what Crantor will do; and others do strive to marry her, poor as she is, and will put all their hopes of the future to hazard: yet either by reason of Telesiles indifferencie, or Diophantes his prudence, all her lovers are kept at a distance, and hope well. See Thimocrites the fate of this fair one, with whom I do ad|vise you, not to engage your self inconsiderately. I gave Melesander thanks for his counsel, and entering into other discourse we dined and pleasantly passed away the rest of the day together: yet do what I could, it was impossible to drive the beauty which I had seen out of my Imagination; nor could I forbear discourse concerning her, although I did resolve it: When we did meet any one of quality in the streets; there goes a greedy lover of Telesile (said I unto Melesander,) and when I looked upon any Lady, I could not chuse but say, she was not half so faire as Telesile, and named* her above a Thousand times in a day, before I ever thought upon it. Mean while the Morning came, and I must go unto Anticira, and although this place had Page 21 a reputation to recover reason in them that had lost it; yet it deprived me of mine, I was then some ten or twelve days with my Father, for love had not yet imprinted the beauty of Tellesile so deeply in my heart, but that I could endure this absence; yet would it not suffer me to belong from her: Notwithstanding, although I can say that sorrow did not much seize upon me during this journey, yet I am certain that I found little joy in returning to Delphos, where I had yet no acquaintance but with Melesander: but to tell you truly, my heart held greater intelligence with Telesile then I was awar of. And certainly there was some simpat|hical Power in it, which in a minuit did force me to love her, whom I loved all my life. I perceived it at my entrance into Delphos; for meeting a Coach full of Ladies as they were going into the Country, as seemed by their equipage, I looked precisely into it. But oh Heavens, what pleasing trouble did I find in my soul when I saw Telesile in it, a Thousand times more fairer then she seemed before, when I saw her in the Temple: the Coach went softly by reason of some stop in the way, which of it self was very narrow, so that I had leasure to observe her with more attention then I did at the first time, for she had not pulled down her hood, but alas, I my self did draw a curtain between me and her beauty, after I did salute her with a ve|ry low conguy, I looked upon her so earnestly, and perhaps too impudently, that she blushed, and pulled down her hood, as if the sun had trubled her. As soon as I was in the Town I went unto Melesander, and told him that fortune had as great a care of my preservation as he had; for to guard me from the enchanting charms of Telesile, she was gone out of Del|phos as I came in: You have better intelligence of her actions, (said he unto me smiling) then some of her lovers, that are of more ancient acquaintance then you are: for she did undertake a little journey unto one of my Cosens, and I thought that none could yet have known it: But so it is, (said I unto him) that I do know of it, for I did see her depart: though I do not think that I am yet in love with her, (said I laughing, though I spoke it seriously) yet am I very glad to understand her journey is but short, and will not be long before she return. It will not be above four days, said he, during which time I must shew you all the rarities in Delphos, in hopes if it be possible to find an antidote in the eyes of some other beauty, against the chrams of Telesile. I did laugh at the pleasant invention of Melesander, and consented to do as he would have me: and during those four days, he carried me unto all the beauties: But the truth is, his design took no effect; nor served to no other purpose but to let me see that there was none in Delphos who came within a Thousand degrees of Telesile: Mean while, this fair one, returned from the country: and her return did give fresh invitations of visit unto all her friends; Melesandor went to her, and whether he would or no I went with him; though he told me a hundred times that he was unwilling to contribute unto the loss of my liberty: but in conclu|sion, my prayers prevailed with him, and he presented me unto the mother of Telesile, who treated me very civilly; and afterwards, I was presented unto Telesile her self, in whom I found ten Thousand alluring charms more then I could have imagined, although I fancied her Idea in my mind, as fair as fancy could imagine: I saw her, I saw she was most sweet and civil, most modest and gallant, and of a most pleasing spirit, indeed amongst a Thousand perfections I found not one fault: but that which pleased above all was, That amongst so many servants as Courted her, I could not observe she savored any, and by consequence engaged mee the more, and notwithstanding her sweet disposition, she had such a kind of noble pride in her soul, as made her to Triumph over all hearts without vanity: and she made absolute Conquests of all that saw her, without contributing any of her endeavors to do it. As love was resolved upon my distruction, so it moved her, that day to give me some hopes to thrive in my new begun passion: for as I told her that my intentions were to wait upon her the first day I came to Delphos: You have been a long while (said she) in executing those intentions which were a great honour unto me since; If I mistake not, you were here that day the King of Lidea offered his presents in the Temple, and if my memory betray me not, I saw you there with Melesan|der; and I did then look upon you as a stranger, whose name I much desired to know; and indeed (said she most obligingly) I did enquire it of one of my friends, but could not be satisf|ied. This discourse, which was only civil, and might have passed for discourse sake between two strangers, had such an influence upon me, that I conceived it to be a happy Omen: after|wards I told her for my Justification, that I had since been at Anticira, and returned not un|til that day she went out of Dolphos; and that then I did my self the honour to salute her neer the Gates of the Town: she then seemed as if she did not mind it, because she could not acknowledg it, without taking notice how earnestly I looked upon her; but afterwards, she was so good as to confess that it was so. This innocent passage caused her to blush, and from thence I grounded fresh hopes unto my self. I parted from her as strongly fettered in the Page 22 chains of love as ever man was, and fully resolved to dedicate my self unto her service. I ne|ver endeavored, as others use, to resist my passion; but on the contrary, I cheered up my soul in the humour as much as I could. I did imagin, that happily I might chance to be the fortu|nate man, for whom her soul was most sensible: for, said I, since all the men in Delphos do find their Courtships fruitless, I may more certainly conclude that she has not yet met with such a man, as she can fancy: If I do consider her as rich, it will the sooner advance my designe, because my Father will not then oppose it; if I do consider her as poor, I shall be the more easily happy, for then her Father will not refuse the motion: indeed I did fancy a facility out of every thing, and so much feared lest my reason should contradict my passion, as that I did never consult with it at all: I desired to keep it as a secret, from Melesander, but it could not be; the flame which the fair eyes of Telesile, had kindled in my heart, was too great, and ar|dent not to appear in mine, and I expressed too many signs of my affection, to conceal it or keep it from being discovered: he could not motion any divertisement wherein I could take any pleasure, walks were but musing unto me; Musique made me only sigh my self into a dampish study; the sight of all the Ladies in the Town, moved me no more then a stone. The sight of Telesile only was my dilectable object, and did with interest recompence me for the loss of all other delights: I was so transported with joy, when I saw her but one single minute, that Melesander saw plainly I was in love, as well as by my musings and melancholy: It was very requisit therefore to acknowledg it unto him; and to desire him that he would not oppose me in such a thing as could not be remedied, but that he would assist me in my design: I told him this, after such a manner, as he might well know, his counsels took no effect, and therefore, he did most willingly promise me his help. Then I went several times unto Tele|sile, and the offer I went, more charms and greater civilities I found: This new Conquest which she had made upon my heart, was quickly divulged throughout the Town, especially unto both our Fathers, who were neither of them displeased at it: For the beleef which my Father had, that she would be very rich, was glad in hopes of such a fortune, as might re|pair the Profusions of his youth; for truly, his Magnificence, and Liberality had much engaged it. And Diophantes for his part, fearing left his daughter should become poor, was not sorry that such a man as I, was in love with her: But he carryed the matter so cunningly, that he seemed not to take any notice of it: and he was so well acquainted with the vertue of his daughter, that he did not fear she would too far engage her self, though she was courted by a multitude of men. But amongst the number of her servants, there was one, who was exceeding rich, and indeed much above me, though he was not of any considerable family, yet was he very assiduuous and violent in his passion. This man was called Androclides, and had a sister who did often visit Telesile: and lodging neer Crantor, was sometimes visited again, so that Androclides had a very great advantage of me; for his sister did not only solicit Telesile, but her uncle also: This was a very considerable circumstance for him who had as amorous an eye, upon the riches of Crantor, as upon the beauty of Telesile: For my part, it was the riches of her own self which I sought after; and preferred one sight of her before all the Treasures up|on Earth: My endeavours to move her heart, were only by letting her fee how much mine suffered: for indeed a few days after, I endured as much torment as a man in love could pos|sibly do; so that I saw her no more; and was so far from any hopes, as I absolutly dispaired: if I considered her as rich, then I thought Andnoclides would obtain the approbation of Di|ophantes, and Crantor to my absolute prejudice. If I thought upon her as poor, then my Fa|ther would thwart my design: but the thing which most grieved me, was that which at the beginning did most please me, I mean, that close indifference which she used unto all: for find|ing her the same unto me as unto others, the same equality seemed severe unto my self, which seemed a delight when it was used unto others: Yet notwithstanding, I no sooner saw her, but my sorrows vanished: and indeed the very sight of the Person beloved, is an infallible re|medy against all miseries: there is such a secret kind of charmin it, as suspends the most sen|sible sorrows. I were not able to support my misery, unless I did sometimes enjoy her pre|sence: my passion is grown to that extremity, that I am not only unhappy when I am from her; but I am far from happiness when I am not alone with her: neither is that sufficient to dissipate my discontents, and compleat my joy, unless I be respected, nor yet that, unless someti|mes my eyes do incorporate with hers, which moves a joy so pure in my soul, as usually the excess thereof produces a most pleasing disorder in the hearts of all them which knows truly how to love.

Thus for a long time did I live with her, finding no fit opportunities to discover my love, otherwise then by my respects and submissions: for besides that abundance of servants which Page 23 were continually courting her, I observed, that though she was ever very civil, yet she pre|vented all occasions of my talking in love with her, and the Sister of Androclides was also so circumspect about her, that I could never discourse of any things but such as were indifferent: I intreated Melesander to dissemble a love unto this Sister, whose name was Atalia; to the end, he discoursing often with her, he might take her off, and afford me opportunity to talk with Telesia; but in lieu of doing that office for me, he returned me an angry answer without any assistance. But to make some proofs of the miseries of absence, as it was the most plea|sant time of the year, and Diophantes having a house under the Mountain of Himelta, which was the most pleasant Seat of all Phocides, he often went thither, and five or six of those journeys, with his whole family, made me as restless as any heart could be capable of: every minute seemed a day, every hour a whole year, and every day an age, but such an age, wherein melancholy was the sole commander of my soul; When I understood that Diophan|tes carried company with him, I was sorry for it, because I feared lest some should plead for my Rival, when none went with him, then I pitied the solitude of Telesile; and her discon|tents which I did imagine she found, did move the like in me: when Atalia went with her, I was desperate; when she was in Delphos, the frequent conversation which she had with Crantor, did extreemly trouble me; and I enjoyed not one minute of rest, as long as Telesile was absent. Delphos was as a desert unto me, the whole Town did put on another face when she departed, and put on a fresh lustre when she returned: if I walked at any time to shun company, my walk was always towards her lodging; and I walked so far one day in a musing study, that it might rather be termed a journey, than a walk. The Sun by its absence did not work a greater change upon the Universe, than the glorious eyes of Telesia did upon my heart, when they were absent: Sometimes would I say unto my self, Did she but know I loved her, I should have so much satisfaction at the least, as to think, that perhaps she sometimes thinks upon me, and that though I am absent from her eyes, yet I am not so from her soul. But alas, pursued I, I am certainly further absent from her thoughts, then from her person, and the unhappy Thimocrates has not place either in her heart or memory: But ah me, would I sometimes say in my self, Do I not see Telesile in every place? is she not continually in my mind, in my soul, in my imagination, and in my memory? Yes, yes, Telesile is inseparable from Thimocrates, but for a consolation in so cruel an absence, Thimocrates ought to be as inseparable from Telesile, and for a comfort in my sorrows, she ought to endure a part of that which I endure, so that she might the better judge of my sufferings, by what she suffers her self: yet were there any equity in wishing the most amiable and excellent Lady in the world to suffer that for me, which I suffer for her? No, no, I am unjust in my desires, and do wish things most unreasonable; All that I desire therefore shall be, that where she is, she will not think upon any of my Rivals; that Androclides especially have no place in her memory, and that the unhappy Thimocrates have a little room there. Perhaps it may be said unto me, that in my complaint against the miseries of absence, I do confound things, and mingle some passages of jealousy amongst my stories; yet it is most certain, that none of those jealous thoughts had ever come unto my heart, but during absence; and the truth is, I cannot think it possible for any to be absent from the party loved, but he must be a little jealous; yes, and after a more cruel manner than they are, who are jealous through fantasticalness, or weakness, in the sight of the party whom they love; but I never had the least thought of any such thing in the presence of Telesile; my jealousy did always vanish at her appearance, as a misty vapour does when the Sun breaks out; and her absence made my soul sensible of all the miseries which love can cause. Mean while, the report of all the Town was, that Crantor did often visit Atalia, and that she did sollicite extremely for her brother; and it was believed that within few days Androclides would marry Telesile. This report had not yet reached my ear, Melesander during this time was gone into the Country; and absence was ever so fatal unto me, that the absence of my friend, as well as my Mistress, was very vexatious unto me. My father, who knew of the business, and would not have me so much dishonoured as to have Androclides preferred before me; and who also knew that as long as I continued at Delphos, it would be a difficult matter for me to cease my love unto Telesile, but that I should never endure that Androclides should marry her, and would oppose it by all ways, that an amorous heart could imagine; he therefore determined upon a course, which caused me most sensible sorrow, although in all appearance it should have rejoiced me, because it was honourable.

At that time, when the famous Council of Greece, whereof before I spoke, was assembled: my father to the end he might send me away from that place, where he apprehended some misfortune might befall me, procured me to be chosen by the Amphictions, to be sent unto Milete, Page 24 (from whence the Prince Thrasibulus was come for some reasons, which would be too long to relate,) to the end I might bring back a true relation of all the passages in that famous Town, which then was divided into two opposite factions: for although the Milesians had sent a Deputy unto the Assembly, which did sit in the Temple of Apollo, as Judges of their differences, although the Asiaticque Greeks did not use to acknowledge them to be so, yet notwithstanding, since it was the party opposite unto the sage Thales the Milesian, the Amphictions, would be informed by some other way, and I was named for the business: Questionless there was never any of my age had such an honour conferred upon him, and at any other time I should have infinitely rejoiced at it: for indeed, to be chosen by the Grandees of Greece, for an Agent unto the Milesians in a business of that concernment, was an honour, which any man who was not in love might be highly ambitious of. This absence procured me misery insupportable; It was true, that the business was honourable, and very likely not to last long; my Rivals were all vexed at it, and it might well procure more esteem in the mind of Telesile, yet did I receive this honour with extremest sorrow, and since it would absent me from her I loved, all ambitious thoughts were far from my heart; and my misery seemed so great, that I could think upon nothing but it; yet there was no remedy, I could not without dishonour refuse it, nor deny it unless I should lose my self in the opinion of Telesile, and the world. Both my honour and my love therefore requiring it, I did obey, and within three days after departed, I endeavoured as I could, to defer it for a while, but it could not be obtained: I had therefore no more to do, but to imply that short time I was to stay in Delphos, as well as I could; I committed the preparations for my journey altogether unto my servants, and busied my self in nothing but watching opportunity to speak with Telesile in private; being fully resolved after a long contest with my self, to acquaint her with my love, if I could: but I was so unfortunate the two first dayes, that I could neither speak with her, nor see her, because she was not well: The last day of my being at Delphos being come, I was extremely sad: Alas, said I unto my self, must I depart, and not so much as see Telesile? or acquainting her how that I love her the best of any man in the world? No, no, I cannot do it; death would then be more sweet unto me than my departure. I did rise that day extream early, although I knew it would be noon before I could see Telesile, if I saw her at all, but indeed the reason was, because I was not Master of my reason, or my own thoughts. I went to bid adieu unto several of my acquaintance, but in what Quarter of the Town soever they dwelt, I was sure to pass by the house of Telesile, either in going, or coming, or both, thinking it some kind of consolation to be near her, though I could not see her: I received all complements concerning my voyage so coldly, as surprized every one that observed it: and I carried my self so indifferently, as I wonder none told the Amphictions, they had made a bad choice of such an Agent, for such an important business.

In the afternoon I went to Diophantes to bid him adieu, he embraced me very civilly, but since I found him within two paces of his own gates, our discourse was not long, and I asked his permission to bid adieu unto the rest of his family: he told me that Taxile his wife was not within, but yet although Telesile was alone, and not well, yet he desired she should see me, and commanded one of her women to conduct me unto her Chamber: Diophantes would have been so ceremonious as to conduct me himself, but I would by no means suffer him: at last he left me, and I went by his permission to bid adieu unto Telesile: I was so happy as to find her alone without any company, but two women which waited upon her: As her sickness was not great, so she kept her chamber, and not her bed: a little heaviness in her eyes, me thought, made her more amiable, and I thought her so fair that day, as my sorrows to leave her increased: Though she had been told I was coming into her Chamber, yet was she much surprized at it. Thimocrates (said she unto me) what's the reason you visit me at such a time, when none sees me? It is Madam (said I, saluting her, and coming to her with all reverence) because Diophantes thought it just to permit me, so much honour as to see you, and bid you adieu, before I went unto Milete. As I had not seen her since I was chosen for that negotiation, she seemed to be very much joyed at the honour which was done me, and commanded a chair to be given me, she expressed much civility unto me concerning that business. If my adored Telesile had expressed so much joy in her eyes, for any good fortune which had arrived unto me, without such a dismal separation from her, I should have received it with extream delight, and esteemed my self most happy, but since my passion thought her something cruel in rejoicing at that which deprived me of her presence, I answered her complements only with sighs. Madam, said I unto her, you are extremely good to rejoice at any thing which is advantageous unto me; but I do not know whether you would be as sensible of my bad fortune, Page 25 as you seem to be of my good. You suspect my Generosity (replied she, smiling) since you think that I will interest my self only in the good fortune of my friends. Truly Thimocrates, (added she, and sweetly chiding me) you take my rejoicing at your good fortune in so bad a sense, that if any adverse accident happen unto you, I think I may without injustice not be sorry for it, and I am a little angry that it will be a long time before I can be revenged upon you, after that manner; for you are going unto a place where you will have much applause; you will return back hither, after you have acquitted your self as worthy of that employment which is conferred upon you, with abundance of honour. But since I cannot revenge my self by not taking any part in your misfortunes, perhaps I shall do it in not taking any part of your joy. Since revenge is secret (replied I unto her) and since I see you would punish me, I will afford you a most fit subject; and tell you, that I am at this present the most miserable of all men living. The most miserable? (replied she craftily,) for she perceived that I intended to speak concerning my passion, which she had formerly observed.) If you be so, then do not acquaint me with your misfortune: for I do not hate you enough to rejoice at it, nor can I at this time grieve at it without the hazard of my health; which, since you are very generous, I hope you will consider it: I then said, Truly Madam, (replied I) when I told you that you would share only in my good fortunes, but not in my bad: But since I have not so much vanity as to think that my most violent sorrows, will move any other then slight ones in you, I will discover some part of my misfortunes unto you: Then you are fuller of revenge then I am, (replied she) for I do presently repent of my intentions to be revenged, and you do persist to punish me for a thing which I did but one minute think upon: I do intend no revenge or punishment Madam, (said I unto her) but on the contrary, I endeavour to give you an occasion of it. No Thimocrates, said she unto me, I would not have you acquaint me with any thing, which may be disadvantageous unto you. Doubtless (said I unto her) you do already know, that which causeth my misfortune, and I have told it unto you since I came hither. If you did tell it unto me (said she in great amazement) then I did not understand you. Pardon me Madam (replied I) for you gave me an answer unto it. Then surely I do not remember it (said she) and certainly it is no great misfortune since it made no deeper impression in my memory. Hence it is, Madam, said I unto her, that my departure is so indifferent unto you: You know, said she, that I used some expressions of joy at it. You would have done me a greater favour (said I unto her, and blushed) if you had been troubled at it: and it were more equitable to lament the ill you have caused, then to rejoice at the good which you did not cause. Oh Thimocrates, (said she unto me) I will not share either in your joys, or sorrows, for I perceive you speak not seriously. Madam (said I unto her) you cannot, without doing me manifest wrong, think, but that I speak with all possible sincerity, when I do assure you, that I shall depart from you with such excessive sorrow, as cannot be compared unto any thing, but the same passion which caused it.

Telesile stood amazed at my discourse, but desiring to turn it into a piece of Raillery; Thimocrates, (said she unto me laughing,) I see you are in the fashion, and as other young Gallants of your age and quality in Delphos, do use, you must make a shew as if you did not hate me. But know, I beseech you, that I did never contribute any thing unto your humour: and that I do know my self too well to believe any such things; and for your particular, I do esteem you so much, that I will not believe you: for Thimocrates, if I should once believe you were in earnest, I should then accord your company, which yet is very delightfull unto me: therefore if the sight of me do give you any satisfaction, desist from that which will be prejudicial unto you, and counterfeit affection no longer. I do not counterfeit (said I unto her) but tell you a most certain truth, when I tell you, that my soul loves you more then all the rest of your lovers, put them all together. Since my father (replied Telesile) did not give you any permission to talk of any such things, I think I may without any incivility desire you, either to change your discourse, or else to make haste, and take your leave. That is a most cruel word (said I unto her) and I will defer it as long as I can; if it be possible I can do it at all, and not die. As she was about to answer me, and assumed a more serious countenance, which made me tremble, Atalia, the Sister of Androclides, came in: Sister (said Atalia unto her, for so they called one another) I did think that I only should have enjoyed that privilege which you were pleased to grant me, of seeing you whilst you continued ill: and yet though I perceive that Thimocrates enjoys that happiness as well as I, I will not be jealous: There is this difference betwixt you two, (answered Telesile) that you are here by my own consent, and Thimocrates is here by the consent of my father. Since it is so (replied Atalia) I am very well satisfied: So am not I, (replied I) but on the contrary, shall lament my departure from Delphos: You Page 26 have no reason to do so, replied Atalia, since this voyage will prefer you unto honour. I do not, value that at all, replied I. You have no reason to do so (answered Telesile, who durst hardly look upon me) since there is nothing which ought to be so dear unto you: After this, two of her Cofens entred, and I was obliged to go away. But when Telesile, who would not be uncivil before those Ladies, brought me to her Chamber door, Madam, said I unto her, in a low voice, if I do not die with sorrow during my journey, my heart shall return full of the same passion which at this departure it is possessed with: I wish your voyage may be prosperous, (said she unto me blushing) and I wish (said she in a low voice) you may return wiser then you seem to be at parting, to the end Telesile may for ever esteem you, as according to your merit she ever did. She spoke with such a modest Air, seeming to be neither serious nor in jest, that I knew not well how to resent it: So that from the time of parting, I found my heart so extremely troubled, as that for many hours after I could not think upon any thing: But the next morning I departed in such despair, as is not expressible; for every step being further from Telesile, I was sensible of so much sorrow as none can imagine, who never had trial of the like misery: Questionless it was much advantageous unto me, that my instructions were in writing, since certainly I should have very ill acquitted my self of my Commission, if they had trusted unto my memory: Telesile was all my thoughts. I considered how I left the sister of Androclides in her Chamber; how I had left an infinite number of her

Lovers at Dellphos: my imagination did present every one of them unto me, both the rich and the poor ones; the handsom and ill favoured; not one of them, but sometimes I did fear them: in such a cruel manner does absence make every thing appear. When I was in Delphos, my soul found sometimes some tranquility, for when I was with my amiable Telesile, I was not unhappy; and when I was not with her, yet I knew where she was, what she said, how she did: So that, if Androclides should not see her more then I did, I should not have cared for any others; for he was the richest, and more welcome then all the rest. But when I began to consider, that it was absolutely impossible for me to know how she did, I was then most extremely melancholy: I concited her in the mornings to be in the Temple, waited upon by Troops of Rivals: in the afternoons I did imagine her to be discoursing with them, and they with her; at night, me thought I saw her talk of all the passages in the day: but of all the four and twenty hours, I could not find one minute, wherein I could reasonably hope, she ever thought upon me. Thus did I live without any consolation, until I began to think that Melesander was returned unto Delphos; for this I confess, I began sometimes to cheer up my self in the thought, that this officious friend would sometimes speak unto her concerning me, since at my departure I left a Letter for him which desired as much. But although this thought produced some sweet minutes, yet it was seconded by others of a more bitter temper; for I had such an extream desire to know, how she would speak concerning me unto Melesander, after I had discovered my passion unto her, that it did make me most melancholy and restless: I could meet with nothing that was pleasing or sutable unto me, my inclination was so disposed unto choler, that the least fault of my Servant did at this time anger me more then the greatest would at another: and if love had not something tempered me, and told me that I must acquit my self of my imployment with some honour, certainly I should have rendred but a strange account of my negotiation: but when I considered, that the honour which might accrue unto me by it, might render the more in favour with Telesile, I began to rouse up my spirits, and no sooner arrived at Milete, but began to transact with as much alacrity and diligence as was possible: I will not insist upon the passages of this great business, since it would be too long to relate, and is not at all pertinent unto the story of my Love, which is the only thing I aim at: Give me leave to tell you only thus much, that notwithstanding all my cares, I was two whole months in Milete, and heard not any news from Delphos, because the winds were continually contrary for any Navigation: I thought at first, that my sorrows would diminish, but yet my soul would not suffer them; for I found that time did more augment my melancholy; and certainly those passions which lessen by long absence, are of a mean quality, and never knew extreams. Whensoever the wise Thales, with whom I transacted against the opposite faction, told me of any obstacle in our affairs, I appeared to be so extremely troubled at it, that this wise man, who could not drive into my heart, did think me the most ambitious man of honour in the world, and the best Agent that ever could be chosen: when it pleased the Fates that I had happily finished all my business, I departed from Milete, and returned to Delphos: And if it become me to say it, I got honour enough by the transaction of that important Affair; the wise Thales did me the favour to write unto the Amphictions in my behalf, and in such a manner as was very advantageous for me, so that I had very good cause of rejoicing, but my soul was accustomed Page 25 unto melancholy, that it could not relish any manner of joy; for amidst my hopes of seeing Telesile again, my fears to find some alteration in her fortune, which might prove disadvantageous unto me, did infinitely trouble me; yet notwithstanding, when I did imagine I should see her, and that mine eyes should again incorporate with hers, I was infinitely pleased: In short, to abbreviate my discourse, I arrived at Delphos, but it was so late that my father was in bed; so that I went to lie with Melesander, in hopes to hear some news of Telesile: and since he kept no very good hours, I went into his Chamber; this pleasing surprise caused him to embrace me with extream joy, and I him with no less: But yet not knowing what I should hear concerning Telesile, I durst not much rejoice: I looked in his eyes for that which was in mine own, and after I desired him to bid his servants retire. Well Melesander (said I unto him) is Telesile the same she was? Is she as fair as ever? Has not my absence been favourable unto some of my Rivals? I have so many things to tell you (answered he) that I know not where to begin: and there has been such alterations in your affairs, that you will much wonder at them. Ah Melesander, (said I unto him) Tell me quickly in gross what they are? But if Telesile be either dead, or married, tell me only that I must die, to the end my despair may last no longer. Telesile, replied he, is living, and as fair as ever, neither is she yet married unto any of your Rivals. This answer having calmed my soul; and being now only inquisitive to know what this alteration might be, I understood, that as soon as I departed, all my Rivals rejoiced at my absence, though the cause of it did trouble them, because indeed I was the Rival they most feared: amongst the rest Androclides was well pleased at it; yet, said Melesander unto me, since his mind is divided between the hoped for riches of Telesile, and her beauty, he desired his Sister to solicit as much as she could against all his Rivals, and to prepare the mind of Telesile for him as well as she could; and without telling her the true ground of his affection, he did desire her to protract the business as long as she could. But the truth is, although he was in love with Telesile, yet he desired not to marry her until Crantor had settled his Estate upon her, as he hoped he would by the solicitations of his Sister, which was very frequently with him. But to make you better understand (O my equitable Judge) all that Melesander told me; be pleased to know, that Atalia, who loved the riches of Crantor, as well as her brother, did make as if she believed that Androclides desired her to solicit for him, only out of his affection unto Telesile, and that being so passionate as he was, he would marry her either poor, or rich: so that she having observed that Crantor was most sensibly moved at her beauty, (for indeed she was very fair) she omitted nothing that might win upon the heart of a covetous man; she discoursed with him concerning nothing but household matters: she would chide him for his superfluous expences, and seemed to affect all the delectations which men of his age & disposition use; insomuch as Crantor esteemed her as she desired, and propound marriage unto her. Atalia, who was not very rich, being Sister unto Androclides by the mothers side, did harken unto the Proposition, and asked counsel of none, but assuring Crantor of her consent; she sent unto Androclides in the morning to come and speak with her: Brother, said she unto him, as soon as he came into her Chamber, If it be really true that you love Telesile, I have great news to tell you, for the truth is, I know of an infallible way how you may marry her, if you please: Dear Sister (said he unto her) how infinitely should I be obliged unto you, if by your frequent conversation with Crantor, you could move him to do that which in all reason he should? I ask your pardon (said he unto her) for causing you to keep company so much with a man of his years, whose humours cannot be any thing agreeable, or pleasant unto you. Brother (said she) I perceive you do not understand the way how you may marry Telesile, nor do you know what I would do to compass it: and therefore I will tell you, that it cannot be brought about, unless I sacrifice my self for you, and deprive my self of all manner of pleasures in this world. I should be most unhappy, replied Androclides, if my felicity should make you unfortunate: but yet what odd way is this, which I cannot imagine? It is (said she, blushing, and half laughing) that Crantor being perswaded I am rich, would marry me. Androclides was so amazed at this, that he thought he had mistaken her. Would Crantor (said he) marry you? what does he intend by that? He intends, said she unto him, to marry Telesile unto you, as soon as he hath married me: so that Brother, your good fortune does at present absolutely depend upon my will: for if I do satisfy his passion, he assures me he will satisfy yours; and he will move Diophantes to give Telesile unto you: Brother (pursued she) to marry a man of his age and humour, is a thing which I can never do with great repugnance; yet my love to you is so prevalent, that I will master my aversion towards him, and I do assure you, that the delight which you will receive by enjoying Telesile, will comfort me, much more then all the treasures Page 28 of Crantor. Whilst Atalia spoke thus unto him, he was so astonished, that he knew not what to answer: and since he was much troubled to make his sister understand, that avarice had as great possession of his soul as love, he went very subtil to work. Dear sister, said he unto her, I shall never give my consent that you should make yourself unhappy, all the days of your life, for the love of me; and although I do passionately love Telesile, yet I will never marry her upon such conditions as that you shall marry Crantor. Brother, said she unto him, if there were any other remedy for your disease, I should never have recourse unto this; but since there is none, I am resolved to be generous, and oblige you whether you will or no: I know very well, said she further, that you wish in your heart, that I were already the wife of Crantor, so you might marry Telesile, and that it is out of a complement you are opposite to that which you think will not please me; for I cannot think you believe me so base, as to imagine more satisfaction in the riches of Crantor, then I expect melancholy in his disposition: so that being perswaded you cannot be happy but by my means, therefore I am resolved to contribute unto your happiness without your consent. Oh dear Sister, answered he, I will never suffer it: do you not consider the extream old age of Crantor, his humours, and his covetous dispositions? Brother, said she, I will not think upon any thing but the admirable beauty of Telesile, the enjoyment of whom, will make you eternally happy. Androclides even desperate to hear Atalia talk so, told her, that since it was her own interest which moved her unto this, he desired her to consider, how in marrying Crantor she would infinitely displease Telesile, since she prevented her from being the richest match in all Phocides. For my part sister, said he unto her, I should find happiness enough in the beauty of Telesile, but I knew not whether she would find it without the Treasures of Crantor, and whether she will not be revenged upon me for the prejudice you should do her: No, no (replied Atalia) for since Telesile has not a covetous soul, she will not care so much as you think for that loss; but rather be glad to find such a fortune as yours. So that all the evil in it will only reflect upon me: all the hope is, it will not continue long. Androclides used many arguments to dissuade, and Atalia to persuade, whilst neither of them expressed their real thoughts, but both endeavoring to deceive each other: And thus they parted, Androclides conjuring his sister not to consent unto the marriage, and she saying that she was resolved upon it. Afterwards, since she was absolute Mistress of Crantors mind, she sent to desire him that he would come unto her, and she carried the matter so cunningly, that she perswaded him to marry her without any Ceremony, by reason of Diophantes; and since Androclides her brother intended to marry his Niece, she did not need to ask his consent. So that without any longer delay, he married her the next morning, in the presence of five or six persons who had dependance upon himself, and the next day following carried her into the country, to avoid such talk, as uses to be of such marriages. Mean while Androclides was extremely troubled at it, and the star-like eyes of Telesile could not comfort him; but when he understood the business was past, he fell into an inconceivable despair. Yet since he did not absolutely believe it, he went unto a friend of his, who often visited Telesile, to enquire the certainty of it; and found there more then he expected, for Telesile was there also, being come to enquire of Crantors marriage: That which was most observable, was that Androclides seemed more troubled at it then Telesile, whose generous Soul stood unshaken at the accident; and whose mind was so free as to observe, that the sorrows of Androclides were grounded upon an interest: he addressed himself unto her amazedly, and desired her not to think that he was accessory unto his sisters design, but would have prevented it if he could: I believe it, (answered Telesile coldly) and I know you well enough to make any doubt of it. But Androclides, said he, since the fair Atalia your sister, is perhaps more joyed to have gotten the wealth of Crantor, then I am sorry for the loss of it, I do conceive it more just for you to go and rejoice with her, then to stay here, and trouble your self with me, who I assure has patience and reason enough about me, to endure as great a misfortune as this is. It seems, said Androclides, that I am more sensible of your misfortunes then you your self is: It seems also, replied she, that your disposition and mine is different, and therefore do not look upon things after the same manner: Telesile did not intend any long visit, and therefore she returned home, where she found Diophantes, and Taxale, extremely troubled, at the news which they had heard of: This wise young Lady did comfort them as well as she could; and though she was sensible enough of the loss, yet she desired them, not to resent it so deeply, assuring them for her part, that she had no such kind of ambition, she would not be troubled at all for it, so they would cheer up themselves. In the mean time, all the lovers of Telesile, were much surprised: those who were not rich durst not think any Page 29 more of marrying one who was not, left they should make both her and themselves miserable: they imagined also that she would not consent unto it, there being greater reason why a woman which is rich, should marry a compleat man who hath little, then that two persons of quality who are both poor, should marry together. But as for Androclides, though he was very rich, yet since he found a great alteration in the fortunes of Telesile, he found an alteration in her also; yet he was ashamed to make his appear unto the world at first, and truly he did affect her with as much love as he was capable of, and therefore he did visit her according to his usual custom, and found all his Rivals there also: for never was any so much pityed as she was upon this occasion, and they could not have shared deeper in her sorrows, if she had lost all that was dear unto her: But yet within a few days after, visits were not so frequent, and amongst the rest, Androclides did often balk the house, and when he did step in to see her he spoke only concerning things indifferent; and one day, pumping for a handsom pretence to estrange himself the more, he told her, that he observed Diophantes her father did of late salute him very coldly, and as he heard, he used to speak very ill concerning Atalia, who was his sister, and it therefore reflected upon him.

Androclides, (said Telesile unto him, who knew the real reason of this exception) you need not trouble your self so much as to seek for any pretence to cloak your desires of seeing me no more, it is free for every one to follow his own inclination: and since I know you can't love the fairest woman upon Earth, unless she be rich: so my humour is something contrary to yours, for I cannot love the richest man in all Greece, if he be not owner of a soul which soars higher than his riches: So that I think it will be advantageous unto us both, if you desist from offering out of a false kind of generosity, your complements unto one who has lost all that can make her amiable in your eye. Androclides was so surprised at the freedom of Telesiles discourse, that he began to protest, his thoughts were all contrary to what she said, but it was with such a forced air, and in so many ambiguous words, as if he feared to speak too much, or engage himself further then he had a mind: Telesile then looking upon him with a scornfull kind of smile; No, no, Androclides, (said she unto him) dissemble it no longer, and leave me liberty to enjoy a Treasure which I prefer before such things as most moves your disposition, I mean a Liberty to enjoy my thoughts alone: Androclides taking opportunity by the toppling, made use of this occasion, and quite left off his visits, as many others besides did; so that within a short time the house of Diophantes was as solitary, as before it was tumultuous, and full of people. Telesile wondered at the weakness of men; and when she beheld her self in a glass, she asked her self whether or no her beauty changed: but finding the same eyes, the same complexion, and the same in every thing she was before, she began to receive so great an aversion against all men, that she was very glad to be rid of their company: But since the noyse of this alteration was high in every quarter of the Town, Diophantes to lessen it went into the country: so that when I was returned unto Delphos I found her not in it: and I was informed by Melesander of all this I have related unto you. This absence sat sadly upon my soul, for I fancied such hopes of my seeing Telesile againe, that the privation of such a happiness made me not sensible of that joy I might well apprehend, in understanding I was rid of all my Rivals, and in hopes that hereafter Telesile would look upon me more then before: for certainly I did as much rejoyce at her poverty, as Androclides did grieve at it, because I thought it a fit occasion to let her know the greatness of my love: But when I considered that she was not in Delphos, hopes extinguished, and fears revived in my soul: I apprehended, that the business of some men might make her hate all, and I could not find any satisfaction in any thing: The next morning, I rendered an account of my employment, and received all the applauses from the Amphictions which could possibly be hoped for: My Father was so well pleased with me, that he expressed many marks of affection: All my friends did upon this occasion visit me. And had I not been in love, doubtless I had found subjects of joy enough; but absence from Telesile did bitter all my joys; and the desire I had to testify unto her, that I was not of the humour of those men who had forsaken her, did trouble me much, as if some grand misfortune had happened unto me. During all this time, I could not endure the company of any but Melesander, because I could not freely discourse of my love with any else, and because he was so complacential as to hear me favorably, which questionless is one of the most sensible consolations, which one who is absent from her he loves, can enjoy: But after I had sighed away many a day Diophantes returned and brought Telesile with him, who was fully resolved to avoid the conversation of men, as much as handsomness would permit her: I no sooner heard she was returned to Delphos but I went unto Diophantes, who entertained me with much civility; Taxile did the like, and so did her adored daughter, Page 30 yet with this alteration, her civility was more serious and cold then formerly. Yet notwithstanding, I was so over-joyed to see her, and to find her without any of my old Rivals, that I made no reflection upon it until after I was gone: This first visit lasted not long, for since they came in late, it was neither discretion nor manners to stay any longer with them. So that I told Telesile, only with my eyes that I loved her; who would neither understand nor answer me in that language, which she herself first taught me. But when I was returned unto my Chamber, the faint coldness of Telesile troubled me; and I imagined that perhaps she was offended at my discourse with her at my departure; yet I hoped that my constant perseverance, might win upon her: The next morning I did as I was accustomed, before I went unto Millete, which was, to go unto the Temple, where I know she would be. There I found Androclides, and the greatest part of those who loved her before my departure: but they had all of them changed their places, for whereas they were wont to sit close unto certain Pillars of marble, close unto Telesile, where I first saw her, they now dispersed themselves into several other Seats: yet I, who not like them, was no chattering, did seat myself as I used in a place where I might see her, and she me; at the first she took no notice of me, because she was intent upon her devotions unto the Gods, but afterwards she turned her eyes towards me, and I saluted her with such reverence, as might make it appear I was in love with her; Telesile returned my complement with a blush, and me thought she looked Androclides in the eyes, as if she would thereby tell, that all the world had not rejected her; and indeed her looks had such an influence, that though her action was without any designe, yet Androclides changed both colour, and place; and immediately went out of the Temple, as one that was ashamed of his baseness, and would have been very glad, if I had been as unworthy as himself. I understood afterwards that the constancy of my affection, had almost made him renew his, and conquered his covetous inclination.

But yet in conclusion, he was contented to shun Telesile, and me both. For my part I let slip no opportunity of seeing her I loved: and it had been very difficult for her not to do me so much favour, as to make a difference betwixt me, and those who had cast her off; yet notwithstanding, she was so absolutely resolved to love none at all, that she did treat me with much indifference: Thus did I live a long while, and could not find a fit opportunity to talk in private with her; because she herself took away all occasions of it: But at the last I met her upon the banks of the River Cephises, which runs by Delphos, where all the Ladies of the Town used to walk, and left their Coaches at the end of a large Meadow, set round with myrtles, most delectable: there she was with two others of her friends, who after they had taken a turn or two, did meet with some men of their acquaintance, who led them by the hand, whilst I did the like unto Telesile, and could discourse with her without being understood by any but her self; for the freedom is greater at Delphos, then at Athens, or Corinth, by reason of the multitude of strangers which resort thither, and do insensibly introduce the Customs of their Country. But Oh Heavens, how was I grieved, when I offered to begin discourse! I no sooner resolved to speak one thing, then I did contradict it, so that we walked a long while without a word between us both: but in conclusion, my passion spurring me up, I began with a sigh, and said; I wish the Gods were pleased, adored Telesile, you understood the thoughts of my heart without my tongue, and that you guess how much I adore you. I can easily satisfy your wish, said she unto me, for I am so very well acquainted with the hearts of all men, that I must needs know yours.

Oh Madam, said I, make no cruel comparisons, nor, I beseech you, confound Androclides and Thimocrates together: Androclides, said she, is thought to be very prudent; and Thimocrates said I, is very amorous. Thimocrates, replied she, can perhaps dissemble better then others, but for all that his soul is subject to the same imperfections that other men are, who begin to love, and never think upon it: continue it through custome, and end it out of an humour, doing every thing without any reason. Oh Madam, (said I unto her) how ill do you interpret Thimocrates, if you should think so of him? For indeed, I must confess, that I began to love you, whether I would or no, but I continue it both out of mine own free disposition and reason: I departed from you as full of passion as ever man, I endured that cruel absence with unimaginable sorrow, and I return with affection infinitely augmented: although, I thought it a thing most impossible, that my love of you could admit of any increase, since the first minute I began to fix it upon you. Thimocrates, said she unto me, Androclides within this three months would have said the same unto all the men of Delphos, when he spoke unto them concerning me: Moreover the supposed beauty of Telesile, has now lost all its charms, since Crantor has put her out of any hopes of his riches. The reason why Androclides loved Telesile (said I unto Page 31 her) was the riches of another, but I adore her for her own riches: No, no, Divine Lady: (said I) it is those eyes, it is that mind which I regard, and indeed it is only your own merit which I love, which I serve, and which I will adore as long as I live. Beauty, Thimocrates, (said she unto me) though I have no owner of it, yet it is a thing which is as soon lost as any thing else; so that though your soul is not sensible of any such sordid passion, as to prefer riches before honour and virtue; yet I have no good assurance of your affection, and I am perswaded that you will do that hereafter out of weakness and inconstancy, which Androclides has done out of covetousness. No, Divine Telesile, answered I, you do not know me: yet to be sincere unto you, I do confess that the loss of your beauty would be an inconceivable grief unto me, but it would be in relation to your self, not that it is absolute necessary to keep in that fire of affection which is thoroughly kindled in my heart: but I look further, and I find so rich a beauty in your mind, most charming Lady, that although those glorious flames in your eyes were extinguished, yet your soul has beauty enough to ravish mine, although you were not fair at all: But Telesile has yet seen so little of the Spring time of her beauty, that it is <> long time till the Autumn. It is for want of experience then (said she smiling) that I ought to distrust my self: And therefore Thimocrates, not to deceive you, I pray you know this, that how coarsely soever fortune has treated me, yet will I carry it as highly as ever, and will be much more hard to be perswaded then before: I suspect all men, and my self also; therefore give over your designe, if you will be ruled by me: and I conceive you may do it without any dishonour; for when one runs away with a croud, (said she laughing) he hides his flight amongst the rest: but if you shall persist in your Courtship of me, and afterwards make <> retreat, you will then be taxed with absolute inconstancy: Give over then, Thimocrates, go, and leave Telesile at rest: for she will neither love, nor beloved, she thinks her self so rich in her own virtue, that she desires no more. You shall possess my heart (said I unto her) whether you will or no: I shall know that (said she smiling) whether you will or no; and so mixing with the rest of the company, we walked on, and I had not any opportunity to speak any more in private with her; and my mind was so busied with thinking whether I had cause of hopes or fears, that I knew not what any said. But to shorten my discourse, I shall in few words tell you, that the hundred thousand services and solicitations which I rendered unto Telesile, move some acceptance of them, she knew that her father would not dislike of my affection; and she herself did so like of my proceedings and addresses to her, that she entertained them with as much acknowledgment, as she scorned them that had forsaken her. In a word, I arrived unto such a happy condition with her, that she believed I loved her, and gave me leave to tell her as much.

In the mean while, Androclides, since he could not endure the sight, either of Telesile, or me, went into the Country, and so in time many others of her former Lovers, so that I thought my self in a very happy condition; for I saw Telesile everyday, and she was so sweet as to seem as if I were welcome: she had not directly told me that she loved me; but as I one day took an occasion to speak with her, she told me that there was news abroad which would make Androclides hate her more then he did; which was, that Atalia was like to bring forth a Successor unto Crantor, and it was true, but she looked so attentively upon me when she told it, as if she would find the bottom of my heart by the colour in my face. No, no, said I unto her, subtle Telesile, you cannot find anything in my face which does not speak that real thoughts of my heart, and you shall never find anything in my heart, which shall make me unworthy of yours. I wish I may not, said she hastily: She had no sooner pronounced this last word, but she blushed as if she had committed a crime, and endeavouring to mitigate that obliging interpretation which I might have made upon it, but it was with such a pleasing confusion, that I placed that minute in the number of the most happy ones that ever I had in my life; but Heaven knows it was seconded with as great a misfortune, as I thought that a happiness: for I was no sooner at my lodging, but my father sent for me, and told me that he stood in great need of my company in a journey which he intended in the morning, & that I must prepare my self for it; I endeavoured to excuse it, but could not: but presently after, I understood by Melesander, that my father did complain unto a friend of his, of my love unto Telesile, telling him that he suffered it, as long as there was any hopes of her being rich; but that he would not suffer it now that hope was taken away: so that when I had vanquished the rigor of Telesile, and was almost sure of Diophantes his consent, unto whom I had made addresses by Melesander, a new obstacle started up, and I must be sensible of all the horrid rigors of a long absence; for, to depart from her one loves, is doubtless a great misery; but to depart from her one loves, who loves him again, is incomparably the most dismal disaster that can possibly Page 32 come unto a man: yet notwithstanding I must prepare my self for it, and go with my father unto the furthest part of all Phocides, towards Megares: I knew not whether it were expedient to tell him that I took my leave of Telesile: but depart we did, and during this voyage, this misfortune happened, that the Commonwealth had given my father such an employment, as was exceedingly beneficial, and augmented his estate: so that I met with nothing but obstacle upon obstacle; and I was as much grieved at my good fortune, as I could not be more, if the worst had happened. During this time, my father used all his arguments to avert my love; and sometimes also, I endeavoured as much as I could to perswade him to prefer the virtue of Telesile before any thing else; but when I found that the more I testified my constancy, the more I retarded my return to Delphos; I dissembled my thoughts, and made him believe that absence had wrought the cure upon my love-sick mind: But alas, how extremely was he deceived in his belief, for I was never in my life so deeply plunged in the gulf of love, as then I knew that Telesile loved me, and I understood by Melesander, that my absence much troubled her, and I fancied such a Heaven of delight in seeing her again, that I thought upon nothing else. Yet I knew that my father would not
